This chapter goes on with the good words and comfortable words which we had in the chapter before, for the encouragement of the captives, assuring them that God would in due time return them or their children to their own land, and make them a great and happy nation again; especially by sending them the Messiah, in whose kingdom and grace many of these promises were to have their full accomplishment. I. They shall be restored to peace, and honour, and joy, and great plenty, ver. 1—14. II. Their sorrow for the loss of their children shall be at an end, ver. 15—17. III. They shall repent of their sins, and God will graciously accept them in their repentance, ver. 18—20. IV. They shall be multiplied and increased, both their children and their cattle, and not be cut off and diminished as they had been, ver. 21—30. V. God will renew his covenant with them, and enrich it with spiritual blessings, ver. 31—34. VI. These blessings shall be secured to theirs after them, even to the spiritual seed of Israel for ever, ver. 35—37. VII. As an earnest of this, the city of Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, ver. 38—40. These exceeding great and precious promises were firm foundations of hope, and full fountains of joy, to the poor captives; and we also may apply them to ourselves, and mix faith with them.

AT the same time, saith the LORD,
Will I be the God of all the families of Israel,
And they shall be my people.
2 Thus saith the LORD,
The people which were left of the sword found grace in the wilderness;
Even Israel, when I went to cause him to rest.
3 The LORD hath appeared of old unto me, saying,
Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love:
Therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee.
4 Again I will build thee,
And thou shalt be built, O virgin of Israel:
Thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets,
And shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry.
5 Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria:
The planters shall plant, and shall eat them as common things.
6 For there shall be a day,
That the watchmen upon the mount Ephraim shall cry,
Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion
Unto the LORD our God.
7 For thus saith the LORD;
Sing with gladness for Jacob,
And shout among the chief of the nations:
Publish ye, praise ye, and say,
O LORD, save thy people, the remnant of Israel.
8 Behold, I will bring them from the north country,
And gather them from the coasts of the earth,
And with them the blind and the lame,
The woman with child and her that travaileth with child together:
A great company shall return hither.
9 They shall come with weeping,
And with supplications will I lead them:
I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters
In a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble:
For I am a father to Israel,
And Ephraim is my firstborn.

God here assures his people,

First. That he will again take them into a covenant relation to himself, from which they seemed to have been cut off. At the same time when God's anger breaks out against the wicked, ch. xxx. 24, his own people shall be owned by him as the children of his love; "I will be the God," that is, I will shew myself to be "the God of all the families of Israel," ver. 1, not of the two tribes only, but of all the tribes; not of the house of Aaron only, and the families of Levi, but of all their families. Not only their state in general, but their particular families, and the interests of them, shall have the benefit of a special relation to God. Note, The families of good people, in their family capacity, may apply themselves to God, and stay themselves upon him as their God. If we and our houses serve the Lord, we and our houses shall be protected and blessed by him, Pr. iii. 33.

Secondly. That he will do for them in bringing them out of Babylon, as he had done for their fathers when he delivered them out of Egypt, and as he had purposed to do when he first took them to be his people. 1. He puts them in mind what he did for their fathers when he brought them out of Egypt, ver. 2. They were then, as these were, a people left of the sword, that sword of Pharaoh with which he cut off all the male children as soon as they were born, a bloody sword indeed they had narrowly escaped, and that sword with which he threatened to cut them off when he pursued them to the Red sea. They were then in the wilderness, where they seemed to be lost and forgotten, as these were now in a strange land, and yet they found grace in God's sight, were owned and highly honoured by him, and blessed with wonderful instances of his peculiar favour, and he was at this time going to cause them to rest in Canaan. Note, When we are brought very low, and insuperable difficulties appear in the way of our deliverance, it is good to remember that it has been so with the church formerly, and yet it has been raised up from its low estate, and has got to Canaan through all the hardships of a wilderness; and God is still the same. 2. They put him in mind of what God had done for their fathers, intimating that they now saw not such signs, and were ready to ask, as Gideon did, Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of? ver. 3. It is true "the Lord hath appeared of old unto me," in Egypt, in the wilderness, hath appeared with me and for me, hath been seen in his glory as my God. The years of ancient times were glorious years, but now it is otherwise; what good will it do us that he appeared of old to us, when now he is a God that hides himself from us? Isa. xlv. 15. Note, It is hard to take comfort from former smiles, under present frowns. 3. To this he answers with assurance of the constancy of his love; "Yea, I have loved thee," not only with an ancient love, but with an everlasting love, a love that shall never fail, however the comforts of it may for a time be suspended. It is an everlasting love, therefore have I extended or drawn out lovingkindness unto thee also, as well as to thine ancestors. Or, With lovingkindness have I drawn thee to myself as thy God, from all the idols to which thou hadst turned aside. Note, It is the happiness of those who are through grace interested in the love of God, that it is an everlasting love; from everlasting in the counsels of it to everlasting in the continuance and consequences of it; and that nothing can separate them from that love; and those whom God loves with this love he will draw them into covenant and communion with himself by the influences of his Spirit upon their souls; he will draw them with lovingkindness, with the cords of men and bands of love, than which no attraction can be more powerful.

Thirdly. That he will again form them into a people, and give them a very joyful settlement in their own land, ver. 4, 5. Is the church of God his house, his temple? Is it now in ruins? It is so; but, "Again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built." Are the parts of this building dispersed? They shall be collected and put together again, each in its place. If God undertake to build them they shall be built, whatever opposition may be given to it. Is Israel a beautiful virgin? Is she now stripped of her ornaments, and reduced to a melancholy state? She is so; but "thou shalt again be adorned" and made fine, adorned with thy tabrets or timbrels; the ornaments of thy chamber, and made merry. They shall resume their harps, which had been hung upon the willow-trees, shall tune them, and shall themselves be in tune to make use of them. They shall be adorned with their tabrets, for now their mirth and music shall be seasonable; it shall be a proper time for it. God in his providence shall call them to it, and then it shall be an ornament to them; whereas tabrets, at a time of common calamity, when God called to mourning, were a shame to them. Or it may refer to their use of tabrets in the solemnizing of their religious feasts, and their going forth in dances then, as the daughters of Shiloh, Jud. xxi. 19, 21. And then our mirth is indeed an ornament to us, when we serve God and honour him with it. Is the joy of the city maintained by the products of the country? It is so, and therefore it is promised, ver. 5, "Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria;" which had been the head city of the kingdom of Israel, in opposition to that of Judah; but they shall now be united, Eze. xxxvii. 22. And there shall be such a perfect peace and security, that men shall apply themselves wholly to the improvement of their ground; the planters shall plant, not fearing the soldiers coming to eat the fruits of what they had planted, or to pluck it up; but they themselves shall eat them freely, as common things, not forbidden fruits, not forbidden by the law of God, as they were till the fifth year, Lev. xix. 13—15; not forbidden by the owners, because there shall be such plenty as to yield enough for all, for each.

Fourthly. That they shall have liberty and opportunity to worship God in the ordinances of his own appointment, and shall have both invitations and inclinations to do so; ver. 6, "There shall be a day," and a glorious day it will be, "when the watchmen upon mount Ephraim," that are sent to stand sentinel there to give notice of the approach of the enemy, finding that all is very quiet, and there is no appearance of danger, shall desire for a time to be discharged from their post, that they may go up to Zion, to praise God for the public peace. Or the watchmen that tend the vineyards, spoken of ver. 5, shall stir up themselves, and one another, and all their neighbours, to go and keep the solemn feasts at Jerusalem. Now this implies that the service of God shall be again set up in Zion, that there shall be a general resort to it, with much affection and mutual excitement, as in David's time, Ps. cxxii. 1. But that which is most observable here is that the watchmen of Ephraim are forward to promote the worship of God at Jerusalem, whereas, when time was, the watchman of Ephraim was hatred against the house of his God, Hos. ix. 8; and, instead of inviting people to Zion, laid snares for those that set their faces thitherward, Hos. v. 1. Note, God can make those who have been enemies to religion, and the true worship of God, to become encouragers of it, and leaders in it. This promise was to have its full accomplishment in the days of the Messiah, when the Gospel should be preached to all these countries, and a general invitation thereby given unto the church of Christ, of which Zion was a type.

Fifthly. That God shall have the glory, and the church both the honour and comfort, of this blessed change; ver. 7, "Sing with gladness for Jacob;" that is, let all her friends and well-wishers rejoice with her, Deu. xxxii. 43; "Rejoice ye Gentiles with his people," Rom. xv. 10. The restoration of Jacob will be taken notice of by all the neighbours, it will be matter of joy to them all, and they shall all join with Jacob in his joys, and thereby pay him respect, and put a reputation upon him. Even the chief of the nations, that make the greatest figure, shall think it an honour to them to congratulate the restoration of Jacob, and shall do themselves the honour to send their ambassadors on that errand. "Publish ye, praise ye;" in publishing these tidings, praise the God of Israel, praise the Israel of God, speak honourably of both. The publishers of the Gospel must do it with praise; and therefore it is often spoken of in the Psalms as mingled with praises, Ps. lxvii. 2, 3; xcvi. 2, 3. What we either bring to others or take to ourselves the comfort of, we must be sure to give God the praise of; "Praise ye, and say, O Lord, save thy people;" that is, perfect their salvation, go on to save the remnant of Israel that are yet in bondage, as Ps. cxxvi. 3, 4. Note, When we are praising God for what he has done we must call upon him for the future favours which his church is in need and expectation of. And in praying to him we really praise him, and give him glory; he takes it so.

Sixthly. That in order to a happy settlement in their own land they shall have a joyful return out of the land of their captivity, and a very comfortable passage homeward, ver. 8, 9. And this beginning of mercy should be to them a pledge of all the other blessings here promised. 1. Though they are scattered to places far remote, yet they shall be brought together from the north country, and from the coasts of the earth; wherever they are God will find them out. 2. Though many of them are very unfit for travel, yet that shall be no hindrance to them. The blind and the lame shall come; such a good-will shall they have to their journey, and such a good heart upon it, that they shall not make their blindness and lameness an excuse for staying where they are. Their companions will be ready to help them, will be eyes to the blind and legs to the lame, as good Christians ought to be to one another in their travels heavenward, Job xxix. 15. But, above all, their God will help them; and let none plead he is blind that has God for his guide; or lame that has God for his strength. The women with child are heavy, and it is not fit they should undertake such a journey, much less those that travail with child; and yet, when it is to return to Zion, neither the one nor the other shall make any difficulty of it. Note, When God calls we must not plead any inability to come; for he that calls us will help us, will strengthen us. 3. Though they seem to be diminished, and to become few in numbers, yet when they come all together they shall be a great company; and so will God's spiritual Israel be, when there shall be a general rendezvous of them, though now they are but a little flock. 4. Though their return will be matter of joy to them, yet prayers and tears will be both their stores and their artillery; ver. 9, "They shall come with weeping, and with supplication," weeping for sin, supplication for pardon; for the goodness of God shall lead them to repentance, and they shall weep with more bitterness, and more tenderness for sin, when they are delivered out of their captivity than ever they did when they were groaning under it. Weeping and praying do well together; tears put life into prayers, and express the liveliness of them, and prayers help to wipe away tears. 'With favours will I lead them,' so the margin reads it; in their journey they shall be compassed with God's favours, the fruits of his favour. 5. Though they have a perilous journey, yet they shall be safe under a Divine conduct and convoy. Is the country they pass through dry and thirsty? "I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters," not the waters of a landflood, which fail in summer. Is it a wilderness where there is no road, no track? I will cause them to walk in a straight way, which they shall not miss. Is it a rough and rocky country? Yet they shall not stumble. Note, Whithersoever God gives his people a clear call, he will either find them or make them a ready way; and while we are following providence we may be sure providence will not be wanting to us. And, 6. Here is a reason given why God will take all this care of his people; "for I am a father to Israel," a father that begat him, and therefore will maintain him, that have the care and compassion of a father for him, Ps. ciii. 13. "And Ephraim is my first-born," even Ephraim, that, having gone astray from God, was no more worthy to be called a son, yet shall be owned as a first-born, particularly dear, and heir of a double portion of blessings. The same reason that was given for their release out of Egypt is given for their release out of Babylon; they are freeborn, and therefore must not be enslaved; are born to God, and therefore must not be the servants of men; Ex. iv. 22, 23, "Israel is my son, my first-born, let my son go, that he may serve me." If we take God for our father, and join ourselves to the church of the first-born, we may be assured that we shall want nothing that is good for us.

10 Hear the word of the LORD, O ye nations,
And declare it in the isles afar off, and say,
He that scattered Israel will gather him,
And keep him, as a shepherd doth his flock.
11 For the LORD hath redeemed Jacob,
And ransomed him from the hand of him that was stronger than he.
12 Therefore they shall come and sing in the height of Zion,
And shall flow together to the goodness of the LORD,
For wheat, and for wine, and for oil,
And for the young of the flock, and of the herd:
And their soul shall be as a watered garden;
And they shall not sorrow any more at all.

WATERED GARDEN.

13 Then shall the virgin rejoice in the dance,
Both young men and old together:
For I will turn their mourning into joy,
And will comfort them, and make them rejoice from their sorrow.
14 And I will satiate the soul of the priests with fatness,
And my people shall be satisfied with my goodness, saith the LORD.
15 Thus saith the LORD;
A voice was heard in Ramah,
Lamentation, and bitter weeping;
Rahel weeping for her children [were not.
Refused to be comforted for her children, because they
16 Thus saith the LORD;
Refrain thy voice from weeping,
And thine eyes from tears:
For thy work shall be rewarded, saith the LORD;
And they shall come again from the land of the enemy.
17 And there is hope in thine end, saith the LORD,
That thy children shall come again to their own border.

This paragraph is much to the same purpose with the last, publishing to the world, as well as to the church, the purposes of God's love concerning his people. This is a "word of the Lord," which the nations must hear, for it is a prophecy of a work of the Lord, which the nations cannot but take notice of; let them hear the prophecy that they may the better understand and improve the performance. And let them that hear it themselves declare it to others, "declare it in the isles afar off;" it will be a piece of news that will spread all the world over. It will look very great in history, let us see how it looks in prophecy. It is foretold,

First. That those that are dispersed shall be brought together again from their dispersions. He that scattered Israel will gather him, for he knows whither he scattered them, and therefore where to find them, ver. 10. Una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit—'The hand that inflicted the wound shall heal it.' And when he has gathered him into one body, one fold, he will keep him as a shepherd doth his flock from being scattered again.

Secondly. That those that are sold and alienated shall be redeemed and brought back, ver. 11. Though the enemy that had got possession of him was stronger than he, yet the Lord, who is stronger than all, hath redeemed and ransomed him, not by price, but by power, as of old out of the Egyptian's hands.

Thirdly. That with their liberty they shall have plenty and joy, and God shall be honoured and served with it, ver. 12, 13. When they are returned to their own land, "they shall come and sing in the high place of Zion;" on the top of that holy mountain they shall sing to the praise and glory of God. We read they did so when the foundation of the temple was laid there; they "sang together, praising and giving thanks to the Lord," Ezr. iii. 11. They shall "flow together to the goodness of the Lord;" that is, they shall flock in great numbers, and with great forwardness and cheerfulness, as streams of water, "to the goodness of the Lord;" that is, to the temple, where he causeth his goodness to pass before his people. They shall come together in solemn assemblies, to praise him for his goodness, and to pray for the fruits of it, and the continuance of it; they shall come to bless him for his goodness, in giving them wheat, and wine, and oil, and the young of the flock, and of the herd, which, now they have obtained their freedom, they have an incontested property in, and the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of; and which therefore they honour God with the firstfruits of, and out of which they bring offerings to his altar. Note, It is comfortable to observe the goodness of the Lord in the gifts of common providence, and even in them to taste covenant-love. And having plenty, plenty out of want and scarcity, they shall greatly rejoice; "their soul shall be as a watered garden," flourishing and fruitful, Isa. lviii. 11, pleasant and fragrant, and abounding in all good things. Note, Our souls are never valuable as gardens but when they are watered with the dews of God's Spirit and grace. It is a precious promise that follows, and which will not have its full accomplishment any where on this side the height of the heavenly Zion, that they "shall not sorrow any more at all;" for it is only in that New Jerusalem that "all tears shall be wiped away," Rev. xxi. 4. However, so far it was fulfilled to the returned captives, that they had not any more those causes for sorrow that they had had; and therefore, ver. 13, young men and old shall rejoice together; so grave shall the young men be in their joys as to keep company with the old men, and so transported shall the old men be as to associate with the young. Salva res est, saltat senex,—'The state prospers, and the aged dance.' God will "turn their mourning into joy," their fasts into solemn feasts, Zec. viii. 19. It was in the return out of Babylon that they who sowed in tears were made to reap in joy, Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6. Those are comforted indeed whom God comforts, and may forget their troubles when he makes them to rejoice from their sorrow; not only rejoice after it, but rejoice from it. Their joy shall borrow lustre from their sorrow, which shall serve as a foil to it; and the more they think of their troubles the more shall they rejoice in their deliverance.

Fourthly. That both the ministers and those they minister to shall have abundant satisfaction in what God gives them; ver. 14, "I will satiate the soul of the priests with fatness," that is, There shall be such plenty of sacrifices brought to the altar, that they who live upon the altar shall live very comfortably. They and their families shall be satiated with fatness, they shall have enough, and that of the best; and "my people shall be satisfied with my goodness," and shall think there is enough in that to make them happy; and so there is. God's people have an abundant satisfaction in God's goodness, though they have but little of this world. Let them be satisfied of God's lovingkindness and they will be satisfied with it, and desire no more to make them happy. All this is applicable to the spiritual blessings which the redeemed of the Lord enjoy by Jesus Christ, infinitely more valuable than corn, and wine, and oil, and the satisfaction of soul which they have in the enjoyment of them.

Fifthly. That those particularly who had been in sorrow for the loss of their children that were carried into captivity, should have that sorrow turned into joy upon their return, ver. 15—17. Here we have,

1. The sad lamentation which the mothers made for the loss of their children, ver. 15. "In Ramah was there a voice heard" at the time when the general captivity was, nothing but "lamentation and bitter weeping," more there than in other places, because there Nebuzaradan had the general rendezvous of his captives, as appears ch. xl. 1, where we find him sending Jeremiah back from Ramah. Rachel is there said to weep for her children. The sepulchre of Rachel was between Ramah and Bethlehem. Benjamin, one of the two tribes, and Ephraim, head of the ten tribes, were both descendants from Rachel. She had but two sons, the elder of which was one for whom his father grieved, and "refused to be comforted," Gen. xxxvii. 35; the other she herself called Benoni, the 'son of my sorrow.' Now the inhabitants of Ramah did in like manner grieve for their sons and their daughters that were carried away, as 1 Sam. xxx. 6, and such a voice of lamentation was there as, to speak poetically, might even have raised Rachel out of her grave, to mourn with them. The tender parents even "refused to be comforted for their children, because they were not," were not with them, but were in the hands of their enemies; they were never likely to see them more. This is applied by the evangelists to the great mourning that was at Bethlehem, for the murder of the infants there by Herod, Mat. ii. 17, 18; and this scripture is said to be then fulfilled. They wept for them and would not be comforted, supposing the case would not admit any ground of comfort, because they were not. Note, Sorrow for the loss of children cannot but be great sorrow, especially if we so far mistake as to think they are not.

2. Seasonable comfort administered to them in reference hereunto, ver. 16, 17. They are advised to moderate that sorrow, and to set bounds to it; "Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears." We are not forbidden to mourn in such a case. Allowances are made for natural affection, but we must not suffer our sorrow to run into an extreme, to hinder our joy in God, or take us off from our duty to him. Though we mourn we must not murmur, nor must we resolve, as Jacob did, to go to the grave in mourning: and to repress inordinate grief we must consider that there is hope in our end; hope that there will be an end, the trouble will not last always; that it will be a happy end, the end will be peace. Note, It ought to support us under our troubles that we have reason to hope they will end well. The righteous has hope in his death; that will be the blessed period of his griefs and the blessed passage to his joys. There is hope for thy posterity, so some read it; though thou mayest not live to see these glorious days thyself, there is hopes that thy posterity shall. Though one generation falls in the wilderness, the next shall enter Canaan. Two things thou mayest comfort thyself with the hope of: 1st. The reward of thy work; Thy suffering work shall be rewarded. The comforts of the deliverance shall be sufficient to balance all the grievances of the captivity. God makes his people glad according to the days wherein he has afflicted them, and so there is a proportion between the joys and the sorrows, as between the reward and the work. The glory to be revealed, which the saints hope for in their end, will abundantly countervail the sufferings of this present time, Rom. viii. 18. 2nd. The restoration of thy children; "They shall come again from the land of the enemy," ver. 16; they "shall come again to their own border," ver. 17. There is hope that children at a distance may be brought home; Jacob had a comfortable meeting with Joseph, after he had despaired of ever seeing him. There is hope concerning children removed by death, that they shall return to their own border, to the happy lot assigned them in the resurrection; a lot in the heavenly Canaan, that border of his sanctuary. We shall see reason to repress our grief for the death of our children, that are taken into covenant with God, when we consider the hopes we have of their resurrection to eternal life; they are not lost, but gone before.

18 I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus;
Thou hast chastised me, [yoke:
And I was chastised, as a bullock unaccustomed to the Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;
For thou art the LORD my God.
19 Surely, after that I was turned, I repented;
And after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh:
I was ashamed, yea, even confounded,
Because I did bear the reproach of my youth.
20 Is Ephraim my dear son?
Is he a pleasant child?
For since I spake against him,
I do earnestly remember him still:
Therefore my bowels are troubled for him;
I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the LORD.
21 Set thee up waymarks,
Make thee high heaps:
Set thine heart toward the highway,
Even the way which thou wentest:
Turn again, O virgin of Israel,
Turn again to these thy cities. [ter?
22 How long wilt thou go about, O thou backsliding daugh-
For the LORD hath created a new thing in the earth,
A woman shall compass a man.
23 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
As yet they shall use this speech in the land of Judah
And in the cities thereof, when I shall bring again their captivity;
The LORD bless thee, O habitation of justice, and mountain of holiness.
24 And there shall dwell in Judah itself, and in all the cities thereof together,
Husbandmen, and they that go forth with flocks.
25 For I have satiated the weary soul,
And I have replenished every sorrowful soul.
26 Upon this I awaked, and beheld;
And my sleep was sweet unto me.

We have here,

First. Ephraim's repentance, and return to God. Not only Judah, but Ephraim, the ten tribes, shall be restored, and therefore shall thus be prepared and qualified for it; Hos. xiv. 8, "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" Ephraim the people is here spoken of as a single person, to denote their unanimity; they shall be as one man in their repentance, and shall glorify God in it with one mind and one mouth, one and all. It is likewise thus expressed that it might be the better accommodated to particular penitents, for whose direction and encouragement this passage is intended. Ephraim is here brought in weeping for sin, perhaps because Ephraim, the person from whom that tribe had its denomination, was a man of a tender spirit, mourned for his children many days, 1 Chr. vii. 21, 22, and sorrow for sin is compared to that for an only son. This penitent is here brought in, 1. Bemoaning himself and the miseries of his present case. True penitents do thus bemoan themselves. 2. Accusing himself, laying a load upon himself, as a sinner, a great sinner. He chargeth upon himself in the first place that sin which his conscience told him he was more especially guilty of at this time, and that was impatience under correction. "Thou hast chastised me;" I have been under the rod, and I needed it, I deserved it. I was justly chastised, chastised as a bullock who had never felt the goad, if he had not first rebelled against the yoke. True penitents look upon their afflictions as fatherly chastisements; "Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised;" that is, it was well I was chastised, otherwise I had been undone; it did me good, or at least was intended to do me good, and yet I have been impatient under it. Or it may speak his unaffectedness under the affliction; "Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised," that was all; not, I was awakened by it and quickened by it: I looked no farther than the chastisement. I have been under the chastisement "as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke," unruly and unmanageable, kicking against the pricks, "like a wild bull in a net," Isa. li. 20. This is the sin he finds himself guilty of now; but, ver. 19, he reflects upon his former sins, and looks as far back as the days of his youth. The discovery of one sin should put us upon searching out more. Now he remembers the reproach of his youth; Ephraim as a people reflects upon the miscarriages of their ancestors, when they were first formed into a people. It is applicable to particular persons. Note, The sin of our youth was the reproach of our youth, and we ought often to remember it against ourselves, and to bear it in a penitential sorrow and shame. 3. He is here brought in angry at himself, having a holy indignation at himself for his sin and folly. He smote upon his thigh, as the publican upon his breast; he was even amazed at himself and at his own stupidity and forwardness; he was ashamed, yea, even confounded, could not with any confidence look up to God, nor with any comfort reflect upon himself. 4. He is here recommending himself to the mercy and grace of God. He finds he is bent to backslide from God, and cannot by any power of his own keep himself close with God, much less when he is revolted bring himself back to God; and therefore he prays, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned," which implies that unless God do turn him by his grace he shall never be turned, but wander endlessly; that therefore he is very desirous of converting grace, has a dependence upon it, and doubts not but that that grace will be sufficient for him, to help him over all the difficulties that were in the way of his return to God: see ch. xvii. 14, "Heal me, and I shall be healed." God works with power, can make the unwilling willing; if he undertake the conversion of a soul it will be converted. 5. He is here pleasing himself with the experience he had had of the blessed effect of Divine grace; "Surely after that I was turned I repented." Note, All the pious workings of our hearts towards God are the fruit and consequence of the powerful working of his grace in us. And observe, he was turned, he was instructed, his will was bowed to the will of God, by the right informing of his judgment concerning the truths of God. Note, The way God takes of converting souls to himself is by opening the eyes of their understandings, and all good follows thereupon; "After that I was instructed," I yielded, "I smote upon my thigh." When sinners come to a right knowledge, they will come to a right way. Ephraim was chastised, and that did not produce the desired effect, it went no farther; I was chastised, and that was all. But when the instructions of God's Spirit accompanied the corrections of his providence, then the work was done, then he smote upon his thigh; was so humbled for sin as to have no more to do with it.

Secondly. God's compassion on Ephraim, and the kind reception he finds with God, ver. 20. 1. He owns him for a child, though he has been an undutiful child and a prodigal; "Is Ephraim my dear son? Is he a pleasant child?" Thus, when Ephraim bemoans himself, God bemoans him, as one whom his mother comforts, though she had chidden him, Isa. lxvi. 13. Is this Ephraim my dear son? Is this that pleasant child? Is it he that is thus sad in spirit, and that complains so bitterly? So it is like that of Saul, 1 Sam. 16, 17, "Is this thy voice, my son David?" Or, as it is sometimes supplied, Is not Ephraim my dear son? Is he not a pleasant child? Yes, now he is, now he repents and returns. Note, Those that have been undutiful backsliding children, if they sincerely return and repent, however they have been under the chastisement of the rod, shall be accepted of God as dear and pleasant children. Ephraim had afflicted himself, but God thus heals him; had abased himself, but God thus honours him; as the returning prodigal, who thought himself no more worthy to be called a son, yet by his father had the best robe put upon him, and a ring on his hand. 2. He relents towards him, and speaks of him with a great deal of tender compassion; "Since I spake against him," by the threatening of the word and the rebukes of providence, "I do earnestly remember him still," my thoughts towards him are thoughts of peace. Note, When God afflicts his people, yet he doth not forget them; when he casts them out of their land yet he doth not cast them out of sight nor out of mind. Even then when God is speaking against us, yet he is acting for us, and designing our good in all; and this is our comfort in our affliction, that the Lord thinketh upon us, though we have forgotten him. "I remember him still," and therefore "my bowels are troubled for him," as Joseph's yearned towards his brethren, even then when he spake roughly to them. When Israel's afflictions extorted a penitent confession and submission, it is said his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel, Jud. x. 16, for he always afflicts with the greatest tenderness. It was God's compassion that mitigated Ephraim's punishment, "My heart is turned within me," Hos. xi. 8, 9; and now the same compassion accepted Ephraim's repentance. Ephraim had pleaded, ver. 18, "Thou art the Lord my God," therefore to thee will I return, therefore on thy mercy and grace will I depend; and God shews it was a valid plea, and prevailing, for he makes it appear both that he is God, and not man, and that he is his God. 3. He resolves to do him good; "I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord." Note, God hath mercy in store, rich mercy, sure mercy, suitable mercy, for all that in sincerity seek him and submit to him. And the more we are afflicted for sin the better prepared we are for the comforts of that mercy.

Thirdly. Gracious excitements and encouragements given to the people of God in Babylon to prepare for their return to their own land. Let them not tremble and lose their spirit, let them not trifle and lose their time; but with a firm resolution and a close application address themselves to their journey, ver. 21, 22. 1. They must think of nothing but of coming back to their own country, out of which they had been driven; "Turn again, O virgin of Israel," a virgin to be again espoused to my God, "turn again to these thy cities;" though they are laid waste in the ruins, they are thy cities, which thy God gave thee, and therefore turn again to them. They must be content in Babylon no longer than till they had liberty to return to Zion. 2. They must return the same way that they went, that the remembrance of the sorrows that attended them, or which their fathers had told them of in such and such places on the road, the sight of which would, by a local memory, put them in mind of them, might make them the more thankful for their deliverance. Those that have departed from God into the bondage of sin must return by the same way in which they went astray, to the same duties they neglected; must do their first works. 3. They must engage themselves, and all that is within them, in this affair; "Set thine heart towards the highway," bring thy mind to it, consider thy duty, thine interest, and go about it with a goodwill. Note, The way from Babylon to Zion, from the bondage of sin to the glorious liberty of God's children, is a highway, it is right, it is plain, it is safe, it is well-tracked, Isa. xxxv. 8, yet none are likely to walk in it, unless they set their hearts toward it. 4. They must furnish themselves with all needful accommodations for the journey; "Set thee up waymarks, and make thee high heaps," or pillars; send before to have such set up in all places where there is any danger of missing the road. Let those that go first, and are best acquainted with the way, set up such directions for those that follow. 5. They must compose themselves for their journey; "How long wilt thou go about, O backsliding daughter?" Let not their minds fluctuate or be uncertain about it, but resolve upon it; let them not put themselves into a toss with care and fear; let them not seek about to creatures for assistance, nor hurry here and there in courting them, which has often been an instance of their backsliding from God, but let them cast themselves upon God, and then let their minds be fixed. 6. They are encouraged to do this by an assurance God gives them that he would create a new thing, strange and surprising, in the earth; in that land, "A woman shall compass a man." The church of God is weak and feeble as a woman, altogether unapt for military employments, and of a timorous spirit, yet shall surround, besiege, and prevail against a mighty man, Isa. liv. 6; the church is compared to a woman, Rev. xii. 1. And whereas we find armies compassing the camp of the saints, Rev. xx. 9, now the camp of the saints shall compass them. Many good interpreters understand this new thing created in that land, to be the incarnation of Christ, which God had an eye to in bringing them back to that land, and which had sometimes been given them for a sign, Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6. A woman, the Virgin Mary, inclosed in her womb the Mighty One, for so Geber, the word here used, signifies; and God is called Gibbor, the mighty God, Jer. xxxii. 18, and so is Christ there, where his incarnation is spoken of, as it is supposed to be here, Isa. ix. 6. He is El-Gibbor, the Mighty God. Let this assure them that God would not cast off this people, for that blessing was to be among them, Isa. lxv. 8.

Fourthly. A comfortable prospect given them of a happy settlement in their own land again. 1. They shall have an interest in the esteem and goodwill of all their neighbours, who will give them a good word and put up a good prayer for them; ver. 23, As yet, or rather, Yet again, (though Judah and Jerusalem have long been an astonishment and a hissing,) this speech shall be used as it was formerly, concerning the land of Judah and the cities thereof, "The Lord bless thee, O habitation of justice and mountain of holiness." This intimates that they shall return much reformed and every way better; and this reformation shall be so conspicuous that all about them shall take notice of it. The cities that used to be nests of pirates shall be habitations of justice; the mountain of Israel, (so the whole land is called, Ps. lxxviii. 54,) and especially mount Zion, shall be a mountain of holiness. Observe, Justice towards men and holiness towards God must go together. Godliness and honesty are what God has joined, and let no man think to put them asunder, or to make one atone for the want of the other. It is well with a people when they come out of trouble thus refined, and it is a sure presage of farther happiness. And we may with great comfort pray for the blessing of God upon those houses that are habitations of justice, those cities and countries that are mountains of holiness; there the Lord will undoubtedly command the blessing. 2. There shall be great plenty of all good things among them; ver. 24, 25, "There shall dwell in Judah itself, even in it, though it has now long lain waste, both husbandmen and shepherds, the two ancient and honourable employments of Cain and Abel, Gen. iv. 2. It is a comfortable dwelling, an "habitation of justice," and a "mountain of holiness." And the husbandmen and shepherds shall eat of the fruit of their labours, for I have satiated the weary and sorrowful soul; that is, they that came weary from their journey, and have been long sorrowful in their captivity, shall now enjoy great plenty. This is applicable to the spiritual blessings God has in store for all true penitents, for all that are just and holy; they shall be abundantly satisfied with Divine graces and comforts. In the love and favour of God the weary soul shall find rest, and the sorrowful soul joy.

Fifthly. The prophet tells us what pleasure the discovery of this brought to his mind, ver. 26. The foresights God had given him sometimes of the calamities of Judah and Jerusalem were an exceeding pain to him, as ch. iv. 19; but these views were pleasing ones, though at a distance. "Upon this I awaked," overcome with joy, which burst the fetters of sleep, and I reflected upon my dream, and it was such as had made my sleep sweet to me; I was refreshed, as men use to be with quiet sleep. Those may sleep sweetly that lie down and rise up in the favour of God, and in communion with him. Nor is any prospect in this world more pleasing to good men and good ministers than that of the flourishing state of the church of God. What can we see with more satisfaction than "the good of Jerusalem all the days of our life and peace upon Israel?"

27 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will sow the house of Israel and the house of [Judah
With the seed of man, and with the seed of beast.
28 And it shall come to pass, that like as I have watched over them,
To pluck up, and to break down, and to throw down,
And to destroy, and to afflict;
So will I watch over them,
To build, and to plant, saith the LORD.
29 In those days they shall say no more,
The fathers have eaten a sour grape,
And the children's teeth are set on edge.
30 But every one shall die for his own iniquity:
Every man that eateth the sour grape,
His teeth shall be set on edge.
31 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will make a new covenant
With the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:
32 Not according to the covenant that I made with their
In the day that I took them by the hand [fathers
To bring them out of the land of Egypt;
Which my covenant they brake,
Although I was an husband unto them, saith the LORD:
33 But this shall be the covenant
That I will make with the house of Israel;
After those days saith the LORD,
I will put my law in their inward parts,
And write it in their hearts;
And will be their God,
And they shall be my people.
34 And they shall teach no more
Every man his neighbour, and every man his brother,
Saying, Know the LORD:
For they shall all know me, [LORD:
From the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the
For I will forgive their iniquity,
And I will remember their sin no more.

The prophet having found his sleep sweet, made so by the revelations of Divine grace, sets himself to sleep again, in hopes of farther discoveries, and is not disappointed; for it is here farther promised,

First. That the people of God shall become both numerous and prosperous,

Both Israel and Judah shall be replenished both with men and cattle, as if they were sown with the seed of both, ver. 27. They shall increase and multiply like a field sown with corn; and this is the product of God's blessing, ver. 23; for whom God blessed, to them he said, Be fruitful. This should be a type of the wonderful increase of the Gospel church. God will build them, and plant them, ver. 28; he will watch over them to do them good, that is, no opportunity shall be lost that may further their prosperity. Every thing for a long time had turned so much against them, and all occurrences did so conspire to ruin them, that it seemed as if God had "watched over them to pluck up and to throw down;" but now every thing that falls out shall happily fall in to strengthen and advance their interests. God will be as ready to comfort those that repent of their sins, and are humbled for them, as he is to punish those that continue in love with their sins, and are hardened in them.

Secondly. That they shall be reckoned with no farther for the sins of their fathers; ver. 29, 30, "They shall say no more," that is, they shall have no more occasion to say, that God "visits the iniquity of the parents upon the children," which God had done in the captivity; for the sins of their ancestors came into the account against them, particularly those of Manasseh: this they had complained of as a hardship. Other scriptures justify God in this method of proceeding; and our Saviour tells the wicked Jews in his days, that they should smart for their fathers' sins, because they persisted in them, Mat. xxiii. 35, 39; but it is here promised that this severe dispensation with them should now be brought to an end, that God would proceed no farther in his controversy with them for their fathers' sins, but remember for them his covenant with their fathers, and do them good according to that covenant. They shall no more complain as they have done, that "the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge; "which speaks something of an absurdity, and is an invidious reflection upon God's proceedings, but "every one shall die for his own iniquity" still. Though God will cease to punish them in their national capacity, yet he will still reckon with particular persons that provoke him. Note, Public salvations will give no impunity, no security to private sinners; still "every man that eats the sour grapes, his teeth shall be set on edge." Note, Those that eat forbidden fruit, how temptingly soever it looks, will find it a sour grape, and it will set their teeth on edge; sooner or later they will feel from it, and reflect upon it with bitterness. There is as direct a tendency in sin to make a man uneasy as there is in sour grapes to set the teeth on edge.

Thirdly. That God will renew his covenant with them, so that all these blessings they shall have not by providence only, but by promise, and thereby they shall be both sweetened and secured; but this covenant refers to gospel times, the latter days that shall come; for of gospel grace the apostle understands it, Heb. viii. 8, &c., where this whole passage is quoted, as a summary of the covenant of grace made with believers in Jesus Christ. Observe,

1. Who the persons are with whom this covenant is made. "With the house of Israel and Judah," that is, with the gospel church, the Israel of God on which peace shall be, Gal. vi. 16; with the spiritual seed of believing Abraham, and praying Jacob. Judah and Israel had been two separate kingdoms, but were united after their return, in the joint favours God bestowed upon them; so Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church and covenant.

2. What is the nature of this covenant in general. It is "a new covenant," and "not according to the covenant made with them, when they came out of Egypt;" not as if that made with them at mount Sinai were a covenant of nature and innocency, such as was made with Adam in the day he was created. No, that was for substance a covenant of grace, but it was a dark dispensation of that covenant, in comparison with this in gospel times; sinners were saved by that covenant upon their repentance, and faith in a Messiah to come, whose blood confirming that covenant was typified by that of the legal sacrifices, Ex. xxiv. 7, 8. Yet this may upon many accounts be called new in comparison with that; the ordinances and promises are more spiritual and heavenly, and the discoveries much more clear. That covenant God made with them, when he took them by the hand, as if they had been blind, or lame, or weak, to lead them out of the land of Egypt; "which covenant they brake." Observe, It was God that made this covenant, but it was the people that brake it; for our salvation is of God, but our sin and ruin is of ourselves. It was an aggravation of their breach of it, that God "was a husband to them," that he had espoused them to himself; it was a marriage covenant that was between him and them, which they broke by idolatry, that spiritual adultery. It is a great aggravation of our treacherous departure from God, that he has been a husband to us, a loving, tender, careful husband; faithful to us, and yet we false to him.

3. What are the particular articles of this covenant. They all contain spiritual blessings; not, I will give them the land of Canaan, and a numerous issue; but, I will give them pardon, and peace, and grace; good heads and good hearts. He promiseth,

1st. That he will incline them to their duty; "I will put my law in their inward part, and write it in their heart." Not, I will give them a new law, (as Mr. Gataker well observes,) for Christ came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it; but the law shall be written in their hearts by the finger of the Spirit, as formerly it was written in the tables of stone. God writes his law in the hearts of all believers, makes it ready and familiar to them, at hand when they have occasion to use it, as that which is written in the heart, Pr. iii. 3. He makes them in care to observe it; for that which we are solicitous about is said to lie near our heart. He works in them a disposition to obedience, a conformity of thought and affection to the rules of Divine law, as that of the copy the original. This is here promised, and ought to be prayed for; that our duty may be done conscientiously, and with delight.

2nd. That he will take them into relation to himself; "I will be their God," a God all-sufficient to them, "and they shall be my people," a loyal obedient people to me. God's being to us a God is the summary of all happiness, heaven itself is no more, Heb. xi. 16; Rev. xxi. 3. Our being to him a people, may be taken either as the condition on our part, (those and those only shall have God to be to them a God, that are truly willing to engage themselves to be to him a people,) or as a farther branch of the promise, that God will by his grace make us his people, a willing people in the day of his power; and whoever are his people it is his grace that makes them so.

3rd. That there shall be an abundance of the knowledge of God among all sorts of people; and this will have an influence upon all good, for they that rightly know God's name will seek him, and serve him, and put their trust in him; ver. 34, "All shall know me." All shall be welcome to the knowledge of God, and shall have the means of that knowledge; his "way shall be known upon earth," whereas for many ages "in Judah only was God known." Many more shall know God than did in the Old Testament times, which among the Gentiles were times of ignorance, the true God being to them an unknown God. The things of God shall in gospel times be made more plain and intelligible, and level to the capacities of the meanest, than they had been, while Moses had a veil upon his face. There shall be such a general knowledge of God, that there shall not be so much need as had formerly been of teaching. Some take it as an hyperbolical expression (and the dulness of the Jews needed such expressions to awake them) designed only to shew that the knowledge of God in gospel times should vastly exceed that knowledge of him, which they had under the law. Or perhaps it intimates, that in gospel times there shall be such great plenty of public preaching, statedly and constantly, by men authorized and appointed to preach the word in season, and out of season, much beyond what was under the law, that there shall be less need than there was then of fraternal teaching, by a neighbour and a brother. The priests preached but now and then, and in the temple to a few in comparison; but now all shall or may know God by frequenting the assemblies of Christians, wherein through all parts of the church the good knowledge of God shall be taught. Some give this sense of it, (Mr. Gataker mentions it,) that many shall have such clearness of understanding in the things of God that they may seem rather to have been taught by some immediate irradiation than by any means of instruction. In short, the things of God shall by the Gospel of Christ be brought to a clearer light than ever, 2 Tim. i. 10; and the people of God shall by the grace of Christ be brought to a clearer sight of those things than ever, Eph. i. 17, 18.

4th. That, in order to all these blessings, sin shall be pardoned. This is made the reason of all the rest, "For I will forgive their iniquity," will not impute that to them, nor deal with them according to the desert of that, will forgive and forget; "I will remember their sin no more." It is sin that keeps good things from us, that stops the current of God's favours; let sin be taken away by pardoning mercy, and the obstruction is removed, and Divine grace runs down like a river, like a mighty stream.

35 Thus saith the LORD,
Which giveth the sun for a light by day,
And the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night,
Which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar;
The LORD of hosts is his name:
36 If those ordinances depart from before me, saith the LORD,
Then the seed of Israel also shall cease
From being a nation before me for ever.
37 Thus saith the LORD;
If heaven above can be measured,
And the foundations of the earth searched out beneath,
I will also cast off all the seed of Israel
For all that they have done, saith the LORD.
38 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That the city shall be built to the LORD
From the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner.
39 And the measuring line shall yet go forth
Over against it upon the hill Gareb,
And shall compass about to Goath.
40 And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes,
And all the fields unto the brook of Kidron,
Unto the corner of the horse gate toward the east,
Shall be holy unto the LORD;
It shall not be plucked up,
Nor thrown down any more for ever.

Glorious things have been spoken in the foregoing verses concerning the gospel church, which that epocha of the Jewish church that was to commence at the return from captivity would at length terminate in, and which all those promises were to have their full accomplishments in; but may we depend upon these promises? Yes, we have here a ratification of them, and the utmost assurance imaginable given of the perpetuity of the blessings contained in them. The great thing here secured to us is, that while the world stands God will have a church in it, which, though sometimes it may be brought very low, yet shall be raised again, and its interests re-established: "It is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Now here are two things offered, for the confirmation of our faith in this matter: the building of the world, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem.

First. The building of the world, and the firmness and lastingness of that building, is an evidence of the power and faithfulness of that God who has undertaken the establishment of his church. He that built all things at first is God, Heb. iii. 4; and the same is he that makes all things now. The constancy of the glories of the kingdom of nature may encourage us to depend upon the Divine promise for the continuance of the glories of the kingdom of grace; for "this is as the waters of Noah," Isa. liv. 9. Let us observe here,

1. The glories of the kingdom of nature, and infer from thence how happy they are that have this God, the God of nature, to be their God for ever and ever. Take notice, 1st. Of the steady and regular motion of the heavenly bodies, which God is the first mover and supreme director of. "He giveth the sun for a light by day," ver. 35; not only made it at first to be so, but still gives it to be so; for the light, and heat, and all the influences of the sun, continually depend upon its great Creator. He gives "the ordinances of the moon and stars for a light by night," their motions are called ordinances, both because they are regular, and by rule, and because they are determined, and under rule: see Job xxxviii. 31—33. 2nd. Take notice of the government of the sea, and the check that is given to its proud billows. The Lord of hosts divideth the sea; or, as some read it, 'settles the sea, when the waves thereof roar,' (divide et impera,—'divide and rule;') when it is most tossed God keeps it within compass, Jer. v. 22; and soon quiets it, and makes it calm again. The power of God is to be magnified by us, not only in maintaining the regular motions of the heavens, but in controlling the irregular motions of the seas. 3rd. Take notice of the vastness of the heavens, and the immeasurable extent of the firmament, (he must needs be a great God who manageth such a great world as this is;) "the heavens above cannot be measured," ver. 37, and yet God fills them. 4th. Take notice of the mysteriousness, even of that part of the creation in which our lot is cast, and which we are most conversant with. "The foundations of the earth cannot be searched out beneath," for the Creator "hangeth the earth upon nothing," Job xxvi. 7; and we "know not how the foundations thereof are fastened," Job xxxviii. 6.

5th. Take notice of the immovable steadfastness of all these; ver. 36, "These ordinances cannot depart from before God." He hath all the hosts of heaven and earth continually under his eye, and all the motions of both; he has established them, and they abide, abide "according to his ordinance, for all are his servants," Ps. cix. 90, 91. The heavens are often clouded, and the sun and moon often eclipsed, the earth may quake, and the sea be tossed; but they all keep their place,—are moved, but not removed. Herein we must acknowledge the power, and goodness, and faithfulness of the Creator.

2. The securities of the kingdom of grace inferred from hence. We may be confident of this very thing, that the seed of Israel shall not cease from being a nation; for the spiritual Israel, the gospel church, shall be a holy nation, a peculiar people, 1 Pet. ii. 9. When Israel according to the flesh is no longer a nation, "the children of the promise are counted for the seed," Rom. ix. 8; and God will not "cast off all the seed of Israel," no not "for all that they have done," though they have done very wickedly, ver. 37; he justly might cast them off, but he will not. Though he cast them but from their land, and cast them down for a time, yet he will not cast them off. Some of them he casts off, but not all. To this the apostle seems to refer, Rom. xi. 5, "Hath God cast away his people?" God forbid that we should think so! for, ver. 5, "At this time there is a remmant," enough to save the credit of the promise, that God will not cast off all the seed of Israel, though many among them throw away themselves by unbelief. Now we may be assisted in the belief of this by considering, 1st. That the God that has undertaken the preservation of the church is a God of almighty power, that upholds all things by his almighty word. Our help stands in his name, who made heaven and earth, and therefore can do any thing. 2nd. That God would not take all this care of the world, but that he designs to have some glory to himself out of it; and how shall he have it but by securing to himself a church in it, a people that shall be to him for a name and a praise? 3rd. That if the order of the creation therefore continues firm because it was well fixed at first, and is not altered because it needs no alteration, the method of grace shall for the same reason continue invariable, as it was at first well settled. 4th. That he who hath promised to preserve a church for himself has approved himself faithful to the word which he has spoken, concerning the stability of the world. He that is true to his covenant with Noah and his sons, because he established it for an everlasting covenant, Gen. ix. 9, 16, we may be sure will not be false to his covenant with Abraham and his seed, his spiritual seed, for that also is an everlasting covenant. Even that which they have done, though they have done much amiss, shall not prevail to defeat the gracious intentions of the covenant: see Ps. lxxxix. 30, &c.

Secondly. The rebuilding of Jerusalem, which was now in ruins; and the enlargement and establishment of that shall be an earnest of these great things that God will do for the gospel church, the heavenly Jerusalem, ver. 30—32. The days will come, though they may be long in coming, 1. When Jerusalem shall be entirely built again, as large as ever it was. The dimensions are here exactly described, by the places through which the circumference passed; and no doubt the wall which Nehemiah built, and which, the more punctually to fulfil the prophecy, began about the tower of Hananeel here mentioned, Neh. iii. 1, inclosed as much ground as is here intended, though we cannot certainly determine the places here called the gate of the corner, the hill Gareb, &c. 2. When, being built, it shall be consecrated to God and to his service. It shall be built to the Lord, ver. 38; and even the suburbs and fields adjacent shall be holy unto the Lord. It shall not be polluted with idols, as formerly; but God shall be praised and honoured there. The whole city shall be as it were one temple, one holy place, as the New Jerusalem is, which therefore has no temple, because it is all temple. 3rd. Being thus built by virtue of the promise of God, and then devoted to praise of God, "it shall not be plucked up, or thrown down any more for ever;" that is, it shall continue very long; the time of the new city, from the return to its last destruction, being full as long as that of the old from David to the captivity. But this promise was to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, which, as it is the spiritual Israel, and therefore God will not cast it off, so it is the holy city, and therefore all the powers of men shall not pluck it up, or throw it down. It may lie waste for a time as Jerusalem did, but shall recover itself, shall weather the storm and gain its point, and "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

CHAPTER XXXII.

In this chapter we have, I. Jeremiah imprisoned for foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of king Zedekiah, ver. 1—5. II. We have him buying land, by Divine appointment, as an assurance that in due time a happy end should be put to the present troubles, ver. 6—15. III. We have his prayer, which he offered up to God upon that occasion, ver. 16—25. IV. We have a message, which God thereupon intrusted him to deliver to the people. 1. He must foretell the utter destruction of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, ver. 26—35; but, 2. At the same time he must assure them that, though the destruction was total, it should not be final; but at length their posterity should recover the peaceable possession of their own land, ver. 36—44. The predictions of this chapter, both threatenings and promises, are much the same with what we have already met with again and again; but here are some circumstances that are very particular and remarkable.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD in the tenth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, which was the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar. 2 For then the king of Babylon's army besieged Jerusalem: and Jeremiah the prophet was shut up in the court of the prison, which was in the king of Judah's house. 3 For Zedekiah king of Judah had shut him up, saying, Wherefore dost thou prophesy, and say, Thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall take it; 4 And Zedekiah king of Judah shall not escape out of the hand of the Chaldeans, but shall surely be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, and shall speak with him mouth to mouth, and his eyes shall behold his eyes; 5 And he shall lead Zedekiah to Babylon, and there shall he be until I visit him, saith the LORD: though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper. 6 And Jeremiah said, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 7 Behold, Hanameel the son of Shallum thine uncle shall come unto thee, saying, Buy thee my field that is in Anathoth: for the right of redemption is thine to buy it. 8 So Hanameel mine uncle's son came to me in the court of the prison according to the word of the LORD, and said unto me, Buy my field, I pray thee, that is in Anathoth, which is in the country of Benjamin: for the right of inheritance is thine, and the redemption is thine; buy it for thyself. Then I knew that this was the word of the LORD. 9 And I bought the field of Hanameel my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and weighed him the money, even seventeen shekels of silver. 10 And I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances. 11 So I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed according to the law and custom, and that which was open: 12 And I gave the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all the Jews that sat in the court of the prison. 13 And I charged Baruch before them, saying, 14 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days. 15 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land.

It appears by the date of this chapter, that we are now coming very nigh to the fatal year which completed the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, by the Chaldeans. God's judgments came gradually upon them, but, they not meeting him by repentance in the way of his judgments, he proceeded in his controversy till all was laid waste, which was in the eleventh year of Zedekiah; now what is here recorded happened in the tenth. The king of Babylon's army had now invested Jerusalem, and was carrying on the siege with vigour, not doubting but in a little time to make themselves masters of it; while the besieged had taken up a desperate resolution not to surrender, but to hold it out to the last extremity. Now,

First. Jeremiah prophesieth that both the city and the court shall fall into the hands of the king of Babylon. He tells them expressly that the besiegers should take the city as prize; for God, whose city it was in a peculiar manner, will give it into their hands, and put it out of his protection, ver. 3;—that, though Zedekiah attempt to make his escape, he shall be overtaken, and shall be delivered a prisoner into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar; shall be brought into his presence to his great confusion and terror, he having made himself so obnoxious by breaking his faith with him; he shall hear the king of Babylon pronounce his doom, and see with what fury and indignation he will look upon him, "his eyes shall behold his eyes," ver. 4;—that Zedekiah shall be carried to Babylon, and continue a miserable captive there, until God visit him, that is, till God put an end to his life by a natural death, as Nebuchadnezzar had long before put an end to his days by putting out his eyes. Note, Those that live in misery may be truly said to be visited in mercy, when God by death takes them home to himself. And, lastly, he foretells that all their attempts to force the besiegers from their trenches should be ineffectual; "Though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper." How should they, when God did not fight for them? ver. 5: see ch. xxxiv. 2, 3.

Secondly. For prophesying thus he is imprisoned, not in the common gaol, but in the more creditable prison, that was within the verge of the palace, "in the king of Judah's house," and there not closely confined, but in custodia libera, in the 'court of the prison,' where he might have good company, good air, and good intelligence brought him, and would be sheltered from the abuses of the mob; but, however, it was a prison, and Zedekiah shut him up in it for prophesying as he did, ver. 2, 3. So far was he from humbling himself before Jeremiah, as he ought to have done, (2 Chr. xxvi. 12,) that he hardened himself against him. Though he had formerly so far owned him to be a prophet as to desire him to inquire of the Lord for them, (ch. xxi. 2,) yet now he chides him for prophesying, ver. 3, and shuts him up in prison; perhaps not with design to punish him any farther, but only to restrain him from prophesying any farther, which was crime bad enough. Silencing God's prophets, though it is not so ill as mocking and killing them, yet is a great affront to the God of heaven. See how wretchedly the hearts of sinners are hardened by the deceitfulness of sin; persecution was one of the sins for which God was now contending with them, and yet Zedekiah persists in it, even now he was in the depth of distress. No providences, no afflictions, will of themselves part between men and their sins, unless the grace of God work with them. Nay, some are made worse by those very judgments that should make them better.

Thirdly. Being in prison, he purchaseth a piece of ground from a near relation of his, that lay in Anathoth, ver. 6, &c. One would not have expected, 1. That a prophet should concern himself so far in the business of this world; but why not? Though ministers must not entangle themselves, yet they may concern themselves in the affairs of this life. 2. That one who had neither wife nor children should buy land. We find (ch. xvi. 2) that he had no family of his own, yet he may purchase for his own use while he lives, and leave it to the children of his relations when he dies. 3. One would little have thought that a prisoner should be a purchaser; how should he get money beforehand to buy land with? It is probable he lived frugally, and saved something out of what belonged to him as a priest, which is no blemish at all to his character; but we have no reason to think that the people were kind, or that his being beforehand was owing to their generosity. Nay, 4. It was most strange of all that he should buy a piece of land, when he himself knew that the whole land was now to be laid waste, and fall into the hands of the Chaldeans, and then what good would this do him? But it was the will of God he should buy it, and he submitted, though the money seemed to be thrown away. His kinsman came to offer it him; it was not of his own seeking, he coveted not to lay house to house, and field to field, but providence brought it to him, and it is likely it was a good bargain. Besides, the right of redemption belonged to him, ver. 8, and if he refused, he did not do the kinsman's part. It is true he might lawfully refuse; but, being a prophet, in a thing of this nature he must do that which would be for the honour of his profession; it became him to fulfil all righteousness. It was land that lay within the suburbs of a priests' city, and if he should refuse it there was danger lest in these times of disorder it might be sold to one of another tribe, which was contrary to law; to prevent which it was convenient for him to buy it. It would likewise be a kindness to his kinsman, who probably was at this time in great want of money. Jeremiah had but a little, but what he had he was willing to lay out in such a manner as might tend most to the honour of God, and the good of his friends and country, which he preferred before his own private interests. Observe,

1st. How fairly the bargain was made. When Jeremiah knew, by Hanameel's coming to him, as God had foretold he would, that "it was the word of the Lord," that it was his mind he should make this purchase, he made no more difficulty of it, but bought the field. And, First. He was very honest and exact in paying the money. He "weighed him the money," did not press him to take it upon content, though he was his near kinsman, but weighed it to him, current money; it was "seventeen shekels of silver," amounting to about forty shillings of our money. It is likely it was but a little field, and of small yearly value, when the purchase was so low. Besides, the right of inheritance was in Jeremiah, so that he was only to buy out his kinsman's life, the reversion was his already. Some think this was only the earnest of a greater sum; but we shall not wonder at the smallness of the price, if we consider what scarcity there was of money at this time, and how little lands were counted upon. Secondly. He was very prudent and discreet in preserving the writings. They were subscribed before witnesses; one copy was sealed up, the other was open; one was the original, and the other the counterpart; or perhaps that which was sealed up was for his own private use, the other that was open was to be laid up in the public register of conveyances for any person concerned to consult. Due care and caution in things of this nature might prevent a great deal of injustice and contention. The deeds of purchase were lodged in the hands of Baruch, before witnesses, and he was ordered to lay them up in an earthen vessel, (an emblem of the nature of all the securities this world can pretend to give us, brittle things, and soon broken,) that they might continue many days, for the use of Jeremiah's heirs, after the return out of captivity; for they might then have the benefit of this purchase. Purchasing reversions may be a kindness to those that come after us; and a good man thus lays up an inheritance for his children's children.

2nd. What was the design of having this bargain made. It was to signify that, though Jerusalem was now besieged, and the whole country was likely to be laid waste, yet the time should come when "houses, and fields, and vineyards should again be possessed in this land," ver. 15. As God appointed Jeremiah to confirm his predictions of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, by his own practice in living unmarried, so he now appointed him to confirm his predictions of the future restoration of Jerusalem, by his own practice in purchasing this field. Note, It concerns ministers to make it to appear in their whole conversation that they do themselves believe that which they preach to others; and that they may do so, and impress it the deeper upon their hearers, they must many a time deny themselves, as Jeremiah did in both these instances. God having promised that this land should again come into the possession of his people, Jeremiah will, on the behalf of his heirs, put in for a share. Note, It is good to manage even our worldly affairs in faith, and to do common business with an eye to the providence and promise of God. Lucius Florus relates it as a great instance of the bravery of the Roman citizens, that in the time of the second Punic war, when Hannibal besieged Rome, and was very near making himself master of it, a field on which part of his army lay, being offered to sale at that time, was presently purchased, in a firm belief that the Roman valour would raise the siege, lib. 2, cap. 6. And have not we much more reason to venture our all upon the word of God, and to embark in Zion's interests, which will undoubtedly be the prevailing interests at last. Non si male nunc et olim sic erit,—'Though now we suffer, we shall not suffer always.'

16 Now when I had delivered the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, I prayed unto the LORD, saying, 17 Ah Lord GOD! behold, thou hast made the heaven and the earth by thy great power and stretched out arm, and there is nothing too hard for thee: 18 Thou shewest loving-kindness unto thousands, and recompensest the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children after them: the Great, the Mighty God, the LORD of hosts, is his name, 19 Great in counsel, and mighty in work: for thine eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men: to give every one according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings: 20 Which hast set signs and wonders in the land of Egypt, even unto this day, and in Israel, and among other men; and hast made thee a name, as at this day; 21 And hast brought forth thy people Israel out of the land of Egypt with signs, and with wonders, and with a strong hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with great terror; 22 And hast given them this land, which thou didst swear to their fathers to give them, a land flowing with milk and honey; 23 And they came in, and possessed it; but they obeyed not thy voice, neither walked in thy law; they have done nothing of all that thou commandedst them to do: therefore thou hast caused all this evil to come upon them: 24 Behold the mounts, they are come unto the city to take it; and the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans, that fight against it, because of the sword, and of the famine, and of the pestilence: and what thou hast spoken is come to pass; and, behold, thou seest it. 25 And thou hast said unto me, O Lord GOD, Buy thee the field for money, and take witnesses; for the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans.

We have here Jeremiah's prayer to God, upon occasion of the discoveries God had made to him of his purposes concerning this nation, to pull it down, and in process of time to build it up again, which puzzled the prophet himself, who, though he delivered his messages faithfully, yet in reflecting upon them was mightily at a loss within himself how to reconcile them; and in that perplexity he poured out his soul before God in prayer, and so gave himself ease. That which disturbed him was not the ill bargain he seemed to have made for himself, in purchasing a field that he was likely to have no good of, but the case of his people, for whom he was still a kind and faithful intercessor; and he was willing to hope that if God had so much mercy in store for them hereafter as he had promised, he would not proceed with so much severity against them now as he had threatened. Before Jeremiah went to prayer, he delivered the deeds that concerned his new purchase to Baruch, which may intimate to us, that when we are going to worship God we should get our minds as clear as may be from the cares and encumbrances of this world. Jeremiah was in prison, in distress, in the dark about the meaning of God's providences, and then he prays. Note, Prayer is a salve for every sore. Whatever is a burthen to us, we may by prayer cast it upon the Lord, and then be easy. In this prayer or meditation,

First. Jeremiah adores God and his infinite perfections, and gives him the glory due to his name as the Creator, upholder, and benefactor of the whole creation; thereby owning his irresistible power, that he can do what he will; and his incontestable sovereignty, that he may do what he will, ver. 17—19. Note, When at any time we are perplexed about the particular methods and dispensations of Providence, it is good for us to have recourse to our first principles, and to satisfy ourselves with the general doctrines of God's wisdom, power, and goodness. Let us consider as Jeremiah doth here, 1. That God is the fountain of all being, power, life, motion and perfection; he "made the heaven and the earth with his outstretched arm," and therefore who can control him? Who dares contend with him? 2. That with him nothing is impossible, no difficulty insuperable; "Nothing is too hard for thee," when human skill and power are quite nonplussed. "With God is strength and wisdom" sufficient to master all the opposition. 3. That he is a God of boundless, bottomless mercy. That is his darling attribute; it is his goodness that is his glory. Thou not only art kind, but shewest lovingkindness, not to a few, to here and there one, but to thousands, thousands of persons, thousands of generations. 4. That he is a God of impartial and inflexible justice. His reprieves are not pardons; but if in mercy he spares the parents that they may be led to repentance, yet such a hatred has he to sin, and such a displeasure against sinners, that he "recompenseth their iniquity into the bosom of their children," and yet doth them no wrong. So hateful is the unrighteousness of man, and so jealous of its own honour is the righteousness of God. 5. That he is a God of universal dominion and command. He is the great God, for he is the mighty God; and might among men makes them great. He is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts; that is his name, and he answers his name, for all the hosts of heaven and earth, of men and angels, are at his beck. 6. That he contrives every thing for the best, and effects every thing as he contrived it. He is great in counsel, so vast are the reaches, and so deep are the designs of his wisdom; and he is mighty in doing, according to the counsel of his will. Now, such a God as this is not to be quarrelled with. His service is to be constantly adhered to, and all his disposals cheerfully acquiesced in.

Secondly. He acknowledgeth the universal cognizance God takes of all the actions of the children of men, and the unerring judgment he passeth upon them; ver. 19, "Thine eyes are open upon all the sons of men," wherever they are, beholding the evil and the good; and upon all their ways, both the course they take and every step they take, not as an unconcerned spectator, but as an observing judge, "to give every one according to his ways, and according to" his deserts, which are "the fruit of his doings;" for men shall find God as they are found of him.

Thirdly. He recounts the great things God had done for his people Israel formerly. 1. He brought them out of Egypt, that house of bondage, with signs and wonders, which remain, if not in the marks of them, yet in the memorials of them, even unto this day; for it would never be forgotten, not only in Israel, who were minded of it every year by the ordinance of the passover, but among other men. All the neighbour nations spake of it, as that which redounded exceedingly to the glory of the God of Israel, and made him a name "as at this day." This is repeated again, ver. 21, that God brought them forth, not only with comforts and joys to them, but with glory to himself, with signs and wonders, (witness the ten plagues,) with a strong hand, too strong for the Egyptians themselves, and with a stretched-out arm, that reached Pharaoh, as proud as he was, and with great terror to them and all about them. This seems to refer to Deu. iv. 34. 2. He brought them into Canaan, that good land, that land flowing with milk and honey. He sware to their fathers to give it them; and, because he would perform his oath, he did give it to the children, ver. 22, and they came in and possessed it Jeremiah mentions this both as an aggravation of their sin and disobedience, and also as a plea with God to work deliverance for them. Note, It is good for us often to reflect upon the great things that God did for his church formerly, especially the first erecting of it, that work of wonder.

Fourthly. He bewails the rebellions they had been guilty of against God, and the judgments God had brought upon them for these rebellions. It is a sad account he here gives of the ungrateful carriage of that people towards God. He had done every thing that he had promised them to do, (they had acknowledged it, 1 Kin. viii. 56,) but they had "done nothing of all that he commanded them to do," ver. 23. They made no conscience of any of his laws, they walked not in them, paid no respect to any of his calls by his prophets, for they obeyed not his voice; and therefore he owns that God was righteous in causing "all this evil to come upon them." The city is besieged, is attacked by the sword without, is weakened and wasted by the famine and pestilence within, so that it is ready to fall "into the hand of the Chaldeans that fight against it," ver. 24; it is given into their hands, ver. 25. Now, 1. He compares the present state of Jerusalem with the Divine predictions, and finds that what God hath spoken is come to pass. God had given them fair warning of it before, which if they had regarded the ruin had been prevented; but if they will not do what God has commanded they can expect no other but that he should do what he has threatened. 2. He commits the present state of Jerusalem to the Divine consideration and compassion; ver. 24, "Behold the mounts," or ramparts, or the engines which they make use of to batter the city, and beat down the wall of it. And again, "Behold, thou seest it," and takest cognizance of it. Is this the city that thou hast chosen to put thy name there? and shall it be thus abandoned? He neither complains of God for what he had done nor prescribes to God what he should do, but desires he would behold their case, and is pleased to think that he doth behold it. Whatever trouble we are in upon a personal or public account, we may comfort ourselves with this, that God sees it, and sees how to remedy it.

Fifthly. He seems desirous to be let farther into the meaning of this order God had now given him to purchase his kinsman's field; ver. 25, Though "the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans," and no man is likely to enjoy what he has, yet "thou hast said unto me, Buy thee the field." As soon as he understood that it was the mind of God, he did it, and made no objections, was not disobedient to the heavenly vision; but when he had done it, he desired better to understand why God had ordered him to do it because the thing looked odd and unaccountable. Note, Though we are bound to follow God with an implicit obedience, yet we should endeavour that it may be more and more an intelligent obedience. We must never dispute God's statutes and judgments, but we may and must inquire, "What mean these statutes and judgments?" Deu. vi. 20.

26 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, 27 Behold, I am the LORD, the God of all flesh: is there any thing too hard for me? 28 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the Chaldeans, and into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and he shall take it: 29 And the Chaldeans, that fight against this city, shall come and set fire on this city, and burn it with the houses, upon whose roofs they have offered incense unto Baal, and poured out drink offerings unto other gods, to provoke me to anger.

POURING OUT A DRINK OFFERING.

30 For the children of Israel and the children of Judah have only done evil before me from their youth: for the children of Israel have only provoked me to anger with the work of their hands, saith the LORD. 31 For this city hath been to me as a provocation of mine anger and of my fury from the day that they built it even unto this day; that I should remove it from before my face, 32 Because of all the evil of the children of Israel and of the children of Judah, which they have done to provoke me to anger, they, their kings, their princes, their priests, and their prophets, and the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. 33 And they have turned unto me the back, and not the face: though I taught them, rising up early and teaching them, yet they have not hearkened to receive instruction. 34 But they set their abominations in the house, which is called by my name, to defile it. 35 And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin. 36 And now therefore thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, concerning this city, whereof ye say, It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence; 37 Behold, I will gather them out of all countries, whither I have driven them in mine anger, and in my fury, and in great wrath; and I will bring them again unto this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely: 38 And they shall be my people, and I will be their God: 39 And I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear me for ever, for the good of them, and of their children after them: 40 And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. 41 Yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart and with my whole soul. 42 For thus saith the LORD; Like as I have brought all this great evil upon this people, so will I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them. 43 And fields shall be bought in this land, whereof ye say, It is desolate without man or beast; it is given into the hand of the Chaldeans. 44 Men shall buy fields for money, and subscribe evidences, and seal them, and take witnesses in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, and in the cities of the mountains, and in the cities of the valley, and in the cities of the south: for I will cause their captivity to return, saith the LORD.

We have here God's return to Jeremiah's prayer, designed to quiet his mind and make him easy, and it is a full discovery of the purposes of God's wrath against the present generation, and the purposes of his grace concerning the future generations. Jeremiah knew not how to sing both of mercy and judgment; but God here teacheth him, and to sing unto him of both. When we know not how to reconcile one word of God with another, yet we may be sure that both are true, both are pure, both shall be made good, and not one iota or tittle of either shall fall to the ground. When Jeremiah was ordered to buy the field in Anathoth, he was willing to hope that God was about to revoke the sentence of his wrath, and to order the Chaldeans to raise the siege; No, saith God, the execution of the sentence shall go on, Jerusalem shall be laid in ruins. Note, Assurances of future mercy must not be interpreted as securities from present troubles. But, lest Jeremiah should think that his being ordered to buy this field intimated that all the mercy God had in store for his people after their return was only that they should have the possession of their own land again, he farther acquaints him that that was but a type and figure of those spiritual blessings which should then be abundantly bestowed upon them, unspeakably more valuable than fields and vineyards. So that in this word of the Lord which came here to Jeremiah we have first as dreadful threatenings, and then as precious promises, as perhaps any we have in all the Old Testament. Life and death, good and evil, are here set before us; let us consider and choose wisely.

First. The ruin of Judah and Jerusalem is here pronounced; the decree is gone forth, and shall not be recalled.

1. God here asserts his own sovereignty and power; ver. 27, "Behold, I am Jehovah," a self-existent, self-sufficient being; "I am that I am, I am the God of all flesh;" that is, of all mankind, here called flesh, because weak and unable to contend with God, Ps. lvi. 4, and because wicked and corrupt, and unapt to comply with God. God is the Creator of all, and makes what use he pleaseth of all. He that is the God of Israel is the God of all flesh, and of the spirits of all flesh; and, if Israel were cast off, could raise up a people to his name out of some other nation. If he be the God of all flesh, he may well ask, "Is any thing too hard for me?" What cannot he do from whom all the powers of men are derived, and on whom they depend, and by whom all their actions are directed and governed? Whatever he designs to do, whether in wrath or in mercy, nothing can hinder him, or defeat his designs.

2. He abides by what he had often said of the destruction of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon; ver. 28, "I will give this city into his hand," now he is grasping at it, "and he shall take it," and make a prey of it; ver. 29, "The Chaldeans shall come and set fire to it," shall burn it and all the houses in it, God's house not excepted, nor the king's neither.

3. He assigns the reason for these severe proceedings against the city that had been so much in his favour. It is sin, it is that and nothing else, that ruins it. 1st. They were impudent and daring in sin. They offered incense to Baal, not in corners, as men ashamed or afraid of being discovered, but upon the tops of their houses, ver. 29, in defiance of God's justice. 2nd. They designed an affront to God herein. They did it "to provoke me to anger," ver. 29. "They have only provoked me to anger with the work of their hands," ver. 30; they could not promise themselves any pleasure, profit, or honour out of it, but did it on purpose to offend God. And again, ver. 32, "All the evil which they have done was to provoke me to anger." They knew he was a jealous God in the matters of his worship, and there they resolved to try his jealousy, and dare him to his face. Jerusalem has been "to me a provocation of my anger and fury," ver. 31. Their carriage in every thing was provoking. 3rd. They began by times, and had continued all along provoking to God. They have "done evil before me from their youth," ever since they were first formed into a people, ver. 30; witness their murmurings and rebellions in the wilderness. And as for Jerusalem, though it was the holy city, it has been a provocation to the holy God "from the day that they built it, even to this day," ver. 32. O what reason have we to lament the little honour God has from this world, and the great dishonour that is done him, when even in Judah, where he is known, and his name is great, and in Salem where his tabernacle is, there was always that found that was a provocation to him. 4th. All orders and degrees of men contributed to the common guilt, and therefore were justly involved in the common ruin; not only the children of Israel that had revolted from the temple, but the children of Judah too, that still adhered to it. Not only the common people, the men of Judah, and inhabitants of Jerusalem, but those that should have reproved and restrained sin in others, were themselves ringleaders in it,—their kings and princes, their priests and prophets. 5th. God had again and again called them to repentance, but they turned a deaf ear to his calls, and rudely turned their back on him that called them, though he was their master to whom they were bound in duty, and their benefactor to whom they were bound in gratitude and interest; ver. 33, "I taught them" better manners, with as much care as ever any tender parent taught a child, "rising up early, and teaching them," studying to adapt the teaching to their capacities, taking them betimes, when they might have been most pliable, but all in vain; they "turned not the face to me," would not so much as look upon me; nay, they "turned the back upon me," an expression of the highest contempt. "As he called them," like froward children, "so they went from him," Hos. xi. 2. "They have not hearkened to receive instruction;" they regarded not a word that was said to them, though it was designed for their own good. 6th. There was in their idolatries an impious contempt of God; for, ver. 34, "They set their abominations," their idols, which they knew to be in the highest degree abominable to God, they set them "in the house which is called by my name, to defile it." They had their idols not only in their high places and groves, but even in God's temple. 7th. They were guilty of the most unnatural cruelty to their children, for they "sacrificed them to Moloch," ver. 35. Thus, because they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, but changed his glory into shame, they were justly given up to vile affections, and stripped of natural ones, and their glory was turned into shame. 8th. What was the consequence of all this? First. They "caused Judah to sin," ver. 35. The whole country was infected with the contagious idolatries and iniquities of Jerusalem. Secondly. They brought ruin upon themselves. It was as if they had done it on purpose that God "should remove them from before his face," ver. 31; they would throw themselves out of his favour.

Secondly. The restoration of Judah and Jerusalem is here promised, ver. 36, &c. God will in judgment remember mercy, and there will a time come, a set time to favour Zion. Observe, 1st. The despair to which this people were now at length brought. When the judgment was threatened at a distance, they had no fear; when it attacked them, they had no hope. They said concerning the city, ver. 36, "It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon," not by any cowardice or ill conduct of ours, but by "the sword, famine, and pestilence." Concerning the country, they said with vexation, ver. 43, "It is desolate without man or beast;" there is no relief, there is no remedy; "it is given into the hand of the Chaldeans." Note, Deep security commonly ends in deep despair; whereas those that keep up a holy fear at all times have a good hope to support themselves in the worst of times. 2nd. The hope that God gives them of mercy he had in store for them hereafter. Though their carcases must fall in captivity, yet their children after them should again see this good land, and the goodness of God in it.

1. They shall be brought up from their captivity, and shall come and settle again in this land, ver. 37. They had been under God's anger, and fury, and great wrath, but now they shall partake of his grace, and love, and great favour. He had dispersed them, and driven them into all countries: those that fled dispersed themselves, those that fell into the enemies' hands were dispersed by them in policy, to prevent combinations among them. God's hand was in both. But now God will find them out, and gather them out of all the "countries whither they were driven," as he promised in the law, Deu. xxx. 3, 4; and the saints had prayed, Ps. cvi. 47; Neh. i. 9. He had banished them, but he will bring them again to this place, which they could not but have an affection for. For many years past, while they were in their own land, they were continually exposed, and terrified with the alarms of war; but now "I will cause them to dwell safely." Being reformed and returned to God, neither their own consciences within nor their enemies without shall be a terror to them. He promiseth, ver. 41, "I will plant them in this land assuredly;" not only I will certainly do it, but they shall here enjoy a holy security and repose, and they shall take root here, shall be planted in stability, and not again be unfixed and shaken.

2. God will renew his covenant with them, a covenant of grace, the blessings of which are spiritual, and such as will work good things in them, to qualify them for the great things God intended to do for them. It is called an everlasting covenant, ver. 40, not only because God will be for ever faithful to it, but because the consequences of it will be everlasting: for, doubtless, here the promises look farther than to Israel according to the flesh, and are sure to all believers, to every Israelite indeed. Good Christians may apply them to themselves, and plead them with God, may claim the benefit, and take the comfort of them.

1st. God will own them for his, and make over himself to them to be theirs; ver. 38, "They shall be my people." He will make them his, by working in them all the characters and dispositions of his people, and then he will protect, and guide, and govern them as his people. And to make them truly, completely, and eternally happy, "I will be their God." They shall serve and worship God as theirs, and cleave to him only; and he will approve himself theirs. All he is, all he has, shall be engaged and employed for their good.

2nd. God will give them a heart to fear him, ver. 39. That which he requires of those whom he takes into covenant with him as his people is, that they fear him, that they reverence his majesty, dread his wrath, stand in awe of his authority, pay homage to him, and give him the glory due unto his name. Now what God requires of them he here promiseth to work in them, pursuant to his choice of them as his people. Note, As it is God's prerogative to fashion men's hearts, so it is his promise to his people to fashion theirs aright. And a heart to fear God is indeed a good heart and well fashioned. It is repeated again, ver. 40, "I will put my fear in their hearts;" that is, work in them gracious principles and dispositions, that shall influence and govern their whole conversation. Teachers may put good things into our heads, but it is God only that can put them into our hearts; that can work in us both to will and to do.

3rd. He "will give them one heart and one way." In order to their walking in one way, he will give them one heart. As the heart is so will the way be, and both shall be one; that is, First. They shall be each of them one with themselves. One heart is the same with a new heart, Eze. xi. 19. The heart is then one when it is fully determined for God, and entirely devoted to God; when the eye is single, and God's glory is alone aimed at. When our hearts are fixed, trusting in God, and we are uniform and universal in our obedience to him, then the heart is one, and the way one; and unless the heart be thus steady the goings will not be stedfast. From this promise we may take direction and encouragement to pray with David, Ps. lxxxvi. 11, "Unite my heart to fear thy name;" for God saith, "I will give them one heart, that they may fear me." Secondly. They shall be all of them one with each other. All good Christians shall be incorporated into one body, Jews and Gentiles shall become one sheepfold; and they shall all, as far as they are sanctified, have a disposition to love one another; the Gospel they profess having in it the strongest inducements to mutual love, and the Spirit that dwells in them being the Spirit of love. Though they may have different apprehensions about lesser things, they shall be all one in the great things of God, being renewed after the same image. Though they may have many paths, they have but one way, that of serious godliness.

4th. He will effectually provide for their perseverance in grace, and the perpetuating of the covenant between him and them. They had been happy when they were first planted in Canaan, like Adam in Paradise, if they had not departed from God; and therefore, now they are restored to their happiness, they shall be confirmed in it, by the preventing of their departures from God. And this will complete their bliss, First. God will never leave nor forsake them, "I will not turn away from them to do them good." Earthly princes are fickle, and their greatest favourites have fallen under their frowns; but God's mercy endureth for ever; whom he loves, he loves to the end. God may seem to turn from his people, (Isa. liv. 8,) but even then he doth not turn from doing and designing them good. Secondly. They shall never leave nor forsake him. That is the thing we are in danger of; we have no reason to distrust God's fidelity and constancy, but our own. And therefore it is here promised, that God will give them a heart to fear him for ever,—all days; to be in his fear every day, and all the day long, (Pr. xxiii. 17,) and to continue so to the end of their days. He will put such a principle into their hearts as that they shall not depart from him. Even those who have given up their names to God, if they be left to themselves, will depart from him; but the fear of God ruling in the heart will prevent their departure; that and nothing else will do it. If we continue close and faithful to God, it is owing purely to his almighty grace, and not to any strength or resolution of our own.

5th. He will entail a blessing upon their seed, will give them grace to fear him, "for the good of them, and of their children after them." As their departures from God had been to the prejudice of their children, so their adherence to God should be to the advantage of their children. We cannot better consult the good of posterity, than by setting up, and keeping up, the fear and worship of God in our families.

6th. He will take a pleasure in their prosperity, and will do everything to advance it; ver. 41, "I will rejoice over them to do them good." God will therefore do them good because he rejoiceth over them; they are dear to him, he makes his boast of them, and therefore will not only do them good, but will delight in doing them good. When he punisheth them it is with reluctancy: "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" But when he restores them it is with satisfaction: he rejoiceth in doing them good. We ought therefore to serve him with pleasure, and to rejoice in all opportunities of serving him. He is himself a cheerful giver, and therefore loves a cheerful servant, "I will plant them," saith God, "with my whole heart, and with my whole soul." He will be intent upon it, and take delight in it; he will make it the business of his providence to settle them in Canaan, and the various dispensations of providence shall concur to it. All things shall appear at last so to have been working for the good of the church, that it will be said, the Governor of the world was entirely taken up with the care of his church.

7th. These promises shall as surely be performed as the foregoing threatenings were; and the accomplishment of those, notwithstanding the security of the people, might confirm their expectation of the performance of these, notwithstanding their present despair; ver. 42, "As I have brought all this great evil upon them," pursuant to the threatenings, and for the glory of Divine justice, "so I will bring upon them all this good," pursuant to the promise, and for the glory of Divine mercy. He that is faithful to his threatening will much more be so to his promises; and he will comfort his people "according to the time that he has afflicted them." The churches shall have rest after the days of adversity.

8th. As an earnest of all this, houses and lands shall again take a good price in Judah and Jerusalem; and, though now they are a drug, there shall again be purchasers enough for them; ver. 43, 44, "Fields shall be bought in this land," and people will covet to have lands here rather than anywhere else. Lands wherever they lie will go off, not only in the places about Jerusalem, but in the cities of Judah and of Israel too, whether they lie on mountains, or in valleys, or in the south; in all parts of the country men shall buy fields and subscribe evidences. Trade shall revive, for they shall have money enough to buy land with; husbandry shall revive, for those that have money shall covet to lay it out upon lands; laws shall again have their due course, for they shall subscribe evidences and seal them. This is mentioned to reconcile Jeremiah to his new purchase; though he had bought a piece of ground, and could not go see it, yet he must believe that was the pledge of many a purchase, and those but faint resemblances of the purchased possessions in the heavenly Canaan reserved for all those who have God's fear in their hearts, and do not depart from him.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, to confirm the promise of the restoration of the Jews, notwithstanding the present desolations of their country, and dispersions of their people. And these promises have both in type and tendency a reference as far forward as to the gospel church, to which this second edition of the Jewish church was at length to resign its dignities and privileges. It is here promised, I. That the city shall be rebuilt, and re-established in statu quo—'in its former state,' ver. 1—6. II. That the captives, having their sins pardoned, shall be restored, ver. 7, 8. III. That this shall redound very much to the glory of God, ver. 9. IV. That the country shall have both joy and plenty, ver. 10—14. V. That way shall be made for the coming of the Messiah, ver. 15, 16. VI. That the house of David, the house of Levi, and the house of Israel shall flourish again, and be established, and all three in the kingdom of Christ, a gospel ministry; and the gospel church shall continue while the world stands, ver. 17—26.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the second time, while he was yet shut up in the court of the prison, saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD the maker thereof,
The LORD that formed it, to establish it;
The LORD is his name;
3 Call unto me, and I will answer thee,
And shew thee great and mighty things,
Which thou knowest not.
4 For thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel,
Concerning the houses of this city,
And concerning the houses of the kings of Judah,
Which are thrown down by the mounts, and by the sword;
5 They come to fight with the Chaldeans,
But it is to fill them with the dead bodies of men,
Whom I have slain in mine anger and in my fury,
And for all whose wickedness
I have hid my face from this city. [them,
6 Behold, I will bring it health and cure, and I will cure
And will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth.
7 And I will cause the captivity of Judah
And the captivity of Israel to return,
And will build them, as at the first.
8 And I will cleanse them from all their iniquity,
Whereby they have sinned against me;
And I will pardon all their iniquities,
Whereby they have sinned,
And whereby they have transgressed against me.
9 And it shall be to me a name of joy,
A praise and an honour before all the nations of the earth,
Which shall hear all the good that I do unto them:
And they shall fear and tremble for all the goodness
And for all the prosperity that I procure unto it.

Observe here, First. The date of this comfortable prophecy which God intrusted Jeremiah with. It is not exact in the time, only that it was after that in the foregoing chapter, when things were still growing worse and worse; it was the second time. God speaketh once, yea, twice, for the encouragement of his people. We are not only so disobedient that we have need of precept upon precept to bring us to our duty, but so distrustful that we have need of promise upon promise to bring us to our comfort. This word, as the former, came to Jeremiah when he was in prison. Note, No confinement can deprive God's people of his presence, no locks or bars can shut out his gracious visits. Nay, oftentimes "as their afflictions abound, their consolations much more abound," and they have the most reviving communications of his favour then when the world frowns upon them. Paul's sweetest epistles were those that bare date out of a prison.

Secondly. The prophecy itself. A great deal of comfort is wrapped up in it, for the relief of the captives, to keep them from sinking into despair. Observe,

1. Who it is that secures this comfort to them, ver. 2. It is "the Lord the maker thereof, the Lord that framed it." He is the maker and former of heaven and earth, and therefore has all power in his hands: so it refers to Jeremiah's prayer, ch. xxxii. 17. He is the maker and former of Jerusalem, of Zion; built them at first, and therefore can rebuild them; built them for his own praise, and therefore will. He formed it to establish it, and therefore it shall be established till those things be introduced which cannot be shaken, but shall remain for ever. He is the maker and former of this promise; he has laid the scheme for Jerusalem's restoration, and he that has formed it will establish it, that has made the promise will make it good, for Jehovah is his name,—a God giving being to his promises by the performance of them, which when he doth he is known by that name, Ex. vi. 3; a perfecting God. When the heavens and the earth were finished, then and not till then, the Creator is called Jehovah, Gen. ii. 1.

2. How this comfort must be obtained and fetched in. By prayer; ver. 3, "Call upon me, and I will answer thee." The prophet having received some intimations of this kind, must be humbly earnest with God for farther discoveries of his kind intentions. He had prayed, ch. xxxii. 16, but he must pray again. Note, Those that expect to receive comforts from God must "continue instant in prayer;" we must call upon him, and then he will answer us. Christ himself must ask, and it shall be given him, Ps. ii. 8. "I will shew thee great and mighty things," that is, give thee a clear and full prospect of them; hidden things, which, though in part discovered already, yet thou knowest not, thou canst not understand or give credit to. Or, this may refer not only to the prediction of these things which Jeremiah, if he desire it, shall be favoured with, but to the performance of the things themselves, which the people of God, encouraged by this prediction, must pray for. Note, Promises are given not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage prayer: see Eze. xxxvi. 37.

3. How deplorable the condition of Jerusalem was, which made it necessary that such comforts as these should be provided for it; and notwithstanding which its restoration should be brought about in due time, ver. 4, 5. "The houses of this city," not excepting those of "the kings of Judah, are thrown down by the mounts," or engines of battery, and by the sword, or axes, or hammers. It is the same word that is used Eze. xxvi. 9, "With his axes he shall break down thy towers." The strongest, stateliest houses, and those that were best furnished, were levelled with the ground. The fifth verse comes in in a parenthesis, giving a farther instance of the present calamitous state of Jerusalem. They that came to fight with the Chaldeans, to beat them off from the siege, did more hurt than good, provoked the enemy to be more fierce and furious in their assaults, so that the houses in Jerusalem were filled with the dead bodies of men that died of the wounds they received in sallying out upon the besiegers. God saith, they were such as he had slain in his anger, for the enemies' sword was his sword, and their anger his anger. But it seems the men that were slain were generally such as had distinguished themselves by their wickedness, for they were the very men for whose wickedness God did now hide himself from this city, so that he was just in all he brought upon them.

4. What the blessings are which God has in store for Judah and Jerusalem; such as will redress all their grievances.

1st. Is their state diseased? is it wounded? God will provide effectually for the healing of it, though the disease was thought mortal and incurable, ch. viii. 22. "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint;" but, ver. 6, I will bring it health and cure, I will prevent the death, remove the sickness, and set all to rights again, ch. xxx. 17. Note, Be the case never so desperate, if God undertake the cure he will effect it. The sin of Jerusalem was the sickness of it, Isa. i. 6; its reformation therefore will be its recovery. And the following words tell us how that is wrought: "I will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth," that is, I will give it them in due time, and give them an encouraging prospect of it in the meantime. Peace stands here for all good; peace and truth is peace according to the promise, and in pursuance of that. Or, peace and truth is peace and the true religion; peace and the true worship of God, in opposition to the many falsehoods and deceits by which they had been led away from God. We may apply it more generally, and observe, First. That peace and truth are the great subject matter of Divine revelation. These promises here lead us to the Gospel of Christ, and in that God has revealed to us peace and truth, the method of true peace; truth to direct us, peace to make us easy. Grace and truth, and abundance of both, come by Jesus Christ. Peace and truth are the life of the soul, and Christ came that we might have that life, and might have it more abundantly. Christ rules by the power of truth, Jno. xviii. 37, and by it he gives abundance of peace, Ps. lxxii. 7, and lxxxv. 10. Secondly. That the Divine revelation of peace and truth brings health and cure to all those that by faith receive it. It heals the soul of the diseases it has contracted, as it is a means of sanctification, Jno. xvii. 17, ("He sent his word and healed them," Ps. cvii. 20;) and it puts the soul into good order, and keeps it in frame, and fit for the employments and enjoyments of the spiritual and Divine life.

2nd. Are they scattered and enslaved, and is their nation laid in ruins? "I will cause their captivity to return," ver. 7, both that of Israel and that of Judah; for, though those who returned under Zerubbabel were chiefly of Judah, and Benjamin, and Levi, yet afterwards many of all the other tribes returned. And I will rebuild them, as I built them at first. When they by repentance do their first works, God will by their restoration do his first works.

3rd. Is sin the procuring cause of all their troubles? That shall be pardoned and subdued, and so the root of the judgments shall be killed, ver. 8. First. By sin they are become filthy, and odious to God's holiness; but God will cleanse them, and purify them from their iniquity. As those that were ceremonially unclean, and were therefore shut out from the tabernacle, when they were sprinkled with the water of purification, had liberty of access to it again, so had they to their own land and the privileges of it, when God had cleansed them from their iniquities. In allusion to that sprinkling, David prays, "Purge me with hyssop." Secondly. By sin they are become guilty, and obnoxious to his justice; but he "will pardon all their iniquities," will remove the punishment to which for sin they were bound over. All that by sanctifying grace are cleansed from the filth of sin, by pardoning mercy are freed from the guilt of it.

4th. Have both their sins and their sufferings turned to the dishonour of God? Their reformation and restoration shall redound as much to his praise, ver. 9. Jerusalem thus rebuilt, Judah thus repeopled, shall be to me a name of joy, as pleasing to God as ever they had been provoking, and "a praise and an honour before all the nations." They, being thus restored, shall glorify God by their services of him, and he shall glorify himself by his favours to them. This renewed nation shall be as much a reputation to religion as formerly it has been a reproach to it. The nations shall hear of all the good that God has wrought in them by his grace, and of all the good he has wrought for them by his providence. The wonders of their return out of Babylon shall make as great a noise in the world as ever the wonders of their deliverance out of Egypt did. And "they shall fear and tremble for all this goodness." First. The people of God themselves shall fear and tremble; they shall be much surprised at it, shall be afraid of offending so good a God, and of forfeiting his favour; Hos. iii. 5, "They shall fear the Lord and his goodness." Secondly. The neighbour nations shall fear because of the prosperity of Jerusalem; shall look upon the growing greatness of the Jewish nation as really formidable, and shall be afraid of making them their enemies. When the church is "fair as the moon, and clear as the sun," she is "terrible as an army with banners."

10 Thus saith the LORD;
Again there shall be heard in this place, [beast,
Which ye say shall be desolate without man and without Even in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusa-
That are desolate, without man, [lem,
And without inhabitant, and without beast,
11 The voice of joy, and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride,
The voice of them that shall say, Praise the LORD of hosts:
For the LORD is good;
For his mercy endureth for ever:
And of them that shall bring the sacrifice of praise into the house of the LORD.
For I will cause to return the captivity of the land,
As at the first, saith the LORD.
12 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Again in this place, which is desolate
Without man and without beast,
And in all the cities thereof,
Shall be an habitation of shepherds
Causing their flocks to lie down.
13 In the cities of the mountains, in the cities of the vale,
And in the cities of the south, and in the land of Benjamin,
And in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Shall the flocks pass again [Judah,
Under the hands of him that telleth them, saith the LORD.

14 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD, [mised
That I will perform that good thing which I have pro-
Unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah,
15 In those days, and at that time,
Will I cause the Branch of righteousness to grow up unto David; [land.
And he shall execute judgment and righteousness in the 16 In those days shall Judah be saved,
And Jerusalem shall dwell safely:
And this is the name wherewith she shall be called,
The LORD our righteousness.

STEWARD NUMBERING THE HERDS.—ver. 13.

Here is a farther prediction of the happy state of Judah and Jerusalem after their glorious return out of captivity, issuing gloriously at length in the kingdom of the Messiah.

First. It is promised that the people that were long in sorrow shall again be filled with joy. Every one concluded now that the country would lie for ever desolate, that no beasts should be found in the land of Judah, no inhabitants in the streets of Jerusalem; and, consequently, there would be nothing but an universal and perpetual melancholy, ver. 10. But though weeping may endure for a time, joy will return. It was threatened, ch. vii. 34, and xvi. 9, that the voice of joy and gladness should cease there; but here it is promised that they shall revive again, that the voice of joy and gladness shall be heard there, because the captivity shall be returned, for then was their mouth filled with laughter, Ps. cxxvi. 1, 2. 1. There shall be common joy there, "the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride." Marriages shall again be celebrated as formerly with songs, which in Babylon they had laid aside; for their harps were hung on the willow trees. 2. There shall be religious joy there; temple songs shall be revived, the Lord's songs, which they could not sing in a strange land. There shall be heard in their private houses, and in the cities of Judah, as well as in the temple, "the voice of them that shall say, Praise the Lord of hosts." Note, Nothing is more the praise and honour of a people than to have God praised and honoured amongst them. This shall complete the mercy of their return and restoration, that with it they shall have hearts to be thankful for it, and give God the glory of it, the glory both of the power and of the goodness by which it is effected; they shall praise him, both as the Lord of hosts and as the God who is good, and whose "mercy endureth for ever." This, though a song of old, yet, being sung upon this fresh occasion, will be a new song. We find this literally fulfilled at their return out of Babylon, Ezr. iii. 11. They sung together in praising the Lord, "because he is good, for his mercy endures for ever." The public worship of God shall be diligently and constantly attended upon: they "shall bring the sacrifice of praise to the house of the Lord." All the sacrifices were intended for the praise of God; but this seems to be meant of the spiritual sacrifices of humble adorations, and joyful thanksgivings, "the calves of our lips," Hos. xiv. 2; which shall "please the Lord better than an ox or bullock." The Jews say, that in the days of the Messiah all sacrifices shall cease, but the sacrifice of praise; and to those days this promise has a farther reference.

Secondly. It is promised that the country, which had lain long depopulated, should be replenished and stocked again. It was now desolate, without man, and without beast; but after their return the pastures shall again be clothed with flocks, Ps. lxv. 13. In "all the cities of Judah and Benjamin there shall be an habitation of shepherds," ver. 12, 13. This speaks, 1. The wealth of the country after their return. It shall not be a habitation of beggars, that have nothing; but of shepherds and husbandmen, men of substance, with good stocks upon the ground they are returned to. 2. The peace of the country. It shall not be a habitation of soldiers, nor shall there be tents and barracks set up to lodge them, but they shall be shepherds' tents; for they shall hear no more the alarms of war, nor shall there be any to make even the shepherds afraid: see Ps. cxliv. 13, 14. 3. The industry of the country, and their return to their original plainness and simplicity, from which in the corrupt ages they had sadly degenerated. The seed of Jacob in their beginning gloried in this, that they were shepherds, Gen. xlvii. 3; and so they shall now be again, giving themselves wholly to that innocent employment; "causing their flocks to lie down," ver. 12, and to "pass under the hands of him that telleth them," ver. 13. For, though their flocks are numerous, they are not numberless, nor shall they omit to number them, that they may know if any be missing, and may seek after it. Note, It is the prudence of those who have never so much of the world to keep an account of what they have. Some think they "pass under the hand of him that telleth them," that they may be tithed, Lev. xxvii. 32. Then we may take the comfort of what we have when God has had his due out of it. Now, because it seemed incredible that a people reduced as they now were should ever recover such a degree of peace and plenty as this, here is subjoined a general ratification of these promises; ver. 14, "I will perform that good thing which I have promised." Though the promise may sometimes work slowly towards an accomplishment, it works surely. "The days will come," though they are long in coming.

Thirdly. To crown all these blessings which God has in store for them, here is a promise of the Messiah, and of that everlasting righteousness which he should bring in, ver. 15, 16. And probably this is that good thing, that great good thing, which in the latter days, days that were yet to come, God would perform, as he had promised, to Judah and Israel, and which their return out of captivity, and their settlement again in their own land, was in order to. From the captivity to Christ is one of the famous periods, Mat. i. 17. This promise of the Messiah we had before, ch. xxiii. 5, 6; and there it came in as a confirmation of the promise of the shepherds which God would set over them; which would make one think that the promise here concerning the shepherds and their flocks, which introduceth it, is to be understood figuratively. Christ is here prophesied of, 1. As a rightful King. He is a "Branch of righteousness," not an usurper; for he grows up unto David, descends from his loins, with whom the covenant of royalty was made, and is that seed with whom that covenant should be established, so that his title is unexceptionable. 2. As a righteous King. Righteous in enacting laws, waging wars, and giving judgment, righteous in vindicating those that suffer wrong, and punishing those that do wrong; "He shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land." This may point at Zerubbabel in the type, who governed with equity, not as Jehoiakim had done, ch. xxii. 17; but it has a farther reference to him to whom all judgment is committed, and who shall judge the world in righteousness. 3. As a King that shall protect his subjects from all injury. By him Judah shall be saved from wrath and the curse; and, being so saved, Jerusalem shall dwell safely, quiet from the fear of evil, and enjoying a holy security and serenity of mind, in a dependence upon the conduct of this Prince of peace, this Prince of their peace. 4. As a King that shall be praised by his subjects. "This is the name whereby they shall call him," so the Chaldee reads it, the Syriac, and vulgar Latin; this name of his they shall celebrate, and triumph in, and by this name they shall call upon him. It may be read, more agreeably to the original, 'This is he who shall call her, the Lord our righteousness;' as Moses' altar is called Jehovah Nisse, Ex. xvii. 15; and Jerusalem, Jehovah Shammah, Eze. xlviii. 35; intimating that they glory in Jehovah, as present with them, and their banner. So here the city is called, "The Lord our righteousness," because they glory in Jehovah as their righteousness. That which was before said to be the name of Christ (saith Mr. Gataker) is here made the name of Jerusalem, the city of the Messias, the church of Christ. He it is that imparts righteousness to her, for he is made of God to us righteousness; and she by bearing that name professeth to have her whole righteousness, not from herself, but from him; "In the Lord have I righteousness and strength," Isa. xlv. 24; and we are "made the righteousness of God in him." The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall have this name of the Messias so much in their mouths that they shall themselves be called by it.

17 For thus saith the LORD;
David shall never want a man
To sit upon the throne of the house of Israel;
18 Neither shall the priests the Levites want a man before me
To offer burnt offerings, and to kindle meat offerings,
And to do sacrifice continually.
19 And the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah, saying,
20 Thus saith the LORD;
If ye can break my covenant of the day,
And my covenant of the night, [season;
And that there should not be day and night in their 21 Then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant,
That he should not have a son to reign upon his throne;
And with the Levites the priests, my ministers.
22 As the host of heaven cannot be numbered,
Neither the sand of the sea measured:
So will I multiply the seed of David my servant,
And the Levites that minister unto me.
23 Moreover the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, saying,
24 Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying,
The two families which the LORD hath chosen, [ing,
He hath even cast them off?
Thus they have despised my people,
That they should be no more a nation before them.
25 Thus saith the LORD;
If my covenant be not with day and night,
And if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; [servant,
26 Then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my
So that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers
Over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob:
For I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them.

Three of God's covenants, that of royalty with David and his seed, that of the priesthood with Aaron and his seed, and that of peculiarity with Abraham and his seed, seemed to have been all broken and lost while the captivity lasted; but it is here promised that, notwithstanding that interruption and discontinuance for a time, they shall all three take place again; and the true intents and meaning of them all shall be abundantly answered in the New Testament blessings, typified by those conferred on the Jews after their return out of captivity.

First. The covenant of royalty shall be secured, and the promises of it shall have their full accomplishment in the kingdom of Christ, the Son of David, ver. 17. The throne of Israel was overturned in the captivity, the crown was fallen from their head, there was not a man to sit on the throne of Israel,—Jeconiah was written childless. After their return the house of David made a figure again. But it is in the Messiah that this promise is performed, that "David shall never want a man to sit on the throne of Israel;" and that David shall have always a son to reign upon his throne. For as long as the man Christ Jesus sits on the right hand of the throne of God, rules the world, and rules it for the good of the church, to which he is a quickening Head, and glorified Head over all things; as long as he is King upon the holy hill of Zion, David doth not want a successor, nor is the covenant with him broken. When the first-begotten was brought into the world, it was declared concerning him, that "the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever," Lu. i. 32, 33.

For the confirmation of this it is promised, 1. That the covenant with David shall be as firm as the ordinances of heaven, to the stability of which that of God's promise is compared, ch. xxxi. 35, 36. There is a covenant of nature, by which the common course of providence is settled, and on which it is founded, here called a covenant of the day and the night, ver. 20, 25; because that is one of the articles of it, that there shall be day and night in their season, according to the distinction put between them in the creation, when God divided between the light and the darkness, and established their mutual succession, and a government to each, that the sun should rule by day, and the moon and the stars by night, Gen. i. 4, 5, 16; which establishment was renewed after the flood, Gen. viii. 22, and has continued ever since, Ps. xix. 2; the morning and the evening have both of them their regular outgoings, Ps. lxv. 8. The day-spring knows its place, knows its time, and keeps both; so do the shadows of the evening; and while the world stands, this course shall not be altered, this covenant shall not be broken. The ordinances of heaven and earth, (of this communication between heaven and earth, the dominion of these ordinances of heaven upon the earth,) which God has appointed, ver. 25, (compare Job xxxviii. 33,) shall never be disappointed. Thus firm shall the covenant of redemption be with the Redeemer, God's servant, but David our king, ver. 21. This intimates that Christ shall have a church on earth to the world's end; he shall see a seed in which he shall prolong his days, till time and days shall be no more. Christ's kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and when the end cometh, and not until then, it shall be delivered up to God, even the Father. But it intimates that the condition of it in this world shall be intermixed, and counterchanged; prosperity and adversity succeeding each other, as light and darkness, day and night. But this is plainly taught us, that as sure as we may be that, though the sun will set to-night, it will rise again to-morrow morning, whether we live to see it or no, so sure we may be that, though the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world may for a time be clouded and eclipsed by corruptions and persecutions, yet it will shine forth again, and recover its lustre in the time appointed. 2. That the seed of David shall be as numerous as the host of heaven; that is, the spiritual seed of the Messiah, that shall be born to him by the efficacy of his Gospel, and his Spirit working with it. From the womb of the morning he shall have the dew of their youth, to be his willing people, Ps. cx. 3. Christ's seed are not, as David's were, his successors, but his subjects; yet the day is coming when they also shall reign with him; ver. 22, "As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, so will I multiply the seed of David," so that there shall be no danger of the kingdoms being extinct, or extirpated, for want of heirs. The children are numerous; and if children than heirs.

Secondly. The covenant of priesthood shall be secured, and the promises of that also shall have their full accomplishment. This seemed likewise to be forgotten during the captivity, when there was no altar, no temple service for the priests to attend upon; but this also shall revive. It did so immediately upon their coming back to Jerusalem; there were priests and Levites ready to offer burnt offerings, and to do sacrifice continually, Ezr. iii. 2, 3; as is here promised, ver. 18. But that priesthood soon grew corrupt, the covenant of Levi was profaned, as appears, Mal. ii. 8, and in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans it came to a final period; we must, therefore, look elsewhere for the performance of this word, that the covenant with the Levites, the priests, God's ministers, shall be as firm and last as long as the covenant with the day and the night. And we find it abundantly performed, 1. In the priesthood of Christ, which supersedes that of Aaron, and is the substance of that shadow. While that great High Priest of our profession is always appearing in the presence of God for us, representing the virtue of his blood by which he made atonement in the incense of his intercession, it may truly be said, that the Levites do not want a man before God to offer continually, Heb. viii. 3; he is a priest for ever. The covenant of the priesthood is called a covenant of peace, Num. xxv. 12; of life and peace, Mal. ii. 5. Now we are sure this covenant is not broken, nor in the least weakened, while Jesus Christ is himself our life and our peace. This covenant of priesthood is here again and again joined with that of royalty, for Christ is a priest upon his throne, as Melchizedek. 2. In a settled Gospel ministry. While there are faithful ministers to preside in religious assemblies, and to offer up the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise, the priests, the Levites, do not want successors, and such as have obtained a more excellent ministry. The apostle makes those that preach the Gospel to come in the room of those that served at the altar, 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14. 3. In all true believers; who are a holy priesthood, a royal priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; who are made to our God kings and priests, Rev. i. 6. They offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God; and themselves in the first place, living sacrifices. Of these Levites this promise here must be understood, ver. 22, that they shall be as numerous as the sand of the sea; the same that is promised concerning Israel in general, Gen. xxii. 17, for all God's spiritual Israel are spiritual priests, Rev. v. 9, 10; vii. 9, 15.

Thirdly. The covenant of peculiarity likewise shall be secured, and the promises of that covenant shall have their full accomplishment in the Gospel Israel. Observe, 1. How this covenant was looked upon as broken during the captivity, ver. 24. God asks the prophet, Hast thou not heard, and dost thou not consider, what this people have spoken, (either the enemies of Israel who triumph in the extirpation of a people that had made such a noise in the world, or the unbelieving Israelites themselves,) this people among whom thou dwellest? they have broken covenant with God, and then quarrel with him, as if he had not dealt faithfully with them. "The two families which the Lord hath chosen," Israel and Judah, (whereas they were but one when he chose them,) "he hath even cast them off." "Thus have they despised my people;" that is, despised the privilege of being my people, as if it were a privilege of no value at all. The neighbour nations despised them as now no more a nation, but the ruins of a nation; and looked upon all their honour as laid in the dust. But, 2. See how firm the covenant stands notwithstanding; as firm as that with day and night. Sooner will God suffer day and night to cease than he will cast away the seed of Jacob. This cannot refer to the seed of Jacob according to the flesh, for they are cast away; but to the Christian church, in which all these promises were to be lodged, as appears by the apostle's discourse, Rom. xi. 1, &c. Christ is that seed of David that is to be perpetual dictator to the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and, as this people shall never want such a king, so this king shall never want such a people. Christianity shall continue in the dominion of Christ, and the subjection of Christians to him, until day and night come to an end. And, as a pledge of this, that promise is again repeated, "I will cause their captivity to return," and, having brought them back, "I will have mercy on them." Whom this promise refers to, appears, Gal. vi. 16; where all that walk according to the Gospel rule are made to be the Israel of God, on whom peace and mercy shall be.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

In this chapter we have two messages which God sent by Jeremiah: I. One to foretell the fate of Zedekiah king of Judah, that he should fall into the hands of the king of Babylon, that he should live a captive, but should at last die in peace in his captivity, ver. 1—7. II. Another to read the doom both of prince and people for their treacherous dealing with God, in bringing back their servants into bondage, whom they had released according to the law, and so playing fast and loose with God. They had walked at all adventures with God, ver. 8—11; and therefore God would walk at all adventures with them, in bringing the Chaldean army upon them again, then when they began to hope they were got clear of them, ver. 12—22.

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, when Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and all his army, and all the kingdoms of the earth of his dominion, and all the people, fought against Jerusalem, and against all the cities thereof, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; Go and speak to Zedekiah king of Judah, and tell him, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire: 3 And thou shalt not escape out of his hand, but shalt surely be taken, and delivered into his hand; and thine eyes shall behold the eyes of the king of Babylon, and he shall speak with thee mouth to mouth, and thou shalt go to Babylon. 4 Yet hear the word of the LORD, O Zedekiah king of Judah; Thus saith the LORD of thee, Thou shalt not die by the sword: 5 But thou shalt die in peace: and with the burnings of thy fathers, the former kings which were before thee, so shall they burn odours for thee; and they will lament thee, saying, Ah lord! for I have pronounced the word, saith the LORD. 6 Then Jeremiah the prophet spake all these words unto Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem, 7 When the king of Babylon's army fought against Jerusalem, and against all the cities of Judah that were left, against Lachish, and against Azekah: for these defenced cities remained of the cities of Judah.

This prophecy concerning Zedekiah was delivered to Jeremiah, and by him to the parties concerned, before he was shut up in the prison; for we find this prediction here made the ground of his commitment, as appears by the recital of some passages out of it, ch. xxxii. 4. Observe,

First. The time when this message was sent to Zedekiah. It was when the king of Babylon, with all his forces, some out of all the kingdoms of the earth that were within his jurisdiction, fought against Jerusalem, and the cities thereof, ver. 1, designing to destroy them, having often plundered them. The cities that now remained, and yet held out, are named, ver. 7, Lachish and Azekah. This intimates that things were now brought to the last extremity, and yet Zedekiah obstinately stood it out, his heart being hardened to his destruction.

Secondly. The message itself that was sent him.

1. Here is a threatening of wrath. He is told that again which he had been often told before, that the city shall be taken by the Chaldeans, and burnt with fire, ver. 2. That he shall himself fall into the enemy's hands, shall be made a prisoner, shall be brought before that furious prince Nebuchadnezzar, and be carried away captive into Babylon, ver. 3; yet Ezekiel prophesied that he should not see Babylon; nor did he, for his eyes were put out, Eze. xii. 13. This Zedekiah brought upon himself from God by his other sins, and from Nebuchadnezzar by his breaking of his faith with him.

2. Here is a mixture of mercy. He shall die a captive, but he shall not die by the sword; he shall die a natural death, ver. 4. He shall end his days with some comfort, shall die in peace, ver. 5. He never had been one of the worst of the kings, but we are willing to hope that what evil he had done in the sight of the Lord he repented of it in his captivity, as Manasseh had done, and it was forgiven to him, and God being reconciled to him he might truly be said to die in peace. A man may die in a prison, and yet die in peace. Nay, he shall end his days with some reputation, more than one would expect, all things considered. He shall be buried with the burnings of his fathers; that is, with the respects usually shewed to their kings, especially those that had done good in Israel. It seems in his captivity he had carried himself so well towards his own people, that they were willing to do him this honour, and towards Nebuchadnezzar, that he suffered it to be done. If Zedekiah had continued in his prosperity, perhaps he would have grown worse, and would have departed at last without being desired; but his afflictions wrought such a change in him that his death was looked upon as a great loss. It is better live and die penitent in a prison, than live and die impenitent in a palace. "They will lament thee, saying, Ah, lord!" an honour which his brother Jehoiakim had not, ch. xxii. 18. The Jews say, they lamented thus over him, 'Alas, Zedekiah is dead, who drunk the dregs of all the ages that went before him;' that is, who suffered for the sins of his ancestors, the measure of iniquity being filled up in his days. They shall thus lament him, "saith the Lord; for I have pronounced the word;" and what God hath spoken, shall, without fail, be made good.

Thirdly. Jeremiah's faithfulness in delivering this message. Though he knew it would be ungrateful to the king, and might prove, as indeed it did, dangerous to himself, for he was clapped up for it, yet he "spake all these words to Zedekiah," ver. 6. It is a mercy to great men to have those about them that will deal faithfully with them, and tell them the evil consequences of their evil courses, that they may reform and live.

8 This is the word that came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, after that the king Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, to proclaim liberty unto them; 9 That every man should let his manservant, and every man his maidservant, being an Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should serve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother. 10 Now when all the princes, and all the people, which had entered into the covenant, heard that every one should let his manservant, and every one his maidservant, go free, that none should serve themselves of them any more, then they obeyed, and let them go. 11 But afterward they turned, and caused the servants and the handmaids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for servants and for handmaids. 12 Therefore the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 13 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; I made a covenant with your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondmen, saying, 14 At the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear. 15 And ye were now turned, and had done right in my sight, in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbour; and ye had made a covenant before me in the house which is called by my name: 16 But ye turned and polluted my name, and caused every man his servant, and every man his handmaid, whom he had set at liberty at their pleasure, to return, and brought them into subjection, to be unto you for servants and for handmaids. 17 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty, every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbour: behold, I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the LORD, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth. 18 And I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof. 19 The princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf; 20 I will even give them into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life: and their dead bodies shall be for meat unto the fowls of the heaven, and to the beasts of the earth. 21 And Zedekiah king of Judah and his princes will I give into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life, and into the hand of the king of Babylon's army, which are gone up from you. 22 Behold, I will command, saith the LORD, and cause them to return to this city; and they shall fight against it, and take it, and burn it with fire: and I will make the cities of Judah a desolation without an inhabitant.

We have here another prophecy upon a particular occasion, the history of which we must take notice of, as necessary to give light to the prophecy.

First. When Jerusalem was closely besieged by the Chaldean army, the princes and people agreed upon a reformation in one instance, and that was concerning their servants.

1. The law of God was very express, that those of their own nation should not be held in servitude above seven years, but after they had served one apprenticeship they should be discharged, and have their liberty; yea, though they had sold themselves into servitude for the payment of their debts, or though they were sold by the judges for the punishment of their crimes. This difference was put between their brethren and strangers, that those of other nations taken in war, or bought with money, might be held in perpetual slavery, they and theirs; but their brethren must serve but for seven years at the longest. This God calls the covenant that he had made with them when he brought them out of the land of Egypt, ver. 12, 14. This was the first of the judicial laws which God gave them, Ex. xxi. 2, and there was good reason for that law. 1st. God had put honour upon that nation, and he would have them thus to preserve the honour of it themselves, and to put a difference between it and other nations. 2nd. God had brought them out of slavery in Egypt, and he would have them thus to express their grateful sense of that favour by letting those go to whom their houses were houses of bondage, as Egypt had been to their forefathers. That deliverance is therefore mentioned here, ver. 13, as the ground of that law. Note, God's compassions towards us should engage our compassions towards our brethren; we must release as we are released, forgive as we are forgiven, and relieve as we are relieved. And this is called a covenant; for our performance of the duty required is the condition of the continuance of the favours God hath bestowed.

2. This law they and their fathers had broken. Their worldly profit swayed more with them than God's command or covenant. When their servants had lived seven years with them, they understood their business, and how to apply themselves to it better than they did when they first came to them, and therefore they would then by no means part with them, though God himself by his law had made them free. "Your fathers hearkened not to me" in this matter, ver. 14; so that "from the days of their fathers" they had been "in this trespass;" and they thought they might do it because their fathers did it, and their servants had by disuse lost the benefit of the provision God made for them; whereas, against an express law, especially against an express law of God, no custom, usage, or prescription, is to be admitted in plea. For this sin of theirs and their fathers God now brought them into servitude, and justly.

3. When they were besieged, and closely shut in by the army of the Chaldeans, they, being told of their fault in this matter, presently reformed, and let go all their servants that were entitled to their freedom by the law of God; as Pharaoh, who, when the plague was upon him, consented to let the people go, and bound themselves in a covenant to do so. 1st. The prophets faithfully admonished them concerning their sin. From them they heard that they should let their Hebrew servants go free, ver. 2. They might have read it themselves in the book of the law, but did not, or did not heed it; therefore the prophets told them what the law was. See what need there is of the preaching of the word. People must hear the word preached, because they will not make the use they ought to make of the word written. 2nd. All orders and degrees of men concurred in this reformation. The king, and the princes, and all the people agree to let go their servants, whatever loss or damage they might sustain by so doing. When the king and princes led in this good work, the people could not for shame but follow. The example and influence of great men would go very far towards the extirpating of the most inveterate corruption. 3rd. They bound themselves by a solemn oath and covenant that they would do this, whereby they engaged themselves to God and one another. Note, What God hath bound us to by his precept it is good for us to bind ourselves to by our promise. This covenant was very solemn; it was made in a sacred place, "made before me, in the house which is called by my name," ver. 15, in the special presence of God; the tokens of which in the temple ought to strike an awe upon them, and make them very sincere in their appeals to him. It was ratified by a significant sign; they "cut a calf in two, and passed between the parts thereof," ver. 18, 19, with this dreadful imprecation, Let us be in like manner cut in sunder if we do not perform what we now promise. And this calf was probably offered up in sacrifice to God, who was thereby made a party to the covenant. When God covenanted with Abram, for the ratification of it, a smoking furnace and a burning lamp passed between the pieces of the sacrifice, in allusion to this federal rite, Gen. xv. 17. Note, That we may effectually oblige ourselves to our duty, it is good to frighten ourselves with the apprehensions of the terror of that wrath and curse to which we expose ourselves if we live in the contempt of it, that wrath which will cut sinners asunder, Mat. xxiv. 15; and sensible signs may be of use to make the impressions of it deep and durable, as here. 4th. They conformed themselves herein to the command of God, and their covenant with him; they did let their servants go, though at this time, when the city was besieged, they could very ill spare them. Thus they did right in God's sight, ver. 15. Though it was their trouble that drove them to it, yet he was well pleased with it; and if they had persevered in this act of mercy to the poor, to their poor servants, it might have been a lengthening of their tranquillity, Dan. iv. 27.

Secondly. When there was some hope that the siege was raised and the danger over, they repented of their repentance, undid the good they had done, and forced the servants they had released into their respective services again. 1. The king of Babylon's army was now gone up from them, ver. 21. Pharaoh was bringing an army of Egyptians to oppose the progress of the king of Babylon's victories; upon the tidings of which the Chaldeans raised the siege for a time, as we find, ch. xxxvii. 5, "they departed from Jerusalem." See how ready God was to put a stop to his judgments upon the first instance of reformation; so slow is he to anger, and so swift to shew mercy. As soon as ever they let their servants go free, God let them go free. 2. When they began to think themselves safe from the besiegers, they made their servants come back into subjection to them, ver. 11; and again ver. 16. This was a great abuse to their servants, to whom servitude would be more irksome after they had had some taste of the pleasures of liberty. It was a great shame to themselves that they could not keep in a good mind when they were in it. But it was especially an affront to God; in doing this they polluted his name, ver. 16. It was a contempt of the command he had given them, as if that were of no force at all, but they might either keep it or break it as they thought fit. It was a contempt of the covenant they had made with him, and of that wrath which they imprecated upon themselves, in case they should break that covenant. It was jesting with God Almighty, as if he could be imposed upon by fallacious promises; which, when they had gained their point, they would look upon themselves no longer obliged by. It was lying to God with their mouths, and flattering him with their tongues. It was likewise a contempt of the judgments of God, and setting them at defiance; as if when once the course of them was stopped a little, and interrupted, they would never proceed again, and the judgment would never be revived. Whereas reprieves are so far from being pardons, that if they be abused thus, and sinners take encouragement from them to return to sin, they are but preparatives for heavier strokes of Divine vengeance.

Thirdly. For this treacherous dealing with God they are here severely threatened. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." Those that think to put a cheat upon God by a dissembling repentance, a fallacious covenant, and a partial temporary reformation, will prove in the end to put the greatest cheat upon their own souls; for "the Lord, whose name is jealous, is a jealous God." It is here threatened, with an observable air of displeasure against them, 1. That, since they had not given liberty to their servants to go where they pleased, God would give all his judgments liberty to take their course against them without control; ver. 17, "You have not proclaimed liberty to your servants." Though they had done it, ver. 10, yet they might truly be said not to have done it, because they did not stand to it, but undid it again; and factum non dicitur quod non perseverat,—'that is not said to be done which does not last.' The righteousness that is forsaken and turned away from shall be forgotten, and not mentioned, no more than if it had never been, Eze. xviii. 14. Therefore "I will proclaim a liberty for you;" that is, I will discharge you from my service, and put you out of my protection, which those forfeit that withdraw from their allegiance. You shall have liberty to choose which of these judgments you will be cut off by, sword, famine, or pestilence; such a liberty as was offered to David, which put him into a great strait, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. Note, Those that will not be in subjection to the law of God put themselves into subjection to the wrath and curse of God. But this shews what liberty to sin really is; it is but a liberty to the sorest judgments. 2. That, since they had brought their servants back into confinement in their houses, God would "make them to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth," where they should live in servitude, and, being strangers, could not expect the privileges of freeborn subjects. 3. That, since they had broken the covenant which they ratified by a solemn imprecation, God would bring on them the evil which they imprecated upon themselves in case they should break it. Out of their own mouth will he judge them, and so shall their doom be; the penalty of their bond shall be recovered, because they have not performed the condition; for so some read ver. 18, "I will make the men which have transgressed my covenant as the calf which they cut in twain;" I will divide them in sunder as they divided it in sunder. 4. That, since they would not let go their servants out of their hands, God would deliver them into the hands of those that hated them. Even the princes and nobles, both of Judah and Jerusalem, of the country and of the city; the eunuchs, chamberlains, or great officers of the court, the priests, and all the people, they had all dealt treacherously with God, and therefore shall all be involved in the common ruin without exception, ver. 19. They shall all be given into the hand of their enemies, that seek, not their wealth only, or their service, but their life. And they shall have what they seek; but neither shall that content them. When they have their lives, they shall leave their dead bodies unburied, a loathsome spectacle to all mankind, and an easy prey to the fowls and beasts, a lasting mark of ignominy being hereby fastened on them. 5. That, since they had emboldened themselves in returning to their sin, contrary to their covenant, by the retreat of the Chaldean army from them, God would therefore bring it upon them again. They are now gone up from you, and your fright is over for the present; but I will command them to face about, as they were; they shall return to this city, and take it, and burn it. Note, 1st. As confidence in God is a hopeful presage of approaching deliverance, so security in sin is a sad omen of approaching destruction. 2nd. When judgments are removed from a people before they have done their work, leave them, but leave them unhumbled and unreformed, it is cum animo revertendi,—'with a design to return;' they do but retreat to come on again with so much the greater force; for when God judgeth he will overcome. 3rd. It is just with God to disappoint those expectations of mercy which his providence had given cause for, when we disappoint those expectations of duty which our professions, pretensions, and fair promises had given cause for. If we repent of the good we had purposed, God will repent of the good he had purposed. "With the froward thou wilt shew thyself froward."

CHAPTER XXXV.

A variety of methods is tried, and every stone turned, to awaken the Jews to a sense of their sin, and to bring them to repentance and reformation. The scope and tendency of many of the prophet's sermons was to frighten them out of their disobedience, by setting before them what would be the end thereof, if they persisted in it. The scope of this sermon in this chapter is to shame them out of their disobedience, if they had any sense of honour left in them, for a discourse of this nature to fasten upon. I. He sets before them the obedience of the family of the Rechabites to the commands which were left them by Jonadab their ancestor, and how they persevered in that obedience, and would not be tempted from it, ver. 1—11. II. With this he aggravates the disobedience of the Jews to God, and their contempt of his precepts, ver. 12—15. III. He foretells the judgments of God upon the Jews for their impious disobedience to God, ver. 16, 17. IV. He assures the Rechabites of the blessing of God upon them, for their pious obedience to their father, ver. 18, 19.

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying, 2 Go unto the house of the Rechabites, and speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the LORD, into one of the chambers, and give them wine to drink. 3 Then I took Jaazaniah the son of Jeremiah, the son of

Habaziniah, and his brethren, and all his sons, and the whole house of the Rechabites; 4 And I brought them into the house of the LORD, into the chamber of the sons of Hanan, the son of Igdaliah, a man of God, which was by the chamber of the princes, which was above the chamber of Maaseiah the son of Shallum, the keeper of the door: 5 And I set before the sons of the house of the Rechabites pots full of wine, and cups, and I said unto them,

WINE VESSELS, STRAINERS, ETC.

Drink ye wine. 6 But they said, We will drink no wine: for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded us, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons for ever: 7 Neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers. 8 Thus have we obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our father in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters; 9 Nor to build houses for us to dwell in: neither have we vineyard, nor field, nor seed: 10 But we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all that Jonadab our father commanded us. 11 But it came to pass, when Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came up into the land, that we said, Come, and let us go to Jerusalem for fear of the army of the Chaldeans, and for fear of the army of the Syrians: so we dwell at Jerusalem.

This chapter is of an earlier date than many of those before; for what is contained in it was said and done in the days of Jehoiakim, ver. 1, but then it must be in the latter part of his reign, for it was after the king of Babylon with his army came up into the land, ver. 11, which seems to refer to the invasion mentioned, 2 Kin. xxiv. 2, which was upon occasion of Jehoiakim's rebelling against Nebuchadnezzar. After the judgments of God had broken in upon this rebellious people, he continued to deal with them by his prophets, to turn them from sin, that his wrath might turn away from them. He endeavours it by the example of the Rechabites, a family that kept distinct by themselves, and were no more numbered with the families of Israel, than they with the nations. They were originally Kenites, as appears, 1 Chr. ii. 55, "These are the Kenites, that came of Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab." The Kenites, at least those of them that gained a settlement in the land of Israel, were of the posterity of Hobab, Moses' father-in-law, Jud. i. 16. We find them separated from the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xv. 6: see Jud. iv. 17. One family of these Kenites had their denomination from Rechab; his son, or a lineal descendant from him, was Jonadab, a man famous in his time for wisdom and piety; he flourished in the days of Jehu, king of Israel, near three hundred years before this; for there we find him courted by that rising prince, when he affected to appear zealous for God, 2 Kin. x. 15, 16, which he thought nothing more likely to confirm people in the opinion of than to have so good a man as Jonadab ride in the chariot with him. Now here we are told,

First. What the rules of living were which Jonadab, probably by his last will and testament in writing, and duly executed, charged his children and his posterity after him, throughout all generations, religiously to observe; and we have reason to think they were such as he himself had all his days observed. 1. He forbade them to drink wine, according to the law of the Nazarites. Wine is indeed given to make glad the heart of man, and we are allowed the sober and moderate use of it; but we are so apt to abuse it, and get hurt by it, and a good man that has his heart made continually glad with the light of God's countenance, hath so little need of it for that purpose, (Ps. iv. 6, 7,) that it is a commendable piece of self-denial, either not to use it at all, or very sparingly and medicinally, as Timothy used it, 1 Tim. v. 23. 2. He appointed them to dwell in tents, and not to build houses, or purchase lands, or rent or occupy either, ver. 7. This was an instance of strictness and mortification beyond what the Nazarites were obliged to. Tents were mean dwellings, so that this would teach them to be humble; they were cold dwellings, so that this would teach them to be hardy, and not to indulge the body; they were movable dwellings, so that this would teach them not to think of settling or taking root anywhere in this world. They must dwell in tents all their days, not for a few days, as Israel at the feast of tabernacles; not only in summer days, as soldiers and shepherds, but all their days; they must from the beginning thus accustom themselves to endure hardness, and then it would be no difficulty to them, no, not under the decays of old age.

Now why did Jonadab prescribe these rules of living to his posterity? It was not merely to shew his authority, and to exercise a dominion over them, by imposing upon them what he thought fit; but it was to shew his wisdom, and the real concern he had for their welfare, by recommending to them what he knew would be beneficial to them; yet not tying them by any oath or vow, or under any penalty, to observe these rules, but only advising them to conform to this discipline, as far as they found it for edification, yet to be dispensed with in any case of necessity, as here, ver. 11. He prescribed these rules to them, 1. That they might preserve the ancient character of their family, which, however looked upon by some with contempt, he thought its real reputation. His ancestors had addicted themselves to a pastoral life, Ex. ii. 16, and he would have his posterity keep to it, and not degenerate from it, as Israel had done, who originally were shepherds, and dwelt in tents, Gen. xlvi. 34. Note, We ought not to be ashamed of the honest employments of our ancestors, though they were but mean. 2. That they might comport with their lot, and bring their mind to their condition. Moses had put them in hopes that they should be naturalized, Num. x. 32, but it seems they were not. They were still strangers in the land, ver. 7, had no inheritance in it, and therefore must live by their employments, which was a good reason why they should accustom themselves to hard fare and hard lodging; for strangers such as they were must not expect to live as the landed men, so plentifully and delicately. Note, It is our wisdom and duty to accommodate ourselves to our place and rank, and not aim to live above it. What has been the lot of our fathers why may we not be content that it should be our lot, and live according to it? "Mind not high things." 3. That they might not be envied and disturbed by their neighbours among whom they lived. If they that were strangers should live great, raise estates, and fare sumptuously, the natives would grudge them their abundance, and have a jealous eye upon them, as the Philistines had upon Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 14, and would seek occasions to quarrel with them, and do them a mischief. Therefore he thought it would be their prudence to keep low, for that would be the way to continue long; to live meanly, that they might "live many days in the land where they were strangers." Note, Humility and contentment in obscurity is oftentimes the best policy, and men's surest protection. 4. That they might be armed against temptations to luxury and sensuality, the prevailing sin of the age and place they lived in. Jonadab saw a general corruption of manners; the drunkards of Ephraim abounded, and he was afraid lest his children should be debauched and ruined by them, and therefore obliged them to live by themselves, retired in the country; and, that they might not run into any unlawful pleasures, to deny themselves the use even of lawful delights. They must be very sober, and temperate, and abstemious, which would contribute to the health both of mind and body, and to their living many days, and easy ones, and such as they might reflect upon with comfort in the land where they were strangers. Note, The consideration of this, that we are strangers and pilgrims, should oblige us to abstain from all fleshly lusts, to live above the things of sense, and look upon them with a generous and gracious contempt. 5. That they might be prepared for times of trouble and calamity. Jonadab might, without a spirit of prophecy, foresee the destruction of a people so wretchedly degenerated; and he would have his family provide, that if they could not in the peace thereof, yet even in the midst of the troubles thereof, they might have peace. Let them therefore have little to lose, and then losing times would be less dreadful to them; let them sit loose to what they had, and then they might the easier be stripped of it. Note, Those are in the best frame to meet sufferings that are mortified to the world, and live a life of self-denial. 6. That in general they might learn to live by rule, and under discipline. It is good for us all to do so, and teach our children to do so. Those that have lived long, as it is likely Jonadab had done, when he left this charge to his posterity, can speak by experience of the vanity of the world, and the dangerous snares that are in the abundance of its wealth and pleasures, and therefore ought to be regarded, when they warn those that come after them to stand upon their guard.

Secondly. We are here told how strictly his posterity observed these rules, ver. 8—10. They had in their respective generations all of them "obeyed the voice of Jonadab" their father, had done "according to all that he had commanded them." They drank no wine, though they dwelt in a country where there was plenty of it; their wives and children drank no wine, for they that are temperate themselves should take care that all under their charge should be so too. They built no houses, tilled no ground, but lived upon the products of their cattle. This they did partly in obedience to their ancestor, and out of a veneration they had for his name and authority, and partly from the experience they themselves had of the benefit of living such a mortified life. See the force of tradition, and the influence that antiquity, example, and great names, have upon men; and how that which seems very difficult will, by long usage and custom, become easy, and in a manner natural.

Now, 1. As to one of the particulars he had given them in charge, we are here told how in a case of necessity they dispensed with the violation of it; ver. 11, "When the king of Babylon came into the land," with his army, though they had hitherto dwelt in tents, they now quitted their tents, and came and dwelt in Jerusalem, and in such houses as they could furnish themselves with there. Note, The rules of a strict discipline must not be made too strict, but so as to admit of a dispensation when the necessity of the case calls for it; which therefore, in making vows of that nature, it is wisdom to provide expressly for, that the way may be made the more clear, and we may not afterwards be forced to say, It was an error, Eccl. v. 6; and commands of that nature are to be understood with such limitations. These Rechabites had tempted God, and not trusted him, if they had not used proper means for their own safety in a time of common calamity, notwithstanding the law and custom of their family. 2. As to the other particular, we are here told how, notwithstanding the greatest urgency, they religiously adhered to it. Jeremiah took them into the temple, ver. 2, into a prophet's chamber there, rather than into the chamber of the princes, that joined to it, because he had a message from God, which would look more like itself when it was delivered in the chambers of a man of God. There he not only asked the Rechabites, Would they drink any wine, but he set pots full of wine before them, and cups to drink out of; made the temptation as strong as possible, and said, "Drink ye wine," you shall have it on free cost; you have broken one of the rules of your order, in coming to live at Jerusalem, why may you not break this too, and when you are in the city, do as they there do? But they peremptorily refused; they all agreed in the refusal: No, "we will drink no wine," for with us it is against the law. The prophet knew very well they would deny it, and when they did urged it no farther, for he saw that they were stedfastly resolved. Note, Those temptations are of no force with men of confirmed sobriety which yet daily overcome such as, notwithstanding their convictions, are of no resolution in the paths of virtue.

12 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, 13 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Go and tell the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Will ye not receive instruction to hearken to my words? saith the LORD. 14 The words of Jonadab the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; for unto this day they drink none, but obey their father's commandment: notwithstanding I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking; but ye hearkened not unto me. 15 I have sent also unto you all my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them, saying, Return ye now every man from his evil way, and amend your doings, and go not after other gods to serve them, and ye shall dwell in the land which I have given to you and to your fathers: but ye have not inclined your ear, nor hearkened unto me. 16 Because the sons of Jonadab the son of Rechab have performed the commandment of their father, which he commanded them; but this people hath not hearkened unto me: 17 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring upon Judah and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem all the evil that I have pronounced against them: because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have called unto them, but they have not answered. 18 And Jeremiah said unto the house of the Rechabites, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according unto all that he hath commanded you: 19 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.

The trial of the Rechabites' constancy was intended but for a sign. Now here we have the application of it.

First. The Rechabites' observance of their father's charge to them is made use of as an aggravation of the disobedience of the Jews to God. Let them see it, and be ashamed. The prophet asks them in God's name, Will ye not at length receive instruction? ver. 13. Will nothing affect you? Will nothing fasten upon you? Will nothing prevail to discover sin and duty to you? You see how obedient the Rechabites are to their father's commandment; ver. 14, but "you have not inclined your ear to me," ver. 15, though one might much more reasonably expect that the people of God should have obeyed him, than that the sons of Jonadab should have obeyed him; and the aggravation is very high; for, 1. The Rechabites were obedient to one that was but a man like themselves, that had but the wisdom and power of a man, and was only the father of their flesh; but the Jews were disobedient to an infinite and eternal God, that had an absolute authority over them as the Father of their spirits. 2. Jonadab was long since dead, and was ignorant of them, and could neither take cognizance of their disobedience to his orders nor give correction for it. But God lives for ever, to see how his laws are observed, and is in a readiness to revenge all disobedience. 3. The Rechabites were never put in mind of their obligations to their father; but God often sent his prophets to his people, to put them in mind of their duty to him, and yet they would not do it. This is insisted on here as a great aggravation of their disobedience; "I have myself spoken to you, rising early, and speaking," by the written word, and the dictates and admonitions of conscience, ver. 14. Nay, "I have sent unto you all my servants the prophets," men like yourselves, whose terrors shall not make you afraid, rising up early, and sending them, ver. 15, and yet all in vain. 4. Jonadab never did that for his seed that God had done for this people. He left them a charge, but left them no estate to bear the charge; but God had given his people a good land, and promised them, if they would be obedient, they should still dwell in it. So that they were bound both in gratitude and interest to be obedient, and yet they would not hear, they would not hearken. 5. God did not tie up his people to so much hardship, and to such instances of mortification as Jonadab obliged his seed to; and yet Jonadab's orders were obeyed, and God's were not.

Secondly. Judgments are threatened, as often before, against Judah and Jerusalem, for their disobedience thus aggravated. The Rechabites shall rise up in judgment against them, and shall condemn them, for they very punctually "performed the commandment of their father," and continued and persevered in their obedience to it, ver. 16; but "this people," this rebellious and gainsaying people, "has not hearkened to me;" and therefore, ver. 17, because they have not obeyed the precepts of the word, God will perform the threatenings of it: "I will bring upon them," by the Chaldean army, "all the evil pronounced against them," both in the law and the prophets; for "I have spoken to them, I have called to them;" spoken in a still small voice to them that were near, and called aloud to them that were at a distance; tried all ways and means to convince and reduce them, spoke by his word, called by his providence, both to the same purpose, and yet all to no purpose; they have not heard nor answered.

Thirdly. Mercy is here promised to the family of the Rechabites, for their steady and unanimous adherence to the laws of their house. Though it was only for the shaming of Israel that their constancy was tried, yet, being unshaken, it was found unto praise, and honour, and glory. And God takes occasion from it to tell them that he had favours in reserve for them, ver. 18, 19, and they should have the comfort of them. It is promised, 1. That the family shall continue as long as any of the families of Israel, among whom they were strangers and sojourners. It shall never want a man to inherit what they had, though they had no inheritance to leave them. Note, Sometimes those that have the smallest estates have the most numerous progeny; but he that sends mouths will be sure to send meat. 2. That religion shall continue in the family; "He shall not want a man to stand before me" to serve me. Though they are neither priests nor Levites, nor appear to have had any post in the temple service, yet, in a constant course of regular devotion, they stand before God to minister to him. Note, 1st. The greatest blessing that can be entailed upon a family is, to have the worship of God kept up in it, from generation to generation. 2nd. Temperance, and self-denial, and mortification to the world, do very much befriend the exercises of piety, and help to transmit the observance of them to posterity. The more dead we are to the delights of sense, the better disposed we are for the service of God; but nothing is more fatal to the entail of religion in a family than pride and luxury.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Here is another expedient tried to work upon this heedless and untoward people, but it is tried in vain. A roll of a book is provided, containing an abstract or abridgment of all the sermons that Jeremiah had preached to them, that they might be put in mind of what they had heard, and might the better understand it, when they had it all before them at one view. Now here we have, I. The writing of the roll by Baruch, as Jeremiah dictated it, ver. 1—4. II. The reading of the roll by Baruch to all the people publicly on a fast day, ver. 5—10; afterwards by Baruch to the princes privately, ver. 11—19; and lastly, by Jehudi to the king, ver. 20, 21. III. The burning of the roll by the king, with orders to prosecute Jeremiah and Baruch, ver. 22—26. IV. The writing of another roll, with large additions, particularly of Jehoiakim's doom for burning the former, ver. 27—32.

AND it came to pass in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, that this word came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Take thee a roll of a book, and write therein all the words that I have spoken unto thee against Israel, and against Judah, and against all the nations, from the day I spake unto thee, from the days of Josiah, even unto this day. 3 It may be that the house of Judah will hear all the evil which I purpose to do unto them; that they may return every man from his evil way; that I may forgive their iniquity and their sin. 4 Then Jeremiah called Baruch the son of Neriah: and Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the LORD, which he had spoken unto him, upon a roll of a book. 5 And Jeremiah commanded Baruch, saying, I am shut up; I cannot go into the house of the LORD: 6 Therefore go thou, and read in the roll, which thou hast written from my mouth, the words of the LORD in the ears of the people in the LORD's house upon the fasting day: and also thou shalt read them in the ears of all Judah that come out of their cities. 7 It may be they will present their supplication before the LORD, and will return every one from his evil way: for great is the anger and the fury that the LORD hath pronounced against this people. 8 And Baruch the son of Neriah did according to all that Jeremiah the prophet commanded him, reading in the book the words of the LORD in the LORD's house.

In the beginning of Ezekiel's prophecy we meet with a roll written in vision, for discovery of the things therein contained to the prophet himself, who was to receive and digest them, Eze. ii. 10, and iii. 1. Here in the latter end of Jeremiah's prophecy we meet with a roll, written, in fact, for discovery of the things contained therein to the people, who were to hear and give heed to them, for the written word and other good books are of great use both to ministers and people. We have here,

First. The command which God gave to Jeremiah to write a summary of his sermons, of all the reproofs and all the warnings he had given in God's name to his people, ever since he first began to be a preacher, in the thirteenth year of Josiah to this day, which was in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, ver. 2, 3. What had been spoken only must now be written, that it might be reviewed, and that it might spread the farther and last the longer. What had been spoken at large, with frequent repetitions of the same things, perhaps in the same words, which has its advantage one way, must now be contracted and put into less compass, that the several parts of it might be better compared together, which has its advantage another way. What they had heard once must be recapitulated and rehearsed to them again; that what was forgotten might be called to mind again, and what made no impression upon them at the first hearing might take hold of them when they heard it the second time. And what was perhaps already written and published in single sermons must be collected into one volume, that none might be lost. Note, The writing of the Scripture is by Divine appointment. And observe, The reason here given for the writing of this roll; ver. 3, "It may be the house of Judah will hear." Not that the Divine prescience was at any uncertainty concerning the event, with that there is no peradventure, (God knew certainly that they would deal very treacherously, Isa. xlviii. 8,) but the Divine wisdom directed to this as a proper means for attaining the desired end, which, if it did not, they would be the more inexcusable. And though God foresaw they would not hear, he did not tell the prophet so, but prescribes this method to him as a probable one, to be used in hopes they will hear; will hear, that is, will heed and regard what they hear, will take notice of it and mix faith with it, for otherwise our hearing of the word, though an angel from heaven were to read or preach it to us, would stand us in no stead. Now observe here, 1. What it is hoped they will thus hear; "All that evil which I purpose to do unto them." Note, The serious consideration of the certain fatal consequences of sin will be of great use to us to bring us to God. 2. What it is hoped will be produced thereby; "They will hear, that they may return every man from his evil way." Note, The conversion of sinners from their sinful courses is that which ministers should aim at in preaching; and people hear the word in vain if that point be not gained with them. To what purpose do we hear of the evil God will bring upon us for sin if we continue notwithstanding to do evil against him? 3. Of what vast advantage their consideration and conversion will be to them; "That I may forgive their iniquity." This plainly implies the honour of God's justice, with which it is not consistent that he should forgive the sin unless the sinner repent of it, and turn from it; but it plainly expresseth the honour of his mercy, that he is very ready to forgive sin, and only waits till the sinner be qualified to receive forgiveness, and therefore useth various means to bring us to repentance, that he may forgive.

Secondly. The instructions which Jeremiah gave to Baruch his scribe, pursuant to this command he had received from God, and the writing of the roll accordingly, ver. 4. God bade Jeremiah write, but it should seem he had not the pen of a ready writer: he could not write fast, or not fair, so as Baruch could, and therefore he made use of him as his amanuensis. St. Paul wrote few of his epistles with his own hand, Gal. vi. 11; Rom. xvi. 22. God dispenseth his gifts variously; some have a good faculty at speaking, others at writing, and neither can say to the other, We have no need of you, 1 Cor. xii. 21. The Spirit of God dictated to Jeremiah, and he to Baruch, who had been employed by Jeremiah as trustee for him in his purchase of the field, ch. xxxii. 12, and now was advanced to be his scribe and substitute in his prophetical office; and, if we may credit the apocryphal book that bears his name, he was afterwards himself a prophet to the captives in Babylon. Those that begin low are likely to rise high; and it is good for those that are designed for prophets to have their education under prophets, and be serviceable to them. Baruch wrote what Jeremiah dictated in a roll of a book, on pieces of parchment or vellum, which were joined together, the top of one to the bottom of the other, so making one long scroll, which was rolled perhaps upon a staff.

Thirdly. The orders which Jeremiah gave to Baruch, to read what he had written to the people. Jeremiah, it seems, was shut up, and could not go to the house of the Lord himself, ver. 5. Though he was not a close prisoner, for then there had been no occasion to send officers to seize him, ver. 36, yet he was forbidden by the king to appear in the temple, was shut out thence, where he might be serving God and doing good, which was as bad to him as if he had been shut up in a dungeon. Jehoiakim was ripening apace for ruin when he thus silenced God's faithful messengers. But when Jeremiah could not go to the temple himself, he sent one that was deputed by him to read to the people what he would himself have said. Thus St. Paul wrote epistles to the churches which he could not visit in person; nay, it was what he himself had often said to them. Note, The writing and repeating of the sermons that have been preached may contribute very much towards the answering of the great ends of preaching. What we have heard and known it is good for us to hear again, that we may know it better. To preach and write the same thing is safe and profitable, and many times very necessary, Phil. iii. 1; and we must be glad to hear a good word from God, though we have it as here at second hand. Both ministers and people must do what they can when they cannot do what they would. Observe, When God ordered the reading of the roll he said, "It may be they will hear, and return from their evil ways," ver. 3. When Jeremiah orders it he saith, "It may be they will pray," (they will "present their supplication before the Lord,") "and will return from their evil way." Note, Prayer to God for grace to turn us is necessary in order to our turning; and those that are convinced by the word of God of the necessity of returning to him will present their supplications to him for that grace; and the consideration of this, that "great is the anger which God has pronounced against us" for sin, should quicken both our prayers and our endeavours. Now according to these orders Baruch did read "out of the book the words of the Lord," whenever there was a holy convocation, ver. 8.

9 And it came to pass in the fifth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, in the ninth month, that they proclaimed a fast before the LORD to all the people in Jerusalem, and to all the people that came from the cities of Judah unto Jerusalem. 10 Then read Baruch in the book the words of Jeremiah in the house of the LORD, in the chamber of Gemariah the son of Shaphan the scribe, in the higher court, at the entry of the new gate of the LORD's house, in the ears of all the people. 11 When Michaiah the son of Gemariah, the son of Shaphan, had heard out of the book all the words of the LORD, 12 Then he went down into the king's house, into the scribe's chamber: and, lo, all the princes sat there, even Elishama the scribe, and Delaiah the son of Shemaiah, and Elnathan the son of Achbor, and Gemariah the son of Shaphan, and Zedekiah the son of Hananiah, and all the princes. 13 Then Michaiah declared unto them all the words that he had heard, when Baruch read the book in the ears of the people. 14 Therefore all the princes sent Jehudi the son of Nethaniah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Cushi, unto Baruch, saying, Take in thine hand the roll wherein thou hast read in the ears of the people, and come. So Baruch the son of Neriah took the roll in his hand, and came unto them. 15 And they said unto him, Sit down now, and read it in our ears. So Baruch read it in their ears. 16 Now it came to pass, when they had heard all the words, they were afraid both one and other, and said unto Baruch, We will surely tell the king of all these words. 17 And they asked Baruch, saying, Tell us now, How didst thou write all these words at his mouth? 18 Then Baruch answered them, He pronounced all these words unto me with his mouth, and I wrote them with ink in the book. 19 Then said the princes unto Baruch, Go, hide thee, thou and Jeremiah; and let no man know where ye be.

It should seem that Baruch had been frequently reading out of the book to all companies that would give him the hearing, before the most solemn reading of it altogether, which is here spoken of; for the directions were given about it in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, whereas this was done in the fifth year, ver. 9. But some think that the writing of the book fair over took up so much time that it was another year ere it was perfected; and yet perhaps it might not be past a month or two; he might begin it in the latter end of the fourth year and finish it in the beginning of the fifth, for the ninth month refers to the computation of the year in general, not to the year of that reign. Now observe here,

First. The government appointed a public fast to be religiously observed, ver. 9, either upon the account of the distress they were brought into by the army of the Chaldeans, or of the want of rain, ch. xiv. 1; "They proclaimed a fast to the people." Whether the king and princes or the priests ordered this fast, is not certain, but it was plain God, by his providence, called them aloud to it. Note, Great shows of piety and devotion may be found even among those who, though they keep up these forms of godliness, are strangers and enemies to the power of it. But what will such hypocritical services avail? Fasting without reforming and turning away from sin will never turn away the judgments of God, Jonah iii. 10. Notwithstanding this fast God proceeded in his controversy with this people.

Secondly. Baruch repeated Jeremiah's sermons publicly in the house of the Lord on the fast-day. He stood in a chamber that belonged to Gemariah, and out of a window or balcony read to the people that were in the court, ver. 10. Note, When we are speaking to God we must be willing to hear from him, and therefore on days of fasting and prayer it is requisite that the word be read and preached; "Hearken unto me, that God may hearken unto you," Jud. ix. 7. For our help in suing out mercy and grace it is proper we should be told of sin and duty.

Thirdly. An account was brought of this to the princes that attended the court, and were now together in the secretary's office, here called the scribe's chamber, ver. 12. It should seem, though the princes had called the people to meet in the house of God to fast, and pray, and hear the word, they did not think fit to attend there themselves, which was a sign that it was not from a principle of true devotion, but merely for fashion sake, that they proclaimed this fast. We are willing to hope that it was not with an ill design to bring Jeremiah into trouble for his preaching, but with a good design, to bring the princes into trouble for their sins, that Michaiah informed the princes of what Baruch had read; for his father Gemariah so far countenanced Baruch as to lend him his chamber to read out of. Michaiah finds the princes sitting in the scribe's chamber, and tells them they had better have been where he had been, hearing a good sermon in the temple, which he gives them the heads of. Note, When we have heard some good word that has affected and edified us we should be ready to communicate it to others that did not hear it, for their edification; "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks."

Fourthly. Baruch is sent for, and is ordered to sit down among them, and read it all over again to them, ver. 14, 15, which he readily did, not complaining that he was weary with his public work, and therefore desiring to be excused, nor upbraiding the princes with their being absent from the temple, where they might have heard it when he read it there. Note, God's ministers must become all things to all men, if by any means they may gain some; must comply with them in circumstances that they may secure the substance. St. Paul preached privately to them of reputation, Gal. ii. 2.

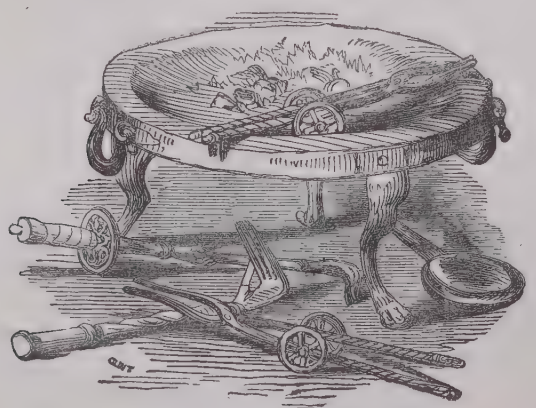
Fifthly. The princes were for the present much affected with the word that was read to them, ver. 16. Observe, They heard all the words, they did not interrupt him, but very patiently attended to the reading of the whole book, for otherwise how could they make a competent judgment of it? And when they had heard all they were afraid, were all afraid, one as well as another; like Felix, who trembled at Paul's reasonings. The reproofs were just and the threatenings terrible, and the predictions now in a fair way to be fulfilled, so that, laying all together, they were in a great consternation. We are not told what impressions this reading of the roll made upon the people, ver. 12, but the princes were put into a fright by it, and (as some read it) looked one upon another, not knowing what to say. They were all convinced it was worthy to be regarded, but none of them had courage to second it, only they agreed to tell the king of all these words, and if he think fit to give credit to them they will; otherwise not, no, though it were to prevent the ruin of the nation. And yet at the same time they knew the king's mind so far that they advised Baruch and Jeremiah to hide themselves, ver. 19, and to shift as they could for their own safety, expecting no other but that the king, instead of being convinced, would be exasperated. Note, It is common for sinners under convictions to endeavour to shake them off, by shifting off the prosecution of them to other persons, as these princes here, or to another more convenient season, as Felix.

Sixthly. They asked Baruch a trifling question, "How he wrote all these words?" ver. 17, as if they suspected there was something extraordinary in it; but Baruch gives them a plain answer, that there was nothing but what was common in the manner of the writing; Jeremiah dictated, and he wrote, ver. 18. But thus it is common for those who would avoid the convictions of the word of God to start needless questions about the way and manner of the inspiration of it.

20 And they went in to the king into the court, but they laid up the roll in the chamber of Elishama the scribe, and told all the words in the ears of the king. 21 So the king sent Jehudi to fetch the roll: and he took it out of Elishama the scribe's chamber. And Jehudi read it in the ears of the king, and in the ears of all the princes which stood beside the king. 22 Now the king sat in the winterhouse in the ninth month: and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him. 23 And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, he cut it with the penknife, and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth. 24 Yet they were not afraid, nor rent their garments, neither the king, nor any of his servants that heard all these words. 25 Nevertheless Elnathan and Delaiah and Gemariah had made intercession to the king that he would not burn the roll: but he would not hear them. 26 But the king commanded Jerahmeel the son of Hammelech, and Seraiah the son of Azriel, and Shelemiah the son of Abdeel, to take Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet: but the LORD hid them. 27 Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, after that the king had burned the roll, and the words which Baruch wrote at the mouth of Jeremiah, saying, 28 Take thee again another roll, and write in it all the former words that were in the first roll, which Jehoiakim the king of Judah hath burned. 29 And thou shalt say to Jehoiakim king of Judah, Thus saith the LORD; Thou hast burned this roll, saying, Why hast thou written therein, saying, The king of Babylon shall certainly come and destroy this land, and shall cause to cease from thence man and beast? 30 Therefore thus saith the LORD of Jehoiakim king of Judah;

He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David:
And his dead body shall be cast out
In the day to the heat,
And in the night to the frost.
31 And I will punish him and his seed and his servants
For their iniquity;
And I will bring upon them,
And upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and upon the men of Judah,
All the evil that I have pronounced against them;
But they hearkened not.

32 Then took Jeremiah another roll, and gave it to Baruch the scribe, the son of Neriah; who wrote therein from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the book which Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire: and there were added besides unto them many like words.



BRAZIERS, OR FIREPANS.

We have traced the roll to the people and to the princes, and here we are to follow it to the king; and we find,

First. That upon notice given him concerning it, he sent for it, and ordered it to be read to him, ver. 20, 21. He did not desire that Baruch would come and read it himself, who could read it more intelligently, and with more authority and affection than any one else; nor did he order one of his princes to do it, though it had been no disparagement to the greatest of them, much less would he vouchsafe to read it himself; but Jehudi, one of his pages now in waiting, that was sent to fetch it, is bidden to read it, who perhaps scarce knew how to make sense of it. But those who thus despise the word of God will soon make it appear, as this king here did, that they hate it too, and have not only low, but ill thoughts of it.

Secondly. That he had not patience to hear it read through, as the princes had; but when he had heard three or four leaves read, in a rage cut it with his penknife, and threw it piece by piece into the fire, that he might be sure to see it all consumed, ver. 22, 23. This was a piece of as daring impiety as a man could lightly be guilty of, and a most impudent affront to the God of heaven, whose message this was. 1. Thus he shewed his impatience of reproof; being resolved to persist in sin, he would by no means bear to be told of his faults. 2. Thus he shewed his indignation at Baruch and Jeremiah; he would have cut them in pieces and burnt them, if he had had them in his reach when he was in this passion. 3. Thus he expressed an obstinate resolution never to comply with the designs and intentions of the warnings given him; he will do what he will, whatsoever God, by his prophets, saith to the contrary. 4. Thus he foolishly hoped to defeat the threatenings denounced against him; as if God knew not how to execute the sentence when the roll was gone in which it was written. 5. Thus he thought he had effectually provided that the things contained in the roll should spread no farther, which was the care of the chief priests concerning the Gospel, Acts iv. 17. They had told him how this roll had been read to the people and to the princes. But, saith he, I will take care it shall never be read more. See what an enmity against God there is in the carnal mind, and wonder at the patience of God, that he bears with such indignities done to him.

Thirdly. That neither the king himself nor any of his princes were at all affected with the word; "They were not afraid," ver. 24; no, not those princes that trembled at the word when they heard it the first time, ver. 16. So soon, so easily, do good impressions wear off. They shewed some concern till they saw how light the king made of it, and then they shook off all that concern. They rent not their garments, as Josiah did, this Jehoiakim's own father did, when he had the book of the law read to him, though it was not so particular as the contents of this roll were, nor so immediately adapted to the present posture of affairs.

Fourthly. That there were three of the princes who had so much sense and grace left as to interpose for the preventing of the burning of the roll, but in vain, ver. 25. If they had from the first shewed themselves, as they ought to have done, affected with the word, perhaps they might have brought the king to a better mind, and have persuaded him to hear it patiently; but many times they that will not do the good they should put it out of their own power to do the good they would.

Fifthly. That Jehoiakim, when he had thus in effect burned God's warrant, by which he was arrested, as it were, in a way of revenge, now he thought he had got the better, signed a warrant for the apprehending of Jeremiah and Baruch, God's ministers; ver. 26, "But the Lord hid them." The princes bade them abscond, ver. 19. But it was neither the princes' care for them, nor theirs for themselves, that secured them, it was under the Divine protection that they were safe. Note, God will find out a shelter for his people, though their persecutors be never so industrious to get them into their power, till their hour is come; nay, and then he will himself be their hiding place.

Sixthly. That Jeremiah had orders and instructions to write the same words in another roll that were written in the roll which Jehoiakim had burned, ver. 27, 28. Note, Though the attempts of hell against the word of God are very daring, yet not one iota or tittle of it shall fall to the ground, nor shall the unbelief of man make the word of God of none effect. Enemies may prevail to burn many a Bible, but they cannot abolish the word of God, can neither extirpate it nor defeat the accomplishment of it. Though the tables of the law were broken, they were renewed again; and so out of the ashes of the roll that was burned arose another phœnix. "The word of the Lord endures for ever."

Seventhly. That the king of Judah, though he be a king, shall be severely reckoned with by the King of kings for this indignity done to the written word. God took notice what it was in the roll that Jehoiakim took so much offence at. He was angry because "it was written therein, saying, Surely the king of Babylon shall come and destroy this land," ver. 29. And did not the king of Babylon come two years before this, and go far towards the destroying of this land? He did so, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6, 7; in his third year, Dan. i. 1. So that God and his prophets were therefore become his enemies, because they told him the truth, told him of the desolation that was coming, but at the same time putting him into a fair way to prevent it. But if this be the thing he takes so heinously, let him know, 1. That the wrath of God shall come upon him and his family, in the first place by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar. He shall be cut off, and in a few weeks his son shall be dethroned, and exchange his royal robes for prison garments, so that he shall have none to sit upon the throne of David; the glory of that illustrious house shall be eclipsed, and die in him. His dead body shall lie unburied, or, which comes all to one, he shall be buried with the burial of an ass, that is, thrown into the next ditch; it shall lie exposed to all weathers, heat and frost, which will occasion its putrefying and becoming loathsome the sooner. 'Not that his body,' saith Mr. Gataker, 'could be sensible of such usage, or himself, being deceased, of aught that could befall his body; but that the sight of a king's body in such a condition should be a hideous spectacle, and a horrid monument of God's heavy wrath and indignation against him, unto all that should behold it.' Even his seed and his servants shall fare the worse for their relation to him, ver. 31; for they shall be punished not for his iniquity, but so much the sooner for their own. 2. That all the evil pronounced against Judah and Jerusalem in that roll shall be brought upon them. Though the copy be burned, the original remains in the Divine counsel, which shall again be copied out after another manner, in bloody characters. Note, There is no escaping God's judgments by struggling with them; who ever hardened his heart against God and prospered?

Lastly. That when the roll was written anew, "there were added" to the former "many like words," ver. 32, many more threatenings of wrath and vengeance; for, since they will yet walk contrary to God, he will heat the furnace seven times hotter. Note, As God is in one mind, and none can turn him, so he hath still more arrows in his quiver; and those who contend with God's woes do but prepare for themselves heavier of the same kind.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

This chapter brings us very near the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; for the story of it lies in the latter end of Zedekiah's reign. We have in it, I. A general idea of the ill character of this reign, ver. 1, 2. II. The message which Zedekiah notwithstanding sent to Jeremiah, to desire his prayers, ver. 3. III. The flattering hopes which the people had conceived, that the Chaldeans would quit the siege of Jerusalem, ver. 4. IV. The assurance God gave them by Jeremiah, (who was now at liberty, ver. 4,) that the Chaldean army should renew the siege, and take the city, ver. 6—10. V. The imprisonment of Jeremiah, under pretence that he was a deserter, ver. 11—17. VI. The kindness which Zedekiah shewed him when he was a prisoner, ver. 16—21.

AND king Zedekiah the son of Josiah reigned instead of Coniah the son of Jehoiakim, whom Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon made king in the land of Judah. 2 But neither he, nor his servants, nor the people of the land, did hearken unto the words of the LORD, which he spake by the prophet Jeremiah. 3 And Zedekiah the king sent Jehucal the son of Shelemiah and Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest to the prophet Jeremiah, saying, Pray now unto the LORD our God for us. 4 Now Jeremiah came in and went out among the people: for they had not put him into prison. 5 Then Pharaoh's army was come forth out of Egypt: and when the Chaldeans that besieged Jerusalem heard tidings of them, they departed from Jerusalem. 6 Then came the word of the LORD unto the prophet Jeremiah, saying, 7 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; Thus shall ye say to the king of Judah, that sent you unto me to enquire of me; Behold, Pharaoh's army, which is come forth to help you, shall return to Egypt into their own land. 8 And the Chaldeans shall come again, and fight against this city, and take it, and burn it with fire. 9 Thus saith the LORD; Deceive not yourselves, saying, The Chaldeans shall surely depart from us: for they shall not depart. 10 For though ye had smitten the whole army of the Chaldeans that fight against you, and there remained but wounded men among them, yet should they rise up every man in his tent, and burn this city with fire.

Here is, First. Jeremiah's preaching slighted, ver. 1, 2. Zedekiah succeeded Coniah, or Jeconiah; and, though he saw in his predecessor the fatal consequences of contemning the word of God, yet he did not take warning, nor give any more regard to it than others had done before him. "Neither he, nor his courtiers, nor the people of the land, hearkened unto the words of the Lord," though they already began to be fulfilled. Note, Those have hearts wretchedly hard indeed, that see God's judgments on others, and feel them on themselves, and yet will not be humbled and brought to heed what he saith. These here had proof sufficient that it was the Lord that spake by Jeremiah the prophet, and yet they would not hearken to him.

Secondly. Jeremiah's prayers desired. Zedekiah sent messengers to him, saying, "Pray now unto the Lord our God for us." So he did, ch. xxi. 1, 2; and one of the messengers, Zephaniah, is the same there and here. Zedekiah is to be commended for this, and it shews he had some good in him, some sense of his need of God's favour, and of his own unworthiness to ask it for himself, and some value for good people and good ministers, that had an interest in heaven. Note, When we are in distress we ought to desire the prayers of our ministers and Christian friends; for thereby we put an honour upon prayer, and an esteem upon our brethren. Kings themselves should look upon their praying people as the strength of the nation, Zec. xii. 5, 10. And yet this doth but help to condemn Zedekiah out of his own mouth. If indeed he looked upon Jeremiah as a prophet, whose prayers might avail much both for him and his people, why did he not then believe him, and hearken to the words of the Lord, which he spake by him? He desired his good prayers, but would not take his good counsel, nor be ruled by him, though he spake in God's name, and it appears by this he knew he did. Note, It is common for those to desire to be prayed for that yet will not be advised. But herein they put a cheat upon themselves; for how can we expect that God should hear others speaking to him for us, if we will not hear them speaking to us from him, and for him. Many that despise prayer when they are in prosperity will be glad of it when they are in adversity; Now give us of your oil. When Zedekiah sent to the prophet to pray for him, he had better have sent for the prophet to pray with him; but he thought that below him; and how can they expect the comforts of religion that will not stoop to the services of it?

Thirdly. Jerusalem flattered by the retreat of the Chaldean army from it. Jeremiah was now at liberty; ver. 4, he went in and out among the people, might freely speak to them, and be spoken to by them. Jerusalem also for the present was at liberty, ver. 5. Zedekiah, though a tributary to the king of Babylon, had entered into a private league with Pharaoh, king of Egypt, Eze. xvii. 15; pursuant to which, when the king of Babylon came to chastise him for his treachery, the king of Egypt, though he came no more in person after that great defeat which Nebuchadnezzar gave him in the reign of Jehoiakim, 2 Kin. xxiv. 7, yet sent some forces to relieve Jerusalem when it was besieged; upon notice of the approach of which the Chaldeans raised the siege, probably not for fear of them, but in policy, to fight them at a distance, before any of the Jewish forces could join them. From this they encouraged themselves to hope that Jerusalem was delivered, for good and all, out of the hands of its enemies, and that the storm was quite blown over. Note, Sinners are commonly hardened in their security by the intermissions of judgments, and the slow proceedings of them; and those who will not be awakened by the word of God may justly be lulled asleep by the providence of God.

Fourthly. Jerusalem threatened with the return of the Chaldean army, and with ruin by it. Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah to desire him to pray for them, that the Chaldean army might not return; but Jeremiah sends them word back that the decree was gone forth, and it was but a folly for them to expect peace; for God had begun a controversy with them, which he would make an end of. "Thus saith the Lord, Deceive not yourselves," ver. 9. Note, Satan himself, though he is the great deceiver, could not deceive us, if we did not deceive ourselves; and thus sinners are their own destroyers by being their own deceivers: which this is an aggravation of, that they are so frequently warned of it, and cautioned not to deceive themselves, and they have the word of God, the great design of which is to undeceive them. Jeremiah used no dark metaphors; but tells them plainly,

1. That the Egyptians shall retreat, and either give back or be forced back into their own land, (Eze. xvii. 17,) which was said of old, (Isa. xxx. 7,) and is here said again, ver. 7; that "the Egyptians shall help in vain;" they shall not dare to face the Chaldean army, but shall retire with precipitation. Note, If God help us not no creature can. As no power can prevail against God, so none can avail without God, nor countervail his departures from us.

2. That the Chaldeans shall return, and shall renew the siege, and prosecute it with more vigour than ever. "They shall not depart" for good and all, ver. 9; "they shall come again," ver. 8; they shall "fight against the city." Note, God has the sovereign command of all the hosts of men, even of those that know him not, that own him not, and they are all made to serve his purposes. He directs their marches, their counter-marches, their retreats, their returns, as pleaseth him; and furious armies, like stormy winds, are fulfilling his word.

3. That Jerusalem shall certainly be delivered into the hand of the Chaldeans; they shall take it and burn it with fire, ver. 8. The sentence passed upon it shall be executed, and they shall be the executioners. O but, (they say,) the Chaldeans are withdrawn, they have quitted the enterprise as impracticable; and though they have, (saith the prophet,) nay, though you had smitten their army, so that many were slain, and all the rest wounded, yet those wounded men should rise up and burn this city, ver. 10. This is designed to speak the doom passed upon Jerusalem irrevocable, and its destruction inevitable; it must be laid in ruins, and these Chaldeans are the men that must do it, and it is now in vain to think of evading the stroke, or contending with it. Note, Whatever instruments God has determined to make use of in any service for him, whether of mercy or judgment, they shall accomplish that for which they are designed, whatever incapacity or disability they may lie under to be reduced to. Those by whom God has resolved to save or to destroy, saviours they shall be, and destroyers they shall be, yea, though they were all wounded. For, as when God has work to do he will not want instruments to do it with, though they may seem far to seek, so, when he has chosen his instruments, they shall do the work, though they may seem very unlikely to accomplish it.

11 And it came to pass, that when the army of the Chaldeans was broken up from Jerusalem for fear of Pharaoh's army, 12 Then Jeremiah went forth out of Jerusalem to go into the land of Benjamin, to separate himself thence in the midst of the people. 13 And when he was in the gate of Benjamin, a captain of the ward was there, whose name was Irijah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Hananiah; and he took Jeremiah the prophet, saying, Thou fallest away to the Chaldeans. 14 Then said Jeremiah, It is false; I fall not away to the Chaldeans. But he hearkened not to him: so Irijah took Jeremiah, and brought him to the princes. 15 Wherefore the princes were wroth with Jeremiah, and smote him, and put him in prison in the house of Jonathan the scribe: for they had made that the prison. 16 When Jeremiah was entered into the dungeon, and into the cabins, and Jeremiah had remained there many days; 17 Then Zedekiah the king sent, and took him out: and the king asked him secretly in his house, and said, Is there any word from the LORD? And Jeremiah said, There is: for, said he, thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon. 18 Moreover Jeremiah said unto king Zedekiah, What have I offended against thee, or against thy servants, or against this people, that ye have put me in prison? 19 Where are now your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, The king of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land? 20 Therefore hear now, I pray thee, O my lord the king: let my supplication, I pray thee, be accepted before thee; that thou cause me not to return to the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there. 21 Then Zedekiah the king commanded that they should commit Jeremiah into the court of the prison, and that they should give him daily a piece of bread out of the bakers' street, until all the bread in the city were spent. Thus Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

We have here a farther account concerning Jeremiah, who relates more passages concerning himself than any other of the prophets; for the histories of the lives and sufferings of God's ministers have been very serviceable to the church, as well as their preaching and writing.

First. We are told that Jeremiah, when he had an opportunity for it, attempted to retire out of Jerusalem into the country, ver. 11, 12. When the Chaldeans had broken up from Jerusalem, because of Pharaoh's army, upon the notice of their advancing towards them, Jeremiah determined to go into the country, and, as the margin reads it, to 'slip away from Jerusalem in the midst of the people,' who in that interval of the siege went out into the country to look after their affairs there. He endeavoured to steal away in the crowd; for, though he was a man of great eminency, he could well reconcile himself to obscurity; though he was one of a thousand he was content to be lost in the multitude, and buried alive in a corner, in a cottage. Whether he designed for Anathoth or no doth not appear; his concerns might call him thither, but his neighbours there were such as, unless they were well mended since, ch. xi. 21, might discourage him from coming among them. Or, whether he did not intend to hide himself somewhere where he was not known, and fulfil his own wish, ch. ix. 2, "O that I had in the wilderness a lodging place!" Jeremiah found he could do no good in Jerusalem, he laboured in vain among them, and therefore determined to leave them. Note, There are times when it is the wisdom of good men to retire into privacy, to "enter into the chamber, and shut the door about them," Isa. xxvi. 20.

Secondly. That in this attempt he was seized as a deserter and committed to prison, ver. 13—15. He was in the gate of Benjamin, so far had he gained his point, when a captain of the ward, who probably had the charge of that gate, discovered him, and took him into custody. He was the grandson of Hananiah, who, the Jews say, was Hananiah the false prophet, that contested with Jeremiah, ch. xxviii. 16; and that this young captain had a spite to Jeremiah upon that account. He could not arrest him without some pretence; and that which he chargeth upon him is, "Thou fallest away to the Chaldeans;" an unlikely story, for the Chaldeans were now gone off. Jeremiah could not reach them; or, if he could, who would go over to a baffled army? Jeremiah therefore, with good reason, and with both the confidence and mildness of an innocent man, denies the charge, "It is false, I fall not away to the Chaldeans," I am going upon my own lawful occasions. Note, It is no new thing for the church's best friends to be represented as in the interest of her worst enemies; thus have the blackest characters been put upon the fairest, purest minds; and in such a malicious world as this is, innocency, nay excellency itself, is no fence against the basest calumny. When at any time we are thus falsly accused we may do as Jeremiah did, boldly deny the charge, and then commit our cause to him that judgeth righteously. Jeremiah's protestation of his integrity, though he be a prophet, a man of God, a man of honour and sincerity, though he be a priest, and is ready to say it in verbo sacerdotis,—'on the word of a priest,'—yet he is not regarded; but he is brought before the privy council, who, without examining him, and the proofs against him, but upon the base, malicious insinuation of the captain, fell into a passion with him. They were wroth; and what justice could be expected from men who, being in anger, would hear no reason? They beat him, without any regard had to his coat and character, and then put him in prison, in the worst prison they had, that in the house of Jonathan the scribe. Either it had been his house, and he had quitted it for the inconveniences of it, but it was thought good enough for a prison, or it was now his house, and perhaps he was a rigid severe man, that made it a house of cruel bondage to his prisoners. Into this prison Jeremiah was thrust, into the dungeon, which was dark and cold, damp and dirty, the most uncomfortable, unhealthful place in it. In the cells or cabins there he must lodge; among which there are no choice, for they are all alike miserable lodging places; there Jeremiah remained many days, and, for aught appears, nobody came near him or inquired after him. See what a world this is; the wicked princes that are in rebellion against God lie at ease, lie in state in their palaces, while godly Jeremiah, that is in the service of God, lies in pain in a loathsome dungeon. It is well there is a world to come.

Thirdly. That Zedekiah at length sent for him, and shewed him some favour; but probably not till the Chaldean army was returned, and had laid fresh siege to the city. When their vain hopes with which they fed themselves, and in confidence of which they had re-enslaved their servants, ch. xxxiv. 11, were all vanished, then they were in a greater confusion and consternation than ever. O then, saith Zedekiah, send in all haste for the prophet; let me have some talk with him. When the Chaldeans were withdrawn, he only sent to the prophet to pray for him; but now they had again invested the city, he sent for him to consult him. Thus gracious will men be when pangs come upon them.

1. The king sent for him to give him private audience as an ambassador from God. He asked him secretly in his house, being ashamed to be seen in his company, "Is there any word from the Lord?" ver. 17; any word of comfort? Canst thou give us any hopes that the Chaldeans shall again retire? Note, Those that will not hearken to God's admonitions when they are in prosperity would be glad of his consolations when they are in adversity, and expect that his ministers should then speak words of peace to them; but how can they expect it? what have they to do with peace? Jeremiah's life and comfort is in Zedekiah's hand, and he has now a petition to present to him for his favour; and yet, having this opportunity, he tells him plainly that there is a word from the Lord, but no word of comfort for him or his people; "Thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon." If Jeremiah had consulted with flesh and blood he would have given him a plausible answer; and, though he would not tell him a lie, yet he might have chosen whether he would tell him the worst at this time; what needed it, when he had so often told it him before? But Jeremiah was one that had obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and would not, to obtain mercy of man, be unfaithful either to God or to his prince; he therefore tells him the truth, the whole truth. And since there was no remedy it would be a kindness to the king to know his doom, that being no surprise to him it might be the less a terror, and he might provide to make the best of bad. Jeremiah takes this occasion to upbraid him and his people with the credit they gave to the false prophets, that told them the king of Babylon should not come at all, or when he was withdrawn should not come again against them; ver. 19, Where are now your prophets that told you you should have peace? Note, Those that deceive themselves with groundless hopes of mercy will justly be twitted with it when the event hath undeceived them.

2. He improved this opportunity for the presenting of a private petition as a poor prisoner, ver. 18, 20. It was not in Jeremiah's power to reverse this sentence God had passed upon Zedekiah; but it was in Zedekiah's power to reverse the sentence which the princes had given against him; and therefore, since he thought him fit to be used as a prophet, he would not think him fit to be abused as the worst of malefactors. He humbly expostulates with the king, "What have I offended against thee, or thy servants, or this people?" what law have I broke, what injury have I done to the common welfare, "that ye have put me in prison?" And many a one that has been very hardly dealt with has been able to make the same appeal, and to make it good. He likewise earnestly begs, and very pathetically, ver. 20, "Cause me not to return to" yonder noisome gaol, to "the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there." This was the language of innocent nature, sensible of its own grievances, and solicitous of its own preservation. Though he was not at all unwilling to die God's martyr, yet having so fair an opportunity to get relief he would not let it slip, lest he should die his own murderer. When Jeremiah delivered God's message he spake as one having authority, with the greatest boldness; but when he presented his own request he spake as one under authority, with the greatest submissiveness; "Hear me, I pray thee, O my Lord the king; let my supplication, I pray thee, be accepted before thee." Here is not a word of complaint of the princes that unjustly committed him, no offering to bring an action of false imprisonment against them, but all in a way of modest supplication to the king; to teach us that, even when we act with the courage that becomes the faithful servants of God, yet we must carry ourselves with the humility and modesty that becomes dutiful subjects to the government God hath set over us. A lion in God's cause must be a lamb in his own. And we find that God gave Jeremiah favour in the eyes of the king. 1st. He gave him his request; took care that he should not die in the dungeon, but ordered he should have the liberty of the court of the prison, where he might have a pleasant walk, and breathe a free air. 2nd. He gave him more than his request; took care he should not die for want, as many did that had their heels at liberty, by reason of the straitness of the siege; he ordered him his daily bread out of the public stock, for the prison was within the verge of the court, till all the bread was spent. Zedekiah ought to have released him, nay, to have preferred him, to have made him a privy counsellor, as Joseph was taken from prison to be the second man in the kingdom; but he had not courage to do that. It was well he did as he did; and it is an instance of the care God takes of his suffering servants that are faithful to him. He can make even their confinement turn to their advantage, and the court of their prison to become as green pastures to them; and raise up such friends to provide for them as that in the days of famine they shall be satisfied; "At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

In this chapter, just as the former, we have Jeremiah greatly debased under the frowns of the princes, and yet greatly honoured by the favour of the king; they used him as a criminal, he used him as a privy counsellor. Here, I. Jeremiah for his faithfulness is put into the dungeon by the princes, ver. 1—6. II. At the intercession of Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, by special order from the king, he is taken up out of the dungeon, and confined only to the court of the prison, ver. 7—12. III. He has a private conference with the king upon the present conjuncture of affairs, ver. 14—23. IV. Care is taken to keep that conference private, ver. 24—28.

THEN Shephatiah the son of Mattan, and Gedaliah the son of Pashur, and Jucal the son of Shelemiah, and Pashur the son of Malchiah, heard the words that Jeremiah had spoken unto all the people, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD, He that remaineth in this city shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth forth to the Chaldeans shall live; for he shall have his life for a prey, and shall live. 3 Thus saith the LORD, This city shall surely be given into the hand of the king of Babylon's army, which shall take it. 4 Therefore the princes said unto the king, We beseech thee, let this man be put to death: for thus he weakeneth the hands of the men of war that remain in this city, and the hands of all the people, in speaking such words unto them: for this man seeketh not the welfare of this people, but the hurt. 5 Then Zedekiah the king said, Behold, he is in your hand: for the king is not he that can do any thing against you. 6 Then took they Jeremiah, and cast him into the dungeon of Malchiah the son of Hammelech, that was in the court of the prison: and they let down Jeremiah with cords. And in the dungeon there was no water, but mire: so Jeremiah sunk in the mire. 7 Now when Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, one of the eunuchs which was in the king's house, heard that they had put Jeremiah in the dungeon; the king then sitting in the gate of Benjamin; 8 Ebed-melech went forth out of the king's house, and spake to the king, saying, 9 My lord the king, these men have done evil in all that they have done to Jeremiah the prophet, whom they have cast into the dungeon; and he is like to die for hunger in the place where he is: for there is no more bread in the city. 10 Then the king commanded Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying, Take from hence thirty men with thee, and take up Jeremiah the prophet out of the dungeon, before he die. 11 So Ebed-melech took the men with him, and went into the house of the king under the treasury, and took thence old cast clouts and old rotten rags, and let them down by cords into the dungeon to Jeremiah. 12 And Ebed-melech the Ethiopian said unto Jeremiah, Put now these old cast clouts and rotten rags under thine armholes under the cords. And Jeremiah did so. 13 So they drew up Jeremiah with cords, and took him up out of the dungeon: and Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

AN EASTERN PRISON.

Here, First. Jeremiah persists in his plain preaching. What he had many a time said he still saith, ver. 3, "This city shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon," though it hold out long it will be taken at last; nor would he have so often repeated this unwelcome message, but that he could put them in a certain way, though not to save the city, yet to save themselves; so that every man might have his own life given him for a prey, if he would be advised, ver. 2. Let him not stay in the city in hopes to defend that, for it will be to no purpose; but let him go forth to the Chaldeans, and throw himself upon their mercy, before things come to extremity, and then he shall live; they will not put him to the sword, but give him quarter, (satis est prostrasse leoni,—'it suffices the lion to lay his antagonist prostrate,') and he shall escape the famine and pestilence, which will be the death of multitudes within the city. Note, Those do better for themselves who patiently submit to the rebukes of providence than those who contend with them; and if we cannot have our liberty we must reckon it a mercy to have our lives, and not foolishly throw them away upon a point of honour; they may be reserved for better times.

Secondly. The princes persist in their malice against Jeremiah. He was faithful to his country and to his trust as a prophet; though he had suffered many a time for his faithfulness, and though at this time he ate the king's bread, yet that did not stop his mouth. But his persecutors were still bitter against him; and complained that he abused the liberty he had of walking in the court of the prison; for, though he could not go to the temple to preach, yet he vented the same things in private conversation to those that came to visit him; and therefore, ver. 4, they represent him to the king as a dangerous man, disaffected to his country, and to the government he lived under; "He seeks not the welfare of this people, but the hurt." An unjust insinuation; for no man had laid out himself more for the good of Jerusalem than he had done. They represent his preaching as having an ill tendency. The design of it was plainly to bring men to repent, and turn to God, which would have been as much as anything a strengthening to the hands both of the soldiery and of the burghers; and yet they represent it as weakening their hands, and discouraging them, which if it did it was their own fault. Note, It is common for wicked people to look upon God's faithful ministers as their enemies, only because they shew them what enemies they are to themselves while they continue impenitent.

Thirdly. Jeremiah hereupon, by the king's permission, is put into a dungeon, with design he shall perish there. Zedekiah, though he was under conviction that Jeremiah was a prophet sent of God, yet he had not courage to own his convictions, but yielded to the violence of his persecutors; ver. 5, "He is in your hand," and a worse sentence he could not have passed upon him. We found in Jehoiakim's reign that the princes were better affected to the prophet than the king was, ch. xxxvi. 25, but now they were more violent against him, a sign they were ripening apace for ruin. Had it been in a cause that concerned his own honour or profit he would have let them know that the king is he who can do what he pleaseth, whethey they will or no; but in the cause of God and his prophet, which he was very cool in, he basely sneaks and truckles to them: "The king is not he that can do any thing against you." Note, Those will have a great deal to answer for who, though they have a secret kindness for good people, dare not own it in a time of need, nor will do what they might do to prevent mischief designed them. The princes having this general warrant from the king presently put poor Jeremiah "into the dungeon of Malchiah, that was in the court of the prison," ver. 6; a deep dungeon, for they let him down into it with cords; and a dirty one, for there was no water in it but mire, stinking mire; and he "sunk in the mire," up to the neck, saith Josephus. They that put him here doubtless designed he should die here, die for hunger, die for cold, and so die miserably, die obscurely, fearing if they should put him to death openly the people might be affected with what he would say, and be incensed against them. Many of God's faithful witnesses have thus been privately made away, and starved to death in prisons, whose blood will be brought to account in the day of discovery. We are not here told what Jeremiah did in this distress; but he tells us himself, Lam. iii. 55, "I called upon thy name, O Lord, out of the low dungeon;" and ver. 57, "Thou drewest near, saying, Fear not."

Fourthly. Application is made to the king by an honest courtier, Ebed-melech, one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber, in behalf of the poor sufferer. Though the princes carried on the matter as privately as they could, yet it came to the ear of this good man, who probably sought opportunities to do good. It may be he came to the knowledge of it by hearing Jeremiah's moans out of the dungeon, for it was in the king's house, ver. 7. Ebed-melech was an Ethiopian, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and yet had in him more humanity, and more divinity too, than native Israelites had. Christ found more faith among Gentiles than among Jews. Ebed-melech lived in a wicked court, and in a very corrupt degenerate age, and yet had a great sense both of equity and piety. God has his remnant in all places, among all sorts. There were saints even in Cæsar's household. The king was now sitting in the gate of Benjamin to try causes, and receive appeals and petitions, or perhaps holding a council of war there. Thither Ebed-melech went immediately to him, for the case would not admit delay; the prophet might have perished if he had trifled or put it off till he had an opportunity of speaking to the king in private. No time must be lost when life is in danger, especially so valuable a life. He boldly asserts that Jeremiah had a great deal of wrong done him, and is not afraid to tell the king so, though they were princes that did it, though they were now present in court, and though they had the king's warrant for what they did. Whither should oppressed innocency flee for protection but to the throne, especially when great men are its oppressors? Ebed-melech appears truly brave in this matter. He doth not mince the matter; though he had a place at court which he would be in danger of losing for his plain dealing, yet he tells the king faithfully, let him take it as he will, "These men have done ill in all that they have done to Jeremiah;" they deal unjustly with him, for he had not deserved any punishment at all; and they have dealt barbarously with him, so as they used not to deal with the vilest malefactors. And they needed not to have put him to this miserable death; for if they had let him alone where he was, "he was likely to die for hunger in the place where he was," in the court of the prison to which he was confined, "for there was no more bread in the city." The stores, out of which he was to have his allowance, ch. xxxvii. 21, were in a manner spent. See how God can raise up friends for his people in distress where they little thought of them; and spirit men for his service, even beyond expectation.

Fifthly. Orders are immediately given for his release, and Ebed-melech takes care to see them executed. The king, who but now durst do nothing against the princes, has his heart wonderfully changed on a sudden, and will now have Jeremiah released in defiance of the princes; for therefore he orders no less than thirty men, and those of the lifeguards, to be employed in fetching him out of the dungeon, lest the princes should raise a party to oppose it, ver. 10. Let this encourage us to appear boldly for God; we may succeed better than we could have thought, for "the hearts of kings are in the hand of God." Ebed-melech gained his point, and soon brought Jeremiah the good news. And it is observable how particularly the manner of his drawing him out of the dungeon is related; for "God is not unrighteous to forget any work or labour of love" which is shewed to his people or ministers; no, nor any circumstance of it, Heb. vi. 10. Special notice is taken of his great tenderness in providing old soft rags for Jeremiah to put under his arm-holes, to keep the cords from hurting him, wherewith he was to be drawn up; his arm-holes being probably galled by the cords wherewith he was let down. Nor did he throw the rags down to him lest they should be lost in the mire, but carefully let them down, ver. 11, 12. Note, Those that are in distress should be not only relieved, but relieved with compassion and marks of respect; all which shall be placed to account, and abound to a good account in the day of recompence. See what a good use even old rotten rags may be put to, which therefore should not be made waste of, no more than broken meat. Even in the king's house, and under the treasury too, these were carefully preserved for the use of the poor or sick. Jeremiah is brought up out of the dungeon, and is now where he was, "in the court of the prison," ver. 13. Perhaps Ebed-melech could have made interest with the king to have got him his discharge from thence also, now he had the king's ear; but he thought him safer and better provided for there than he would be anywhere else. God can, when he pleaseth, make a prison to become a refuge and hiding-place to his people in distress and danger.

14 Then Zedekiah the king sent, and took Jeremiah the prophet unto him into the third entry that is in the house of the LORD: and the king said unto Jeremiah, I will ask thee a thing; hide nothing from me. 15 Then Jeremiah said unto Zedekiah, If I declare it unto thee, wilt thou not surely put me to death? and if I give thee counsel, wilt thou not hearken unto me? 16 So Zedekiah the king sware secretly unto Jeremiah, saying, As the LORD liveth, that made us this soul, I will not put thee to death, neither will I give thee into the hand of these men that seek thy life. 17 Then said Jeremiah unto Zedekiah, Thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel; If thou wilt assuredly go forth unto the king of Babylon's princes, then thy soul shall live, and this city shall not be burned with fire; and thou shalt live, and thine house: 18 But if thou wilt not go forth to the king of Babylon's princes, then shall this city be given into the hand of the Chaldeans, and they shall burn it with fire, and thou shalt not escape out of their hand. 19 And Zedekiah the king said unto Jeremiah, I am afraid of the Jews that are fallen to the Chaldeans, lest they deliver me into their hand, and they mock me. 20 But Jeremiah said, They shall not deliver thee. Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the LORD, which I speak unto thee: so it shall be well unto thee, and thy soul shall live. 21 But if thou refuse to go forth, this is the word that the LORD hath shewed me: 22 And, behold, all the women that are left in the king of Judah's house shall be brought forth to the king of Babylon's princes, and those women shall say, Thy friends have set thee on, and have prevailed against thee: thy feet are sunk in the mire, and they are turned away back. 23 So they shall bring out all thy wives and thy children to the Chaldeans: and thou shalt not escape out of their hand, but shalt be taken by the hand of the king of Babylon: and thou shalt cause this city to be burned with fire. 24 Then said Zedekiah unto Jeremiah, Let no man know of these words, and thou shalt not die. 25 But if the princes hear that I have talked with thee, and they come unto thee, and say unto thee, Declare unto us now what thou hast said unto the king, hide it not from us, and we will not put thee to death; also what the king said unto thee; 26 Then thou shalt say unto them, I presented my supplication before the king, that he would not cause me to return to Jonathan's house, to die there. 27 Then came all the princes unto Jeremiah, and asked him: and he told them according to all these words that the king had commanded. So they left off speaking with him; for the matter was not perceived. 28 So Jeremiah abode in the court of the prison until the day that Jerusalem was taken: and he was there when Jerusalem was taken.

In the foregoing chapter we had the king in close conference with Jeremiah, and here again, though, ver. 5, he had given him up into the hands of his enemies; such a struggle there was in the breast of this unhappy prince, between his convictions and corruptions. Observe,

First. The honour that Zedekiah did to the prophet. When he was newly fetched out of the dungeon he sent for him to advise with him privately. He met him in the third entry, or, as the margin reads it, the principal entry that is in, or leads towards, or adjoins to, the house of the Lord, ver. 14. In appointing this place of interview with the prophet, perhaps he intended to shew a respect and reverence for the house of God, which was proper enough now he was desiring to hear the word of God. Zedekiah would ask Jeremiah a thing, (it should rather be rendered a word,) 'I am here, asking thee for a word of prediction, of counsel, of comfort; a word from the Lord,' ch. xxxvii. 17. 'Whatever word thou hast for me, hide it not from me; let me know the worst. He had been told plainly what things would come to in the foregoing chapter, but, like Balaam, asks again, in hopes to get a more pleasing answer, as if God, who is in one mind, were altogether such a one as himself, who was in many minds.

Secondly. The bargain that Jeremiah made with him before he would give him his advice, ver. 15. He would indent, 1. For his own safety. Zedekiah would have him deal faithfully with him; and if I do, (saith Jeremiah,) "wilt thou not put me to death?" I am afraid thou wilt, (so some take it;) what else can I expect when thou art led blindfold by the princes? Or, wilt thou promise that thou wilt not? Not that Jeremiah was backward to seal the doctrine he preached with his blood when he was called to it; but in doing our duty we ought to use all lawful means for our own preservation; even the apostles of Christ did so. 2. He would indent for the success of his advice, being no less concerned for Zedekiah's welfare than for his own. He is willing to give him wholesome advice, and doth not upbraid him with his unkindness in suffering him to be put into the dungeon; nor bid him go and consult with his princes, whose judgment he had such a value for. Ministers must with meekness instruct even those that oppose themselves, and render good for evil. He is desirous he should hear counsel, and receive instruction. "Wilt thou not hearken to me?" Surely thou wilt. I am in hopes to find thee pliable at last; and now in this thy day willing to "know the things that belong to thy peace." Note, Then, and then only, there is hope of sinners when they are willing to hearken to good counsel. Some read it as spoken despairingly: 'If I give thee counsel, thou wilt not hearken unto me;' I have reason to fear thou wilt not, and then I had as good keep my counsel to myself. Note, Ministers have little heart to speak to those that have long and often turned a deaf ear to them. Now as to this latter concern of Jeremiah's, Zedekiah makes him no answer, will not promise to hearken to his advice. Though he desires to know what is the mind of God, yet he will reserve himself a liberty when he doth know it, to do as he thinks fit; as if it were the prerogative of a prince not to have his ruin prevented by good counsel. But as to the prophet's safety, he promiseth him, upon the word of a king, and confirms his promise with an oath, that, whatever he should say to him, no advantage should be taken against him for it; "I will neither put thee to death," nor deliver thee into the hands of those that will, ver. 16. This he thought was a mighty favour; and yet Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, when Daniel read their doom, not only protected him, but preferred and rewarded him, Dan. ii. 48; v. 29. Zedekiah's oath on this occasion is solemn and very observable; "As the Lord liveth, who made us this soul," who gave me my life, and thee thine; therefore I dare not take away thy life unjustly, knowing that then I should forfeit my own to him that is the Lord of life. Note, God is the father of spirits; souls are his workmanship, and they are more fearfully and wonderfully made than bodies are. The soul both of the greatest prince and of the poorest prisoner is of God's making; he fashioneth their hearts alike easily. In all our appeals to God, and in all our dealings both with ourselves and others, we ought to consider this, that the living God made us these souls.

Thirdly. The good advice that Jeremiah gave him, with good reasons why he should take it, not from any prudence or politics of his own, but in the name of the Lord, the God of hosts, and God of Israel; not as a statesman, but as a prophet. He adviseth him by all means to surrender himself and his city "to the king of Babylon's princes;" Go forth to them, and make the best terms thou canst with them, ver. 17. This was the same advice he had given to the people, ver. 2, and before, ch. xxi. 9, to submit to Divine judgments, and not think of contending with them. Note, In dealing with God, that which is good counsel to the meanest is so to the greatest; for there is no respect of persons with him. To persuade him to take this counsel, he sets before him good and evil, life and death. 1. If he will tamely yield, he shall save his children from the sword, and Jerusalem from the flames. The white flag is yet hung out. If he will but acknowledge God's justice, he shall experience his mercy; "The city shall not be burnt, and thou shalt live, and thy house." But, 2. If he will obstinately stand it out, it will be the ruin both of his house and Jerusalem, ver. 18. For when God judgeth, he will overcome. This is the case of sinners with God; let them humbly submit to his grace and government, and they shall live; let them "take hold on his strength, that they may make peace, and they shall make peace;" but if they harden their hearts against his proposals, it will certainly be to their destruction. They must either bend or break.

Fourthly. The objection which Zedekiah made against the prophet's advice, ver. 19. Jeremiah spoke to him by prophecy, in the name of God; and therefore, if he had had a due regard to the Divine authority, wisdom, and goodness, as soon as he understood what the mind of God was, he should immediately have acquiesced in it, and resolved to observe it without disputing. But, as if it had been the dictate only of Jeremiah's prudence, he advanceth against it some prudential considerations of his own. But human wisdom is folly when it contradicts the Divine counsels. All he suggests is, "I am afraid," not of the Chaldeans,—their princes are men of honour,—but "of the Jews," that are already gone over to the Chaldeans; when they see me follow them, who had so much opposed their going, they will laugh at me, and say, "Art thou also become weak as water?" Isa. xiv. 10. Now, 1. It was not at all likely that he should be thus exposed and ridiculed, that the Chaldeans should so far gratify the Jews, or trample upon him, as to deliver him into their hands; nor that the Jews, who were themselves captives, should be in such a gay humour as to make a jest of the misery of their prince. Note, We often frighten ourselves from our duty by foolish, causeless, groundless fears, that are merely the creatures of our own fancy and imagination. 2. If he should be taunted a little by the Jews, could he not despise it and make light of it? What harm would it do him? Note, Those have very weak and fretful spirits indeed that cannot be laughed at, for that which is both their duty and their interest. 3. Though it had been really the greatest personal mischief that he could have imagined it to be, yet he ought to have ventured it in obedience to God, and for the preservation of his family and city. He thought it would be looked upon as a piece of cowardice to surrender; whereas it would be really an instance of true courage cheerfully to bear a lesser evil, the mocking of the Jews, for the avoiding of a greater, the ruin of his family and kingdom.

Fifthly. The pressing importunity with which Jeremiah followed the advice he had given the king. He assures him that, if he would comply with the will of God herein, the thing he feared should not come upon him; ver. 29, "They shall not deliver thee up," but treat thee as becomes thy character. He begs of him, after all the foolish games he had played, to manage wisely the last stake, and now at length do well for himself. "Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the Lord," because it is his voice, "so it shall be well unto thee." But he tells him what would be the consequence if he would not obey: 1. He himself would fall into the hands of the Chaldeans, as implacable enemies, whom he might now make his friends by throwing himself into their hands. If he must fall, he should contrive how to fall easily. "Thou shalt not escape," as thou hopest to do, ver. 23. 2. He would himself be chargeable with the destruction of Jerusalem, which he pretended a concern for the preservation of; "Thou shalt cause this city to be burnt with fire;" for by a little submission and self-denial thou mightest have prevented it. Thus subjects often suffer for the pride and wilfulness of their rulers, who should be their protectors, but prove their destroyers. 3. Whereas he causelessly feared an unjust reproach for surrendering, he should certainly fall under a just reproach for standing it out, and that from women too, ver. 22. The court ladies that were left when Jehoiakim and Jeconiah were carried away, will now at length fall into the hands of the enemy, and they shall say, 'The men of thy peace,' whom thou didst consult with, and confide in, and who promised thee peace if thou wouldst be ruled by them, they have set thee on, have encouraged thee to be bold and brave, and hold out to the last extremity, and see what comes of it? They, by prevailing upon thee, have prevailed against thee, and thou findest those thy real enemies that would be thought thine only friends. Now "thy feet are sunk in the mire," thou art embarrassed, and hast no way to help thyself; thy feet cannot get forward, but are turned away back. Thus will Zedekiah be bantered by the women, when all his wives and children shall be made a prey to the conquerors, ver. 23. Note, That what we seek to avoid by sin will be justly brought upon us by the righteousness of God. And those that decline the way of duty, for fear of reproach, will certainly meet with much greater reproach in the way of disobedience. "The fear of the wicked it shall come upon him," Pr. x. 24.

Sixthly. The care which Zedekiah took to keep this conference private; ver. 24, "Let no man know of these words." He doth not at all incline to take God's counsel, nor so much as promise to consider of it; for so obstinate has he been to the calls of God, and so wilful in the ways of sin, that, though he has good counsel given him, he seems to be given up to walk in his own counsels. He hath nothing to object against Jeremiah's advice, and yet he will not follow it. Many hear God's words, but will not do them.

1. Jeremiah is charged to let no man know of what had passed between the king and him. Zedekiah is concerned to keep it private, not so much for Jeremiah's safety, (for he knew the princes could do him no hurt without his permission,) but for his own reputation. Note, Many have really a better affection to good men and good things than they are willing to own. God's prophets are manifest in their consciences, 2 Cor. v. 11, but they care not for manifesting that to the world; they would rather do them a kindness than have it known that they do. Such, it is to be feared, "love the praise of man more than the praise of God."

2. He is instructed what to say to the princes if they should examine him about it. He must tell them that he was petitioning the king not to remand him to "the house of Jonathan the scribe," ver. 25, 26; and he did tell them so, ver. 27; and, no doubt, it was true. He would not let slip so fair an opportunity of engaging the king's favour; so that this was no lie or equivocation, but a part of the truth, which it was lawful for him to put them off with when he was under no obligation at all to tell them the whole truth. Note, Though we must be so harmless as doves as never to tell a lie, yet we must be so wise as serpents as not needlessly to expose ourselves to danger by telling all we know.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

As the prophet Isaiah, after he had largely foretold the deliverance of Jerusalem out of the hands of the king of Assyria, gave a particular narrative of the story, that it might appear how exactly the event answered the prediction, so the prophet Jeremiah, after he had largely foretold the delivering of Jerusalem into the hands of the king of Babylon, gives a particular account of that sad event, for the same reason. That melancholy story we have in this chapter, which serves to disprove the false flattering prophets, and to confirm the word of God's messengers. We are here told, I. That Jerusalem, after eighteen months' siege, was taken by the Chaldean army, ver. 1—3. II. That king Zedekiah, attempting to make his escape, was seized, and made a miserable captive to the king of Babylon, ver. 4—7. III. That Jerusalem was burnt to the ground, and the people carried captive, except the poor, ver. 8—10. IV. That the Chaldeans were very kind to Jeremiah, and took particular care of him, ver. 11—14. V. That Ebed-melech too, for his kindness, had a protection from God himself in this day of desolation, ver. 15—18.

IN the ninth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the tenth month, came Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon and all his army against Jerusalem, and they besieged it. 2 And in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, in the fourth month, the ninth day of the month, the city was broken up. 3 And all the princes of the king of Babylon came in, and sat in the middle gate, even Nergal-sharezer, Samgar-nebo, Sarsechim, Rab-saris, Nergal-sharezer, Rab-mag, with all the residue of the princes of the king of Babylon. 4 And it came to pass, that when Zedekiah the king of Judah saw them, and all the men of war, then they fled, and went forth out of the city by night, by the way of the king's garden, by the gate betwixt the two walls: and he went out the way of the plain. 5 But the Chaldeans' army pursued after them, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho: and when they had taken him, they brought him up to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon to Riblah in the land of Hamath, where he gave judgment upon him. 6 Then the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah in Riblah before his eyes: also the king of Babylon slew all the nobles of Judah. 7 Moreover he put out Zedekiah's eyes, and bound him with chains, to carry him to

Babylon. 8 And the Chaldeans burned the king's house, and the houses of the people, with fire, and brake down the walls of Jerusalem. 9 Then Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive into Babylon the remnant of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to him, with the rest of the people that remained. 10 But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left of the poor of the people, which had nothing, in the land of Judah, and gave them vineyards and fields at the same time.

We are told in the close of the foregoing chapter, that Jeremiah abode patiently "in the court of the prison till the day that Jerusalem was taken." He gave the princes no farther disturbance by his prophesying, nor they him by their persecutions; for he had no more to say than what he had said, and the siege being carried on briskly God found them other work to do. And see here what it came to.

First. The city is at length taken by storm, for how could it hold out when God himself fought against it? Nebuchadnezzar's army sat down before it in the ninth year of Zedekiah, in the tenth month, ver. 1, in the depth of winter. Nebuchadnezzar himself soon after retired to take his pleasure, and left his generals to carry on the siege; they intermitted it a while, but soon renewed it with redoubled force and vigour. At length, in the eleventh year, in the fourth month, about midsummer, they entered the city, the soldiers being so weakened with famine, and all their provisions being now spent, that they were not able to make any resistance, ver. 2. Jerusalem was so strong a place, that nobody would have believed the enemy could ever have entered its gates, Lam. iv. 12. But sin had provoked God to withdraw his protection, and then, like Samson when his hair is cut, it is weak as other cities.

Secondly. The princes of the king of Babylon take possession of the middle gate, ver. 3. Some think it was the same with that which is called the second gate, Zep. i. 10, which is supposed to be in the middle wall that divided between one part of the city and the other. Here they cautiously made a halt, and durst not go forward into so large a city, among men that perhaps would sell their lives as dear as they could, till they had given directions for the searching of all places, that they might not be surprised by any ambush. They sat in the middle gate, from thence to take a view of the city, and give orders, The princes are here named; rough and uncouth names they are, to intimate what a sad change sin had made. There where Eliakim and Hilkiah, who bare the name of the God of Israel, used to sit, now sit Nergal-sharezer and Samgar-nebo, &c., who bear the names of the heathen gods. Rab-saris and Rab-mag are supposed to be, not the names of distinct persons, but the titles of those whose names go before; Sarsechim was Rab-saris, that is, captain of the guard; and Nergal-sharezer, to distinguish him from the other of the same name that is put first, is called Rab-mag, camp-master, either muster-master or quarter-master. These and other the great generals sat in the gate. And now was fulfilled what Jeremiah prophesied long since, ch. i. 15, that the families of the kingdoms of the north should set every one his throne at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem. Justly do the princes of the heathen set up themselves there where the gods of the heathen had been so often set up.

Thirdly. Zedekiah having, in disguise perhaps, seen the princes of the king of Babylon take possession of one of the gates of the city, thought it high time to shift for his own safety; and, loaded with guilt and fear, he went out of the city, under no other protection but that of the night, ver. 4, which soon failed him, for he was discovered, pursued, overtaken. Though he made the best of his way, he could make nothing of it, could not get forward, but in the plains of Jericho fell into the hands of the pursuers, ver. 5; thence he was brought prisoner to Riblah, where the king of Babylon passed sentence upon him as a rebel, not sentence of death, but, one may almost say, a worse thing. For, 1. He slew his sons before his eyes, and they must all be little, some of them infants, for Zedekiah himself was now but thirty-two years of age. The deaths of these sweet babes must needs be so many deaths to himself, especially when he considered that his own obstinacy was the cause of it; for he was particularly told of this thing, ch.-xxxviii. 23, "They shall bring forth thy wives and children to the Chaldeans." 2. He slew all the nobles of Judah, ver. 6; probably not those princes of Jerusalem who had advised him to this desperate course, (it would be a satisfaction to him to see them cut off,) but the great men of the country who were innocent of the matter. 3. He ordered Zedekiah to have his eyes put out, ver. 7; so condemning him to darkness for life who had shut his eyes against the clear light of God's word, and was of those princes who will not understand, but walk in darkness, Ps. viii. 5. 4. He bound him with two 'brazen chains or fetters,' so the margin reads it, to carry him to Babylon, there to spend the rest of his days in misery. All this sad story we had before, 2 Kin. xxv. 4, &c.

Fourthly. Some time after, the city was burnt, temple, and palace, and all, and the wall of it broken down, ver. 8. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, this comes of killing the prophets, and stoning them that were sent to thee! O Zedekiah, Zedekiah, this thou mightest have prevented, if thou wouldest but have taken God's counsel, and yielded in time!

Fifthly. The people that were left were all carried captives to Babylon, ver. 9. Now they must bid a final farewell to the land of their nativity, that pleasant land, and to all their possessions and enjoyments in it; must be driven some hundreds of miles like beasts before their conquerors, that were now their cruel masters; must lie at their mercy in a strange land, and be servants to them who would be sure to rule them with rigour. The word tyrant is originally a Chaldee word, and is often used for lords by the Chaldee paraphrast, as if the Chaldeans, when they were lords, tyrannized more than any other. We have reason to think the poor Jews had reason to say so. Some few were left behind, but they were the poor of the people, that had nothing to lose, and therefore never made any resistance. And they not only had their liberty, and were left to tarry at home, but "the captain of the guard gave them vineyards and fields at the same time," such as they never were masters of before, ver. 10. Observe here, 1. The wonderful changes of providence. Some are abased, others advanced, 1 Sam. ii. 5; "the hungry filled with good things, and the rich sent empty away." The ruin of some proves the rise of others. Let us therefore rejoice as though we rejoiced not in our abundance, and weep as though we wept not in our distresses. 2. The just retributions of providence. The rich had been proud oppressors, and now they are justly punished for their injustice; the poor had been patient sufferers, and now they are graciously rewarded for their patience, and amends made them for all their losses; for "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth," even in this world, much more in the other.

11 Now Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon gave charge concerning Jeremiah to Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard, saying, 12 Take him, and look well to him, and do him no harm; but do unto him even as he shall say unto thee. 13 So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard sent, and Nebushasban, Rab-saris, and Nergal-sharezer, Rab-mag, and all the king of Babylon's princes; 14 Even they sent, and took Jeremiah out of the court of the prison, and committed him unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, that he should carry him home: so he dwelt among the people. 15 Now the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah, while he was shut up in the court of the prison, saying, 16 Go and speak to Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying,

Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Behold, I will bring my words upon this city
For evil, and not for good;
And they shall be accomplished in that day before thee.
17 But I will deliver thee in that day, saith the LORD:
And thou shalt not be given into the hand
Of the men of whom thou art afraid.
18 For I will surely deliver thee,
And thou shalt not fall by the sword,
But thy life shall be for a prey unto thee:
Because thou hast put thy trust in me, saith the LORD.

Here we must sing of mercy, as in the former part of the chapter we sung of judgment, and must sing unto God of both. We may observe here,

First. A gracious providence concerning Jeremiah. When Jerusalem was laid in ruins, and all men's hearts failed them for fear, then might he lift up his head with comfort, knowing that his redemption drew nigh; as Christ's followers, when the second destruction of Jerusalem was hastening on, Lu. xxi. 28. Nebuchadnezzar had given particular orders that care should be taken of him, and he should be in all respects well used, ver. 11, 12. Nebuzar-adan, and the rest of the king of Babylon's princes observed these orders, discharged him out of prison, and did every thing to make him easy. Now we may look upon this,

1. As a very generous act in Nebuchadnezzar, who, though he was a haughty potentate, yet took cognizance of this poor prophet. Doubtless he had received information concerning him from the deserters, that he had foretold the king of Babylon's successes against Judah and other countries, that he had pressed his prince and people to submit to him, and that he had suffered very hard things for so doing; and in consideration of all this (though perhaps he might have heard also that he had foretold the destruction of Babylon at length) he gave him these extraordinary marks of his favour. Note, It is the character of a great soul to take notice of the services and sufferings of the meanest. It was honourably done of the king to give this charge, even before the city was taken, and of the captains to observe it, even in the heat of action, and it is recorded for imitation.

2. As a reproach to Zedekiah and the princes of Israel; they put him into prison, and the king of Babylon and his princes took him out. God's people and ministers have often found fairer and kinder usage among strangers and infidels, than among those that call themselves of the holy city. St. Paul found more favour and justice with king Agrippa than with Ananias the high priest.

3. As the performance of God's promise to Jeremiah, in recompence for his services; ch. xv. 11, "I will cause the enemy to treat thee well in the day of evil." Jeremiah had been faithful to his trust as a prophet, and now God approves himself faithful to him, and the promise he had made him. Now he is comforted according to the time wherein he had been afflicted, and sees thousands fall on each hand, and himself safe. The false prophets fell by those judgments which they said should never come, ch. xiv. 15; which made their misery the more terrible to them. The true prophet escaped those judgments which he said would come, and that made his escape the more comfortable to him. The same that were the instruments of punishing the persecutors were the instruments of relieving the persecuted; and Jeremiah thought never the worse of his deliverance for its coming by the hand of the king of Babylon, but saw the more of the hand of God in it. A fuller account of this matter we shall meet with in the next chapter.

Secondly. A gracious message to Ebed-melech, to assure him of a recompence for his kindness to Jeremiah. This message was sent him by Jeremiah himself, who, when he returned him thanks for his kindness to him, thus turned him over to God to be his paymaster. He relieved a prophet in the name of a prophet, and thus he had a prophet's reward. This message was delivered to him immediately after he had done that kindness to Jeremiah; but it is mentioned here after the taking of the city, to shew that, as God was kind to Jeremiah at that time, so he was to Ebed-melech for his sake, and it was a token of special favour to both; and they ought so to account it, that they were not involved in any of the common calamities. Jeremiah is bid to tell him, 1. That God would certainly bring upon Jerusalem the ruin that had been long and often threatened; and for his farther satisfaction in having been kind to Jeremiah, he should see him abundantly proved a true prophet, ver. 16. 2. That God took notice of the fear he had of the judgments coming. Though he was bravely bold in the service of God, yet he was afraid of the rod of God. The enemies were men of whom he was afraid. Note, God knows how to adapt and accommodate his comforts to the fears and griefs of his people, for he knows their souls in adversity. 3. That he shall be delivered from having a share in the common calamity; "I will deliver thee, I will surely deliver thee." He had been instrumental to deliver God's prophet out of the dungeon, and now God promised to deliver him, for he will be behindhand with none for any service they do, directly or indirectly, for his name. Thou hast saved Jeremiah's life, that was precious to thee, and therefore thy life shall be given thee for a prey. 4. The reason given for this distinguishing favour God had in store for him is, "Because thou hast put thy trust in me, saith the Lord." God, in recompensing men's services, has an eye to the principle they go upon in those services, and rewards according to those principles. And there is no principle of obedience that will be more acceptable to God, nor have a greater influence upon us, than a believing confidence in God. Ebed-melech trusted in God, that he would own him and stand by him, and then he was not afraid of the face of man. And those who trust God as this good man did in the way of duty will find that their hope shall not make them ashamed in times of the greatest danger.

CHAPTER XL.

We have attended Jerusalem's funeral pile, and have taken our leave of the captives that were carried to Babylon, not expecting to hear any more of them in this book, (perhaps we may in Ezekiel,) and must in this and the following chapters observe the story of the few Jews that were left to remain in the land, after their brethren were carried away; and it is a very melancholy story. For, though at first there were some hopeful prospects of their well-doing, they soon appeared as obstinate in sin as ever, unhumbled, unreformed, till all the rest of the judgments threatened in Deu. xxviii. being brought upon them, that which in the last verse of that dreadful chapter completes the threatenings was accomplished, "The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again." In this chapter we have, I. A more particular account of Jeremiah's discharge, and his settlement with Gedaliah, ver. 1—6. II. The great resort of the Jews that remained scattered in the neighbouring countries to Gedaliah, who was made their governor, under the king of Babylon; and the good posture they were in for a while under him, ver. 7—12. III. A treacherous design formed against Gedaliah by Ishmael, which we shall find executed in the next chapter, ver. 13—16.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, after that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had let him go from Ramah, when he had taken him being bound in chains among all that were carried away captive of Jerusalem and Judah, which were carried away captive unto Babylon. 2 And the captain of the guard took Jeremiah, and said unto him, The LORD thy God hath pronounced this evil upon this place. 3 Now the LORD hath brought it, and done according as he hath said: because ye have sinned against the LORD, and have not obeyed his voice, therefore this thing is come upon you. 4 And now, behold, I loose thee this day from the chains which were upon thine hand. If it seem good unto thee to come with me into Babylon, come; and I will look well unto thee: but if it seem ill unto thee to come with me into Babylon, forbear: behold, all the land is before thee; whither it seemeth good and convenient for thee to go, thither go. 5 Now while he was not yet gone back, he said, Go back also to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, whom the king of Babylon hath made governor over the cities of Judah, and dwell with him among the people: or go wheresoever it seemeth convenient unto thee to go. So the captain of the guard gave him victuals and a reward, and let him go. 6 Then went Jeremiah unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and dwelt with him among the people that were left in the land.

The title of this part of the book, which begins the chapter, seems misapplied, "The word which came to Jeremiah;" for here is nothing of prophecy in this chapter, but it is to be referred to ch. xlii. 7, where we have a message that God sent by Jeremiah to the captains and the people that remained, and the story betwixt, and that is only to introduce that prophecy and shew the occasion of it, that it may be the better understood; and Jeremiah, being himself concerned in the story, was the better able to give an account of it. In these verses we have Jeremiah's adhering, by the advice of Nebuzar-adan, to Gedaliah. It should seem that Jeremiah was very honourably fetched out of the court of the prison by the king of Babylon's princes, ch. xxxix. 15; but afterwards, being found among the people in the city, when orders were given to the inferior officers to bind all they found that were of any fashion, in order to their being carried captives to Babylon, he through ignorance and mistake was bound among the rest and hurried away. Poor man! he seems to have been born to hardship and abuse, a man of sorrows indeed. But when the captives were brought manacled to Ramah, not far off, where a counsel of war or court-martial was held, for giving orders concerning them, Jeremiah was soon distinguished from the rest, and by special order of the court was discharged.

First. The captain of the guard solemnly owns him to be a true prophet; ver. 2, 3, "The Lord thy God," whose messenger thou hast been, and in whose name thou hast spoken, "has" by thee "pronounced this evil upon this place;" they had fair warning given them of it, but they would not take the warning, and now "the Lord hath brought it," and as by thy mouth he said it so by my hand "he hath done what he said." He seems thus to justify what he had done, and to glory in it that he had been God's instrument to fulfil that which Jeremiah had been his messenger to foretell; and upon that account it was indeed the most glorious action he had ever done. He tells all the people that were now in chains before him, it was "because ye have sinned against the Lord that this thing is come upon you." The princes of Israel would never be brought to acknowledge this, though it was as evident as if it had been written with a sunbeam. But this heathen prince plainly sees it, that a people that had been so favoured as they had been by the Divine goodness would never have been abandoned thus had they not been very provoking. The people of Israel had been often told this from the pulpit by their prophets, and they would not regard it; now they are told it from the bench by their conqueror, whom they dare not contradict, and who will make them regard it. Note, Sooner or later men shall be made sensible that their sin is the cause of all their miseries.

Secondly. He gives him free leave to dispose of himself as he thought fit. He "loosed him from his chains," a second time, ver. 4, invited him to come along with him to Babylon, not as a captive, but as a friend, as a companion, and 'I will set my eye upon thee,' (so the word is,) not only "I will look well to thee," but I will shew thee respect, will countenance thee, and will see that thou be safe and well provided for. But if he were not disposed to go to Babylon he might dwell where he pleased in his own country, for it was all now at the dispose of the conquerors; he may go to Anathoth if he please, and enjoy the field he had purchased there. A great change with this good man! He that but lately was tossed from one prison to another may now walk at liberty from one possession to another.

Thirdly. He adviseth him to go to Gedaliah, and settle with him. This Gedaliah was made governor of the land under the king of Babylon, an honest Jew, who, it is probable, betimes went over with his friends to the Chaldeans, and approved himself so well that he had this great trust put into his hands, ver. 5, while Jeremiah was not yet gone back, but stood considering what he should do. Nebuzar-adan, perceiving him neither inclined to go to Babylon nor determined whither to go, turned the scale for him, and bade him by all means go to Gedaliah. Sudden thoughts sometimes prove wise ones; but when he gave this counsel he did not design to oblige him by it, nor will he take it ill if he do not follow it, "Go wheresoever it seemeth convenient unto thee." It is friendly in such cases to give advice, but unfriendly to prescribe, and to be angry if our advice be not taken. Let Jeremiah steer what course he pleaseth, Nebuzar-adan will agree to it, and believe he doth for the best. Nor doth he only give him his liberty, and an approbation of the measures he shall take, but provides for his support, "he gave him victuals, and a present," either in clothes or money, and so let him go. See how considerate the captain of the guard was in his kindness to Jeremiah; he set him at liberty, but it was in a country that was laid waste, and in which, as the posture of it now was, he might have perished, though it was his own country, if he had not thus kindly furnished him with necessaries. Jeremiah not only accepted his kindness, but took his advice, and went to Gedaliah, to Mizpah, and dwelt with him, ver. 6. Whether we may herein commend his prudence I know not, the event doth not commend it, for it did not prove at all to his comfort. However, we may commend his pious affection to the land of Israel, that unless he were forced out of it as Ezekiel, and Daniel, and other good men were, he would not forsake it, but chose rather to dwell with the poor in the holy land than with princes in an unholy one.

7 Now when all the captains of the forces which were in the fields, even they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah the son of Ahikam governor in the land, and had committed unto him men, and women, and children, and of the poor of the land, of them that were not carried away captive to Babylon; 8 Then they came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, even Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and Johanan and Jonathan the sons of Kareah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth, and the sons of Ephai the Netophathite, and Jezaniah the son of a Maachathite, they and their men. 9 And Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan sware unto them and to their men, saying, Fear not to serve the Chaldeans: dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you. 10 As for me, behold, I will dwell at Mizpah, to serve the Chaldeans, which will come unto us: but ye, gather ye wine, and summer fruits, and oil, and put them in your vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken. 11 Likewise when all the Jews that were in Moab, and among the Ammonites, and in Edom, and that were in all the countries, heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant of Judah, and that he had set over them Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan; 12 Even all the Jews returned out of all places whither they were driven, and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah, unto Mizpah, and gathered wine and summer fruits very much. 13 Moreover Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were in the fields, came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, 14 And said unto him, Dost thou certainly know that Baalis the king of the Ammonites hath sent Ishmael the son of Nethaniah to slay thee? But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam believed them not. 15 Then Johanan the son of Kareah spake to Gedaliah in Mizpah secretly, saying, Let me go, I pray thee, and I will slay Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and no man shall know it: wherefore should he slay thee, that all the Jews which are gathered unto thee should be scattered, and the remnant in Judah perish? 16 But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam said unto Johanan the son of Kareah, Thou shalt not do this thing: for thou speakest falsely of Ishmael.

We have in these verses,

First. A bright sky opening upon the remnant of the Jews that were left in their own land, and a comfortable prospect given them of some peace and quietness after the many years of trouble and terror with which they had been afflicted. Jeremiah indeed had never, in his prophecies, spoken of any such good days reserved for the Jews immediately after the captivity. But Providence seemed to raise and encourage such an expectation, and it would be to that miserable people as life from the dead. Observe the particulars:

1. Gedaliah, one of themselves, is made governor in the land by the king of Babylon, ver. 7. To shew that he designed to make and keep them easy, he did not give this commission to one of the princes of Babylon, but to one of their brethren, who they might be sure would seek their peace. He was the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, one of the princes. We read of his father, ch. xxvi. 24, that he took Jeremiah's part against the people. He seems to be a man of great wisdom and a mild temper, and under whose government the few that were left might be very happy. The king of Babylon had a good opinion of him, and reposed a confidence in him, for to him he committed all that were left behind.

2. There is a great resort to him from all parts, and all those that were now the Jews of the dispersion came and put themselves under his government and protection. 1st. The great men that had escaped the Chaldeans by force came and quietly submitted to Gedaliah, for their own safety and common preservation. Divers are here named, ver. 8; they came with their men, their servants, their soldiers, and so strengthened one another; and the king of Babylon had such a good opinion of Gedaliah, his delegate, that he was not at all jealous of the increase of their numbers, but rather pleased with it. 2nd. The poor men that had escaped by flight into the neighbouring countries of Moab, Ammon, and Edom, were induced, by the love they bare to their own land, to return to it again, as soon as they heard that Gedaliah was in authority there, ver. 11, 12. Canaan itself would be an unsafe, unpleasant country, if there was no government or governors there, and those that loved it dearly would not come back to it till they had heard there was. It would be a great reviving to them that were dispersed, to come together again; that were dispersed into foreign countries, to come together in their own country; that were under strange kings, to be under a governor of their own nation. See here, in wrath God remembered mercy, and admitted some of them upon a farther trial of their obedience.

3. The model of this new government is drawn up and settled by an original contract, which Gedaliah confirmed with an oath, a solemn oath; ver. 9, "He sware to them and to their men;" it is probable according to the warrant and instructions he had received from the king of Babylon, who empowered him to give them these assurances. 1st. They must own the property of their lands to be in the Chaldeans. Come, saith Gedaliah, "Fear not to serve the Chaldeans:" fear not the sin of it. Though the Divine law had forbidden them to make leagues with the heathen, yet the Divine sentence had obliged them to yield to the king of Babylon. Fear not the reproach of it and the disparagement it will be to your nation; it is what God has brought you to, has bound you to, and it is no disgrace to any to comply with him. Fear not the consequences of it, as if it would certainly make you and yours miserable; no, you will find the king of Babylon not so hard a landlord as you apprehend him to be. If you will but live peaceably, peaceably you shall live; disturb not the government, and it will not disturb you; "Serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you." If they should make any difficulty of doing personal homage, or should be apprehensive of danger when the Chaldeans should come among them, Gedaliah, probably by instruction from the king of Babylon, undertakes upon all occasions to act for them, and make their applications acceptable to the king; ver. 10, "As for me, behold I will dwell at Mizpah to serve the Chaldeans," to do homage to them in the name of the whole body, if there be occasion; to receive orders, and to pay them their tribute when they come to us. All that passed between them and the Chaldeans shall pass through his hand; and if the Chaldeans put such a confidence in him, surely his own countrymen may venture to do it. Gedaliah is willing thus to give them the assurance of an oath that he will do his part in protecting them; but being apt to err, as many men are, on the charitable side, he did not require an oath from them that they would be faithful to him, else the following mischief might have been prevented. However, protection draws allegiance, though it be not sworn; and by joining in with Gedaliah they did in effect consent to the terms of government, that they should serve the king of Babylon. But, 2nd. Though they own the property of their lands to be in the Chaldeans, yet upon that condition they shall have the free enjoyment of them, and all the profits of them; ver. 10, "Gather ye wine and summer fruits," and take them for your own use, "put them into your vessels," to be laid up for winter store, as those do that live in a land of peace, and hope to eat the labour of your hand; nay, the labour of other people's hands, for you reap what they sowed; nay, perhaps they were the spontaneous products of that fertile soil, for which none had laboured. And accordingly we find, ver. 12, that they gathered wine and summer fruits very much, such as were at present upon the ground, for their corn harvest was over some time before Jerusalem was taken. While Gedaliah was in care for the public safety, he left them to enjoy the advantages of the public plenty, and, for aught appears, demanded no tribute from them, for he sought not his own profit, but the profit of many.

Secondly. Here is a dark cloud gathering over this infant state, and threatening a dreadful storm. How soon is this hopeful prospect blasted! For when God begins in judgment he will make an end. It is here intimated to us,

1. That Baalis, the king of the Ammonites, had a particular spite at Gedaliah, and was contriving to take him off, either out of malice to the nation of the Jews, whose welfare he hated the thought of, or a personal pique against Gedaliah, ver. 14. Some make Baalis to signify the queen mother of the king of the Ammonites, or queen dowager, as if she were the first mover of this bloody and treacherous design. One would have thought this little remnant might have been safe when the great king of Babylon protected it, and yet it is ruined by the artifices of this petty prince or princess. Happy they that have the King of kings on their side, who can take the wise in their own craftiness; for the greatest earthly king cannot, with all his power, secure us against fraud and treachery.

2. That he employed Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, as the instrument of his malice, instigated him to murder Gedaliah, and, that he might have a fair opportunity to do it, directed him to go and enrol himself among his subjects and promise him fealty. Nothing could be more barbarous than the design itself, nor more base than the method of compassing it. How wretchedly is the human nature corrupted and degenerated, even in those that pretend to the best blood, when it is capable of admitting the thought of such abominable wickedness! Ishmael was of the seed-royal, and would therefore be easily tempted to envy and hate one that set up for a governor in Judah that was not, as he was, of David's line, though he were never so much of David's spirit.

3. That Johanan, a brisk and active man, having got scent of this plot, informed Gedaliah of it, yet taking it for granted he could not but know of it before, the proofs of the matter being so very plain: "Dost thou certainly know?" that is, sure thou dost, ver. 14. He gave him private intelligence of it, ver. 15, hoping he would then take the more notice of it. He proffered his service to prevent it by taking off Ishmael, whose very name was ominous to all the seed of Isaac; "I will slay him. Wherefore should he slay thee?" Herein he shewed more courage and zeal than sense of justice, for if it be lawful to kill for prevention who then can be safe, since malice always suspects the worst?

4. That Gedaliah, being a man of sincerity himself, would by no means give credit to the information given him of Ishmael's treachery; he said, "Thou speakest falsely of Ishmael." Herein he discovered more good humour than discretion, more of the innocency of the dove than the wisdom of the serpent. Princes become uneasy to themselves and all about them when they are jealous. Queen Elizabeth said she would believe no more evil by her people than a mother would believe by her own children; yet many have been ruined by being over confident of the fidelity of those about them.

CHAPTER XLI.

It is a very tragical story that is related in this chapter, and shews that evil pursues sinners. The black cloud that was gathering in the foregoing chapter here bursts in a dreadful storm. Those few Jews that escaped the captivity were proud to think that they were still in their own land, when their brethren were gone they knew not whither; were fond of the wine and summer fruits they had gathered, and were very secure under Gedaliah's protectorship, when on a sudden even these remains prove ruins too. I. Gedaliah is barbarously slain by Ishmael, ver. 1, 2. II. All the Jews that were with him were slain likewise, ver. 3, and a pit filled with their dead bodies, ver. 9. III. Some devout men, to the number of fourscore, that were going towards Jerusalem, were drawn in by Ishmael, and murdered likewise, ver. 4—7; only ten of them escaped, ver. 8. IV. Those that escaped the sword were taken prisoners by Ishmael, and carried off towards the country of the Ammonites, ver. 10. V. By the conduct and courage of Johanan, though the death of the slain is not revenged, yet the prisoners are recovered, and he now becomes their commander-in-chief, ver. 11—16. VI. His project is to carry them into the land of Egypt, ver. 17, 18; which we shall hear more of in the next chapter.

NOW it came to pass in the seventh month, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah the son of Elishama, of the seed royal, and the princes of the king, even ten men with him, came unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and there they did eat bread together in Mizpah. 2 Then arose Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and the ten men that were with him, and smote Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan with the sword, and slew him, whom the king of Babylon had made governor over the land. 3 Ishmael also slew all the Jews that were with him, even with Gedaliah, at Mizpah, and the Chaldeans that were found there, and the men of war. 4 And it came to pass the second day after he had slain Gedaliah, and no man knew it,

5 That there came certain from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria, even fourscore men, having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves, with offerings and incense in their hand, to bring them to the house of the LORD. 6 And Ishmael the son of Nethaniah went forth from Mizpah to meet them, weeping all along as he went: and it came to pass, as he met them, he said unto them, Come to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam. 7 And it was so, when they came into the midst of the city, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah slew them, and cast them into the midst of the pit, he, and the men that were with him. 8 But ten men were found among them that said unto Ishmael, Slay us not: for we have treasures in the field, of wheat, and of barley, and of oil, and of honey. So he forbare, and slew them not among their brethren. 9 Now the pit wherein Ishmael had cast all the dead bodies of the men, whom he had slain because of Gedaliah, was it which Asa the king had made for fear of Baasha king of Israel: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah filled it with them that were slain. 10 Then Ishmael carried away captive all the residue of the people that were in Mizpah, even the king's daughters, and all the people that remained in Mizpah, whom Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had committed to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah carried them away captive, and departed to go over to the Ammonites.

It is hard to say which is more astonishing, God's permitting, or men's perpetrating, such villanies as here we find committed. Such base, barbarous, bloody work is here done by men who by their birth should have been men of honour, by their religion just men; and this done upon those of their own nature, their own nation, their own religion, and now their brethren in affliction, when they were all brought under the power of the victorious Chaldeans, and smarting under the judgments of God, upon no provocation, nor with any prospect of advantage; all done, not only in cold blood, but with art and management. We have scarce such an instance of perfidious cruelty in all the Scripture; so that, with John, when he saw the woman drunk with the blood of the saints, we may well wonder with great admiration. But God permitted it for the completing of the ruin of an unhumbled people, and the filling up of the measure of their judgments who had filled up the measures of their iniquities. Let it possess us with an indignation at the wickedness of men, and an awe of God's righteousness.

First. Ishmael and his party treacherously killed Gedaliah himself in the first place. Though the king of Babylon had made him a great man, had given him a commission to be governor of the land which he had conquered, though God had made him a good man, and a great blessing to his country, and his agency for its welfare was as life from the dead, yet neither could secure him. Ishmael was of the seed-royal, ver. 1, and therefore jealous of Gedaliah's growing greatness, and enraged that he should merit and accept a commission under the king of Babylon. He had ten men with him, that were princes of the king too, guided by the same peevish resentments that he was. These had been with Gedaliah before, to put themselves under his protection, ch. xl. 8, and now again to make him a visit; and "they did eat bread together in Mizpah." He entertained them generously, and entertained no jealousy of them notwithstanding the information given him by Johanan. They pretended friendship to him, and gave him no warning to stand on his guard; he was in sincerity friendly to them, and did all he could to oblige them; but they that did eat bread with him lift up the heel against him. They did not pick a quarrel with him, but watched an opportunity, when they had him alone, and assassinated him, ver. 2.

Secondly. They likewise put all to the sword that they found in arms there, both Jews and Chaldeans, all that were employed under Gedaliah, or were in any capacity to revenge his death, ver. 3. As if enough of the blood of Israelites had not been shed by the Chaldeans, their own princes here mingle it with the blood of the Chaldeans. The vinedressers and the husbandmen were busy in the fields and knew nothing of this bloody massacre, so artfully was it carried on and concealed.

Thirdly. Some good, honest men, that were going all in tears to lament the desolations of Jerusalem, were drawn in by Ishmael, and murdered with the rest. Observe, 1. From whence they came, ver. 5. From Shechem, Samaria, and Shiloh, places that had been famous, but were now reduced; they belonged to the ten tribes, but there were some in those countries that retained an affection for the worship of the God of Israel. 2. Whither they were going. To the house of the Lord, the temple at Jerusalem, which no doubt they had heard of the destruction of, and were going to pay their repects to its ashes, to see its ruins, that their eye might affect their heart with sorrow for them. They favour the dust thereof, Ps. cii. 14. They took offerings and incense in their hand, that if they should find any altar there, though it were but an altar of earth, and any priest ready to officiate, they might not be without something to offer; if not, yet they shewed their good-will, as Abraham when he came to the place of the altar, though the altar was gone. The people of God used to go rejoicing to the house of the Lord; but these went in the habit of mourners, with "their beards shaven, and their clothes rent;" for the providence of God loudly "called to weeping and mourning," because it was not with the faithful worshippers of God as in months past. 2. How they were decoyed into a fatal snare by Ishmael's malice. Hearing of their approach, he resolved to be the death of them too. So bloodthirsty was he, he seemed as if he hated every one that had the name of an Israelite, or the face of an honest man; these pilgrims towards Jerusalem he had a spite to, for the sake of their errand. Ishmael went out to meet them with crocodile's tears, pretending to bewail the desolations of Jerusalem as much as they; and, to try how they stood affected to Gedaliah and his government, he courted them into the town, and found them to have a respect for him, which confirmed him in his resolution to murder them. "He said, Come to Gedaliah," pretending he would have them come and live with him, when really he intended they should come and die with him, ver. 6. They had heard such a character of Gedaliah, that they were willing enough to be acquainted with him; but Ishmael, when he had them in the midst of the town, fell upon them and slew them, ver. 7, and no doubt took the offerings they had, and converted them to his own use; for he that would not stick at such a murder would not stick at sacrilege. Notice is taken of his disposing of the dead bodies of these and the rest that he had slain; he tumbled them all into a great pit, ver. 7, the same pit that Asa king of Judah had digged long before, either in the city or adjoining to it, when he built or fortified Mizpah, 1 Kin. xi. 22, to be a frontier garrison against Baasha king of Israel, and for fear of him, ver. 9. Note, Those that dig pits with a good intention, yet know not what ill use they may be put to one time or other. He slew so many, that he could not afford them each a grave, or would not do them so much honour, but threw them all promiscuously into one pit.

Among these last that were doomed to the slaughter there were ten that obtained a pardon by working, not on the compassion, but the covetousness of those that had them at their mercy, ver. 8. They said to Ishmael, when he was about to suck their blood like an insatiable horse-leech, after that of their companions, "Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field;" that is, country treasures, large stocks upon the ground, abundance of such commodities as the country affords, "wheat and barley, and oil and honey;" intimating that they would discover it to him, and put him in possession of it all, if he would spare them. "Skin for skin, and all that a man has will he give for his life." This bait prevailed; Ishmael saved them, not for the love of mercy, but the love of money. Here were riches kept for the owners thereof, not to their hurt, Eccl. v. 13, and to cause them to lose their lives, Job xxxi. 39, but to their good, and the preserving of their lives. Solomon observes, that sometimes "the ransom of a man's life is his riches." But those who think thus to bribe death when it comes with commission, and plead with it, saying, "Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field," will find death inexorable, and themselves wretchedly deceived.

Fourthly. He carried off the people prisoners. "The king's daughters," whom the Chaldeans cared not for troubling themselves with when they had the king's sons, and the poor of the land, "the vinedressers and husbandmen," that were committed to Gedaliah's charge, were all led away prisoners, towards "the country of the Ammonites," ver. 10; Ishmael probably intending to make a present of them, as the trophies of his barbarous victory, to the king of that country, that set him on. This melancholy story is a warning to us never to be secure in this world. Worse may be yet to come then when we think the worst is over; and that end of one trouble, which we fancy to be the end of all trouble, may prove to be the beginning of another, of a greater. These here thought, "Surely the bitterness of death," and of captivity, "is past;" and yet some died by the sword, and others went into captivity. When we think ourselves safe, and begin to be easy, destruction may come that way that we little expected it. There is many a ship wrecked in the harbour. We can never be sure of peace on this side heaven.

11 But when Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, heard of all the evil that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had done, 12 Then they took all the men, and went to fight with Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and found him by the great waters that are in Gibeon. 13 Now it came to pass, that when all the people which were with Ishmael saw Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, then they were glad. 14 So all the people that Ishmael had carried away captive from Mizpah cast about and returned, and went unto Johanan the son of Kareah. 15 But Ishmael the son of Nethaniah escaped from Johanan with eight men, and went to the Ammonites. 16 Then took Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, all the remnant of the people whom he had recovered from Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, from Mizpah, after that he had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, even mighty men of war, and the women, and the children, and the eunuchs, whom he had brought again from Gibeon: 17 And they departed, and dwelt in the habitation of Chimham, which is by Beth-lehem, to go to enter into Egypt, 18 Because of the Chaldeans: for they were afraid of them, because Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, whom the king of Babylon made governor in the land.

It had been well if Johanan, when he gave information to Gedaliah of Ishmael's treasonable design, though he could not obtain leave to go kill Ishmael, and so prevent it that way, yet had stayed with Gedaliah; for he and his captains and their forces might have been a life-guard to Gedaliah, and a terror to Ishmael, and so have prevented the mischief without the effusion of blood. But it seems they were out upon some expedition, perhaps no good one, and so were out of the way when they should have been upon the best service. Those that affect to ramble are many times out of their place when they are most needed. However, at length they hear of "all the evil that Ishmael had done," ver. 11, and are resolved to try an after-game, which we have an account of in these verses.

First. We heartily wish Johanan could have taken revenge upon the murderers; but he prevailed only to rescue the captives. They that had shed so much blood, it was pity but their blood should have been shed, and it is strange that vengeance suffered them to live; yet it did. Johanan gathered what forces he could, and went to fight with Ishmael, ver. 12, upon the notice of the murders he had committed,—for though he concealed it for a time, (ver. 4,) yet murder will out,—and which way he was gone; he pursued him, and overtook him by the pool of Gibeon, which we read of, 2 Sam. ii. 13. And upon his appearing with such a force Ishmael's heart failed him, his guilty conscience flew in his face, and he durst not stand his ground against an enemy that was something like a match for him. The most cruel are often the most cowardly. The poor captives were glad when they saw Johanan, and the captains that were with him, looking upon them as their deliverers, ver. 13; and they presently found a way to wheel about, and come over to them, ver. 14, Ishmael not offering to detain them when he saw Johanan. Note, Those that would be helped must help themselves. These captives stayed not till their conquerors were beaten, but took the first opportunity to make their escape as soon as they saw their friends appear and their enemies thereby disheartened. Ishmael quitted his prey to save his life, and escaped with eight men, ver. 15. It seems two of his ten men, that were his banditti, or assassins, spoken of ver. 1, either overrun him or were killed in the engagement; but he made the best of his way to the Ammonites, as a perfect renegado, that had quite abandoned all relation to the commonwealth of Israel, though he was of the seed-royal, and we hear no more of him.

Secondly. We heartily wish that Johanan, when he had rescued the captives, would have sitten down quietly with them, and governed them peaceably as Gedaliah did; but, instead of that, he is for leading them such a trace into the land of Egypt as Ishmael would have led them into the land of the Ammonites; so that, though he got the command over them in a better way than Ishmael did, and honestly enough, yet he did not use it much better. Gedaliah, who was of a meek and quiet spirit, was a great blessing to them; but Johanan, who was of a fierce and restless spirit, was set over them for their hurt; and to complete their ruin, even after they were as they thought redeemed. Thus did God still walk contrary to them. 1. The resolution of Johanan and the captains was very rash; nothing would serve them but they would go to enter into Egypt, ver. 17, and in order to that they encamped for a time in the habitation of Chimham, by Bethlehem, David's city. Probably it was some land which David gave to Chimham, the son of Barzillai, which, though it returned to David's family at the year of jubilee, yet still bore the name of Chimham. Here Johanan made his head-quarters, steering his course towards Egypt; either from a personal affection to that country, or ancient national confidence in the Egyptians for help in distress. Some of the mighty men of war, it seems, had escaped; those he took with him, and the women and children, whom he had recovered from Ishmael, who were thus emptied from vessel to vessel, because they were yet unchanged. 2. The reason for this resolution was very frivolous. They pretended they were afraid of the Chaldeans, that they would come and do I know not what with them, because Ishmael had killed Gedaliah, ver. 18. I cannot think they really had any apprehensions of danger upon this account; for though it is true the Chaldeans had cause enough to resent the murder of their viceroy, yet they were not so unreasonable or unjust as to revenge it upon those who appeared so vigorously against the murderers. But they only make use of this as a sham to cover that corrupt inclination of their unbelieving ancestors, which was so strong in them to return into Egypt. Those will justly lose their comfort in real fears that excuse themselves in sin with pretended fears.

CHAPTER XLII.

Johanan and the captains, being strongly bent upon going into Egypt, either their affections or politics advising them to take that course, they had a great desire that God should direct them to do so too; like Balaam, who, when he was determined to go curse Israel, asked God leave. Here is, I. The fair bargain that was made between Jeremiah and them, about consulting God in this matter, ver. 1—6. II. The message at large which God sent them, in answer to their inquiry; in which, 1. They are commanded and encouraged to continue in the land of Judah, and assured that if they did so it should be well with them, ver. 7—12. 2. They are forbidden to go to Egypt, and are plainly told that if they did it would be their ruin, ver. 13—18. 3. They are charged with dissimulation, in their asking what God's will was in this matter, and disobedience when they were told what it was; and sentence is passed upon them for it, ver. 19—22.

THEN all the captains of the forces, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and Jezaniah the son of Hoshaiah, and all the people from the least even unto the greatest, came near, 2 And said unto Jeremiah the prophet, Let, we beseech thee, our supplication be accepted before thee, and pray for us unto the LORD thy God, even for all this remnant; (for we are left but a few of many, as thine eyes do behold us:) 3 That the LORD thy God may shew us the way wherein we walk, and the thing that we may do. 4 Then Jeremiah the prophet said unto them, I have heard you; behold, I will pray unto the LORD your God according to your words; and it shall come to pass, that whatsoever thing the LORD shall answer you, I will declare it unto you; I will keep nothing back from you. 5 Then they said to Jeremiah, The LORD be a true and faithful witness between us, if we do not even according to all things for the which the LORD thy God shall send thee to us. 6 Whether it be good, or whether it be evil, we will obey the voice of the LORD our God, to whom we send thee; that it may be well with us, when we obey the voice of the LORD our God.

We have reason to wonder how Jeremiah the prophet escaped the sword of Ishmael; it seems he did, and it was not the first time that the Lord hid him. It is strange also that in these violent turns he was not consulted before now, and his advice asked and taken. But it should seem as if they knew not that a prophet was among them; though this people were as brands plucked out of the fire, yet they have not returned to the Lord. This people has a revolting and a rebellious heart; and contempt of God and his providence, God and his prophets, is still the sin that most easily besets them. But now, at length, to serve a turn, Jeremiah is sought out, and all the captains, Johanan himself not excepted, with all the people, from the least to the greatest, make him a visit. They came near, ver. 1; which intimates that hitherto they had kept at a distance from the prophet, and had been shy of him. Now here,

First. They desire him, by prayer, to ask direction from God what they should do in the present critical juncture, ver. 2, 3. They express themselves wonderful well. 1. With great respect to the prophet. Though he was poor and low, and under their command, yet they apply themselves to him with humility and submissiveness, as petitioners for his assistance, which yet they intimate their own unworthiness of; "Let, we beseech thee, our supplication be accepted before thee." They compliment him thus, in hopes to persuade him to say as they would have him say. 2. With a great opinion of his interest in heaven. "Pray for us," who know not how to pray for ourselves. Pray to the Lord thy God, for we are unworthy to call him ours, nor have we reason to expect any favour from him. 3. With a great sense of their need of Divine direction. They speak of themselves as objects of compassion; We are but a remnant, but a few of many; how easily will such a remnant be swallowed up, and yet it is pity they should. Thine eyes see what distress we are in, what a plunge we are at; if thou canst do any thing, help us. 4. With desire of a Divine conduct. Let the Lord thy God take this ruin into his thoughts, and under his hand, and shew us the way wherein we may walk, and may expect to have his presence with us, and the thing that we may do, the course we may take for our own safety. Note, In every difficult, doubtful case, our eye must be up to God for direction. They then might expect to be directed by a spirit of prophecy, which is now ceased; but we may still in faith pray to be guided by a spirit of wisdom in our hearts, and the hints of providence.

Secondly. Jeremiah faithfully promiseth them to pray for direction for them, and whatever message God should send to them by him he would deliver it to them just as he received it, without adding, altering, or diminishing, ver. 4. Ministers may hence learn, 1. Conscientiously to pray for those who desire their prayers; "I will pray for you, according to your words." Though they had slighted him, yet, like Samuel when he was slighted, he will not sin against the Lord, in ceasing to pray for them, 1 Sam. xii. 23. 2. Conscientiously to advise those who desire their advice, as near as they can to the mind of God; not keeping back any thing that is profitable for them, whether it be pleasing or no, but to declare to them the whole counsel of God, that they may approve themselves true to their trust.

Thirdly. They fairly promise that they will be governed by the will of God, as soon as they know what it is, ver. 5, 6, and they had the impudence to appeal to God concerning their sincerity herein, though at the same time they dissembled. "The Lord be a true and faithful witness between us;" that is, Do thou in the fear of God tell us truly what his mind is, and then we will in the fear of God comply with it; and for this the Lord the Judge be judge between us. Note, Those that expect to have the benefit of good ministers' prayers must conscientiously hearken to their preaching, and be governed by it, as far as it agrees with the mind of God. Nothing could be better said than this here, "Whether it be good, or whether it be evil, we will obey the voice of the Lord our God, that it may be well with us." 1. They now call God their God, for Jeremiah had encouraged them to call him so, ver. 5, "I will pray to the Lord your God." He is ours, and therefore we will obey his voice. Our relation to God strongly obligeth us to obedience. 2. They promise to obey his voice, because they sent the prophet to him to consult him. Note, We do not truly desire to know the mind of God, if we do not fully resolve to comply with it when we do know it. 3. It is an implicit, universal obedience that they here promise. They will do what God appoints them to do, "whether it be good, or whether it be evil;" though it may seem evil to us, yet we will believe that if God commands it, it is certainly good, and we must not dispute it, but do it. Whatever God commands, whether it be easy or difficult, agreeable to our inclinations or contrary to them, whether it be cheap or costly, fashionable or unfashionable, whether we get or lose by it in our worldly interest, if it be our duty, we will do it. 4. It is upon a very good consideration that they promise this, a reasonable and powerful one, "that it may be well with us;" which intimates a conviction that they could not expect it should be well with them upon any other terms.

7 And it came to pass after ten days, that the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah. 8 Then called he Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces which were with him, and all the people from the least even to the greatest, 9 And said unto them, Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, unto whom ye sent me to present your supplication before him;

10 If ye will still abide in this land,
Then will I build you, and not pull you down,
And I will plant you, and not pluck you up:
For I repent me of the evil that I have done unto you.
11 Be not afraid of the king of Babylon,
Of whom ye are afraid;
Be not afraid of him, saith the LORD:
For I am with you to save you,
And to deliver you from his hand.
12 And I will shew mercies unto you,
That he may have mercy upon you,
And cause you to return to your own land.
13 But if ye say,
We will not dwell in this land,
Neither obey the voice of the LORD your God,
14 Saying, No; but we will go into the land of Egypt,
Where we shall see no war,
Nor hear the sound of the trumpet,
Nor have hunger of bread;
And there will we dwell: [of Judah;
15 And now therefore hear the word of the LORD, ye remnant
Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt,
And go to sojourn there;
16 Then it shall come to pass,
That the sword, which ye feared,
Shall overtake you there in the land of Egypt,
And the famine, whereof ye were afraid,
Shall follow close after you there in Egypt;
And there ye shall die.
17 So shall it be with all the men
That set their faces to go into Egypt to sojourn there;
They shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence:
And none of them shall remain or escape
From the evil that I will bring upon them.
18 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
As mine anger and my fury hath been poured forth
Upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem;
So shall my fury be poured forth upon you,
When ye shall enter into Egypt:
And ye shall be an execration, and an astonishment,
And a curse, and a reproach;
And ye shall see this place no more.

19 The LORD hath said concerning you, O ye remnant of Judah; Go ye not into Egypt: know certainly that I have admonished you this day. 20 For ye dissembled in your hearts, when ye sent me unto the LORD your God, saying, Pray for us unto the LORD our God; and according unto all that the LORD our God shall say, so declare unto us, and we will do it. 21 And now I have this day declared it to you; but ye have not obeyed the voice of the LORD your God, nor any thing for the which he hath sent me unto you. 22 Now therefore know certainly that ye shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence, in the place whither ye desire to go and to sojourn.

We have here the answer which Jeremiah was sent to deliver to those who employed him to ask counsel of God.

First. It did not come presently, nor till ten days after, ver. 7. They were thus long held in suspense, perhaps to punish them for their hypocrisy, or to shew that Jeremiah did not speak of himself, not what he would, for he could not speak when he would, but must wait for instructions. However, it teacheth us to continue waiting upon God for direction in our way. "The vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak."

Secondly. When it did come he delivered it publicly, both to the captains and to all the people, from the meanest to those in the highest station. He delivered it fully and faithfully, as he received it, as he had promised that he would keep nothing back from them. If Jeremiah had been to direct them by his own prudence, perhaps he could not have told what to advise them to, the case was so difficult; but what he has to advise is, what "the Lord the God of Israel saith, to whom they had sent him," and therefore they were bound in honour and duty to observe it. And this he tells them,

1. That it is the will of God that they should stay where they were; and his promise, that if they do so it shall undoubtedly be well with them; he would have them still to abide in this land, ver. 10. Their brethren were forced out of it into captivity, and it was their affliction; let them therefore count it a mercy that they may stay in it, and a duty to stay in it. Let those whose lot is in Canaan never quit it while they can keep it. It had been enough to oblige them, if God had only said, I charge you upon your allegiance to abide still in this land; but he rather persuades them to it as a friend than commands it as a prince. 1st. He expresseth a very tender concern for them in their present calamitous condition; "It repenteth me of the evil that I have done unto you." Though they had shewn small sign of their repenting of their sins, yet God, as one grieved for the misery of Israel, Jud. x. 16, begins to repent of the judgments he had brought upon them for their sins. Not that he changed his mind, but he was very ready to change his way, and to return in mercy to them. God's time to repent himself concerning his servants is, when he sees that, as here, their strength is gone, and there is none shut up or left, Deu. xxxii. 36. 2nd. He answers the argument they had against abiding in this land. They feared the king of Babylon, ch. xli. 18, lest he should come and avenge the death of Gedaliah upon them, though they were no way accessary to it, nay, had witnessed against it. The surmise was foreign and unreasonable; but if there had been any ground for it enough is here said to remove it; ver. 11, "Be not afraid of the king of Babylon," though he is a man of great might and little mercy, and a very arbitrary prince, whose will is a law; and therefore you are afraid he will, upon this pretence, though without colour of reason, take advantage against you. "Be not afraid of him," for that fear will bring a snare; fear not him, "for I am with you;" and if God be for you to save you, who can be against you to hurt you? Thus has God provided to obviate and silence even the causeless fears of his people, which discourage them in the way of their duty; there is enough in the promises to do it. 3rd. He assures them that, if they will still abide in this land, they shall not only be safe from the king of Babylon, but be made happy by the King of kings. "I will build you and plant you;" you shall take root again, and be the new foundation of another state; a phœnix kingdom rising out of the ashes of the last. It is added, ver. 12, "I will shew mercies unto you." Note, In all our comforts we may read God's mercies. God will shew them mercy in this, that not only the king of Babylon shall not destroy them, but he shall have mercy upon them, and help to settle them. Note, Whatever kindness men do us, we must attribute it to God's kindness. He makes those whom he pities to be pitied, even by those that carried them captives, Ps. cvi. 46. The king of Babylon having now the disposal of the country, shall "cause you to return to your own land," that is, shall settle you again in your habitations, and put you in possession of the lands that formerly belonged to you. Note, God has made that our duty which is really our privilege, and our obedience will be its own recompence. "Abide in this land," and it shall be your own land again, and you shall continue in it. Do not outrun it, now you stand so fair for the enjoyment of it again. Be not so unwise as to forsake your own mercies for lying vanities.

2. That, as they tender the favour of God and their own happiness, they must by no means think of going into Egypt; not thither of any place; not to that land out of which God had delivered their fathers, and which he had so often warned them not to make alliance with, nor to put confidence in. Observe here,

1st. The sin they are supposed to be guilty of; and to him that knew their hearts it was more than a supposition. You begin to say, "We will not dwell in this land," ver. 13. We will never think that we can be safe in it, no, not though God himself undertake our protection; we will not continue in it, no, not in obedience to the voice of the Lord our God. He may say what he pleaseth, but we will do what we please; 'We will go into the land of Egypt, and there will we dwell, whether God give us leave and go along with us or no,' ver. 14. It is supposed that their hearts were upon it; "If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt," are obstinately resolved that you will go and sojourn there, though God oppose you in it, both by his word and by his providence, then take what follows. Now the reason they go upon in this resolution is, that "in Egypt we shall see no war, nor have hunger of bread," as we have had for a long time in this land, ver. 14. Note, It is folly to quit our place, especially to quit the holy land, because we meet with trouble in it; but greater folly to think, by changing our place to outrun the judgments of God, and that evil which pursues sinners in every way of disobedience, and which there is no escaping but by returning to our allegiance.

2nd. The sentence passed upon them for this sin, if they will persist in it. It is pronounced in God's name; ver. 15, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye remnant of Judah," that think, because you are a remnant, you must be spared of course, ver. 2, and indulged in your own humour. First. Did the sword and famine frighten them? Those very judgments shall pursue them into Egypt, shall overtake them, and overcome them there, ver. 16, 17. Ye think, because war and famine have long been raging in this land, they are entailed upon it; whereas, if you trust in God, he can make even this land a land of peace to you. You think they are confined to it, and if you can get clear of this land you shall get out of the reach of them; but God will send them after you wherever you go. Note, The evils we think to escape by sin we certainly and inevitably run ourselves upon. The men that go to Egypt in contradiction to God's will, to escape the sword and famine, shall die in Egypt by sword and famine. We may apply it to the common calamities of human life. Those that are impatient of them, and think to avoid them by changing their place, will find they are deceived, and they do not at all mend themselves. The grievances common to men will meet them wherever they go. All our removes in this world are but from one wilderness to another; still we are where we were. Secondly. Did the desolations of Jerusalem frighten them? Were they willing to get as far as they could from them? They shall meet with the second part of them too in Egypt; ver. 18, "As mine anger and fury have been poured out here upon Jerusalem, so it shall be poured out upon you in Egypt." Note, Those that have by sin made God their enemy will find him a consuming fire wherever they go. And then "shall ye be an execration and an astonishment." The Hebrews were of old an abomination to the Egyptians, Gen. xliii. 32, and now they shall be made more so than ever. When God's professing people mingle themselves with infidels, and make their court to them, they lose their dignity, and make themselves a reproach.

3rd. That God knew their hypocrisy in their inquiries of him, and that when they asked what he would have them do, they were resolved to take their own way; and therefore the sentence, which was before pronounced conditionally, is made absolute. Having set before them good and evil, the blessing and the curse, in the close he makes the application of what he said. And here, First. He solemnly protests that he had faithfully delivered his message, ver. 19. The conclusion of the whole matter is, "Go not down into Egypt;" you disobey the command of God if you do, and what I have said to you will be a witness against you. For know certainly that, whether you will hear or whether you will forbear, I have plainly admonished you, you cannot now plead ignorance of the mind of God. Secondly. He chargeth them with base dissimulation in the application they made to him for Divine direction; ver. 20, "Ye dissembled in your hearts," you pretended one thing and intended another, and promised what you never meant to perform. 'You have used deceit against your souls,' so the margin reads it; for those that think to put a cheat upon God will prove in the end to have put a damning cheat upon themselves. Thirdly. He is already aware that they are determined to go contrary to the command of God. Probably they discovered it in their countenance and secret mutterings already, before he had finished his discourse. However, he spake from him who knew their hearts; "Ye have not obeyed the voice of the Lord your God;" that is, ye have not a disposition to obey it. Thus Moses, in the close of his farewell sermon, had told them, Deu. xxxi. 2, "I know thy rebellion and thy stiff neck, and that ye will corrupt yourselves." Admire the patience of God, that he is pleased to speak to those whom he knows will not regard him, and deal with those whom he knows will deal treacherously, Isa. xlviii. 8. Fourthly. He therefore reads them their doom, ratifying what he had said before, "Know certainly that ye shall die by the sword," ver. 22. God's threatenings may be vilified, but cannot be nullified, by the unbelief of man. Famine and pestilence shall pursue these sinners; for there is no place privileged from Divine arrests, nor can any malefactors go out of God's jurisdiction; "Ye shall die in the place whither ye desire to go." Note, We know not what is good for ourselves; and that often proves afflictive, and sometimes fatal, which we are most fond of, and have our hearts most set upon.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Jeremiah had faithfully delivered his message from God in the foregoing chapter, and the case was made so very plain by it, that one would have thought there needed no more words about it; but we find it quite otherwise. Here is, I. The people's contempt of this message. They denied it to be the word of God, ver. 1—3, and then made no difficulty of going directly contrary to it; into Egypt they went, and took Jeremiah himself along with them, ver. 4—7. II. God's pursuit of them with another message, foretelling the king of Babylon's pursuit of them into Egypt, ver. 8—13.

AND it came to pass, that when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking unto all the people all the words of the LORD their God, for which the LORD their God had sent him to them, even all these words, 2 Then spake Azariah the son of Hoshaiah, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the proud men, saying unto Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely: the LORD our God hath not sent thee to say, Go not into Egypt to sojourn there: 3 But Baruch the son of Neriah setteth thee on against us, for to deliver us into the hand of the Chaldeans, that they might put us to death, and carry us away captives into Babylon. 4 So Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, and all the people, obeyed not the voice of the LORD, to dwell in the land of Judah. 5 But Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, took all the remnant of Judah, that were returned from all nations, whither they had been driven, to dwell in the land of Judah; 6 Even men, and women, and children, and the king's daughters, and every person that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had left with Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch the son of Neriah. 7 So they came into the land of Egypt: for they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: thus came they even to Tahpanhes.

What God saith of the builders of Babel may truly be said of this people that Jeremiah is now dealing with, "Now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do," Gen. xi. 6. They have a fancy for Egypt, and to Egypt they will go, whatever God himself saith to the contrary. Jeremiah made them hear all he had to say, though he saw them uneasy at it. It was what the Lord their God had sent him to speak to them, and they shall have it all; and now let us see what they have to say to it.

First. They deny it to be a message from God. "Johanan, and all the proud men, said to Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely," ver. 2. See here, 1. What was the cause of their disobedience. It was pride; only by that comes contention both with God and man. They were proud men that gave the lie to the prophet. They could not bear the contradiction of their sentiments, and the control of their designs; no, not by the Divine wisdom, by the Divine will itself. Pharaoh said, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey him?" Ex. v. 2. The proud unhumbled heart of man is one of the most daring enemies God has on this side hell. 2. What was the colour for their disobedience? They would not acknowledge it to be the word of God. "The Lord hath not sent thee" on this errand to us. Either they were not convinced that was said came from God, or (which I rather think) though they were convinced of it they would not own it. The light shone strong in their face, but either they shut their eyes against it or would not confess that they saw it. Note, The reason why men deny the Scriptures to be the word of God is, because they are resolved not to conform themselves to Scripture rules, and so an obstinate infidelity is made the sorry subterfuge of a wilful disobedience. If God had spoken to them by an angel, or as he did from mount Sinai, they would have said it was a delusion. Had they not consulted Jeremiah as a prophet? Had not he waited to receive instructions from God what to say to them? Had not what he said all the usual marks of prophecy upon it? Was not the prophet himself embarked in the same bottom with them? What interests could he have separate from theirs? Had he not always approved himself an Israelite indeed? and had not God proved him a prophet indeed? Had any of his words ever fallen to the ground? Why truly, they had some good thoughts of Jeremiah; but they suggest, ver. 3, "Baruch sets thee on against us." A likely thing, that Baruch should be in a plot "to deliver them into the hands of the Chaldeans," and what would he get by that? If Jeremiah and he had been so well affected to the Chaldeans as they would represent them, they would have gone away at first, with Nebuzar-adan, when he courted them, to Babylon, and not have staid to take their lot with this despised ungrateful remnant; but the best services are no fences against malice and slander. Or if Baruch had been so ill disposed, could they think Jeremiah would be so influenced by him as to make God's name and authority to patronize so villanous a purpose? Note, Those that are resolved to contradict the great ends of the ministry are industrious to put it into an ill name. When men will persist in sin, they represent those who would turn them from it as designing men for themselves; nay, as ill designing men against their neighbours. It is well for them that their witness is in heaven, and their record on high.

Secondly. They determine to go to Egypt however. They resolve not to "dwell in the land of Judah," as God had ordered them, ver. 4; but to go themselves, with one consent, and to take all that they had under their power along with them to Egypt. Those that came "from all the nations, whither they had been driven, to dwell in the land of Judah," out of a sincere affection to that land, they would not leave them to their liberty, but forced them to go with them into Egypt, ver. 5; "men, women, and children," ver. 6; a long journey into a strange country, an idolatrous country, a country that had never been kind or faithful to Israel; yet thither they would go, though they deserted their own land, and threw themselves out of God's protection. It is the folly of men that they know not when they are well, and often ruin themselves by endeavouring to mend themselves; and it is the pride of great men to force those they have under their power to follow them, though never so much against their duty and interest. These proud men compelled even Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch his scribe, to go along with them to Egypt. They carried them away as prisoners, partly to punish them, and a greater punishment they could not inflict upon them than to force them against their consciences. Theirs is the worst of tyranny who say to men's souls, even to good men's souls, "Bow down, that we may go over;" partly to put some reputation upon themselves and their own way. Though the prophets were under a force, they would make the world believe they were voluntary in going along with them; and who can blame them for acting contrary to the word of the Lord, when the prophets themselves did? They came to Tahpanhes a famous city of Egypt, so called from a queen of that name, 1 Kin. xi. 19; the same with Hanes, Isa. xxx. 4; it was now the metropolis, for Pharaoh's house was there, ver. 9. No place could serve these proud men to settle in but the royal city, and near the court; so little mindful were they of Joseph's wisdom, who would have his brethren settle in Goshen. If they had had the spirit of Israelites, they would have chosen rather to dwell in the wilderness of Judah, than in the most pompous populous cities of Egypt.

8 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah in Tahpanhes, saying, 9 Take great stones in thine hand, and hide them in the clay in the brick-kiln, which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the men of Judah; 10 And say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will send and take Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, my servant, and will set his throne upon these stones that I have hid; and he shall spread his royal pavilion over them. 11 And when he cometh, he shall smite the land of Egypt, and deliver such as are for death to death; and such as are for captivity to captivity; and such as are for the sword to the sword. 12 And I will kindle a fire in the houses of the gods of Egypt; and he shall burn them, and carry them away captives: and he shall array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd putteth on his garment; and he shall go forth from thence in peace. 13 He shall break also the images of Beth-shemesh, that is in the land of Egypt; and the houses of the gods of the Egyptians shall he burn with fire.

EGYPTIAN GODS.

We have here Jeremiah prophesying in Egypt, and so we have in the next chapter. Jeremiah was now in Tahpanhes, for there his lords and masters were. He was there among idolatrous Egyptians and treacherous Israelites; but there, 1. He received the word of the Lord; it came to him. God can find his people with the visits of his grace wherever they are; and when his ministers are bound, yet "the word of the Lord is not bound." The spirit of prophecy was not confined to the land of Israel. When Jeremiah went into Egypt, not out of choice, but by constraint, God withdrew not his wonted favour from him. 2. What he received of the Lord he delivered to the people. Wherever we are, we must endeavour to do good, for that is our business in this world. Now we find two messages which Jeremiah was appointed and intrusted to deliver, when he was in Egypt. We may suppose he did what services he could to his countrymen in Egypt, at least as far as they would be acceptable, in performing the ordinary duties of a prophet, praying for them, and instructing and comforting them, but only two messages of his which he received immediately from God are recorded. One in this chapter relating to Egypt itself, and foretelling the destruction of that; the other in the next chapter, relating to the Jews in Egypt. God had told them before, that if they went into Egypt the sword they feared should follow them; here he tells them farther, that the sword of Nebuchadnezzar, which they were in a particular manner afraid of, should follow them.

First. This is foretold by a sign. Jeremiah must take great stones, such as are used for foundations, and lay them in the clay of the furnace or brick kiln, which is in the open way, or beside the way, that leads to Pharaoh's house, ver. 9; some remarkable place in view of the royal palace. Egypt was famous for brick kilns, witness the slavery of the Israelites there, whom they forced to make bricks, Ex. v. 7, which perhaps was now remembered against them. The foundation of Egypt's desolations was laid in those brick kilns in that clay. This he must do, not in the sight of the Egyptians, they knew not Jeremiah's character, but in the sight of the men of Judah to whom he was sent, that, since he could not prevent their going into Egypt, he might bring them to repent of their going.

Secondly. It is foretold in express words, as express as can be,

1. That the king, the present king of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar, the very same that had been employed in the destruction of Jerusalem, should come in person against the land of Egypt, should make himself master even of this royal city, by the same token that he should set his throne in that very place where these stones were laid, ver. 10. This minute circumstance is particularly foretold, that when it was accomplished they might be put in mind of the prophecy, and confirmed in their belief of the extent and certainty of the Divine prescience, to which the smallest and most contingent events are evident. God calls Nebuchadnezzar his servant, because herein he executed God's will, accomplished his purposes, and was instrumental to carry on his designs. Note, The world's princes are God's servants, and he makes what use he pleaseth of them, and even those that know him not, nor aim at his honour, yet are the tools which his providence makes use of.

2. That he shall destroy many of the Egyptians, and have them all at his mercy; ver. 11, "He shall smite the land of Egypt;" and though it has been always a warlike nation, yet none shall be able to make head against him, but whom he will he shall slay, and by what sort of death he will; whether pestilence, for that is here meant by death, as ch. xv. 2, by shutting them up in places infected, or by the sword of war or justice, in cold blood or hot; and whom he will he shall save alive, and carry into captivity. The Jews, by going into Egypt, brought the Chaldeans thither, and so made but ill payment to those that entertained them. They who promised to protect Israel from the king of Babylon exposed themselves to him.

3. That he shall destroy the idols of Egypt, both the temples and the images of their gods; ver. 12, "He shall burn the houses of the gods of Egypt;" but it shall be with a fire of God's kindling. The fire of God's wrath fastens upon them, and then he burns some of them, and carries others captives, Isa. xlvi. 1. Beth-shemesh, or, the house of the sun, was so called from a temple there built to the sun, where at certain times there was a general meeting of the worshippers of the sun. The statues, or standing images, there he shall break in pieces, ver. 13; and carry away the rich materials of them. It intimates that he shall lay all waste, when even the temple and the images shall not escape the fury of the victorious army. The king of Babylon was himself a great idolater, and a patron of idolatry; he had his temples and images in honour of the sun, as well as the Egyptians, and yet he is employed to destroy the idols of Egypt. Thus God sometimes makes one wicked man or wicked nation a scourge and plague to another.

4. That he shall make himself master of the land of Egypt, and none shall be able to plead its cause, or avenge its quarrel, ver. 13; "He shall array himself with the rich spoils of the land of Egypt," both beautify and fortify himself with them; shall array himself with them, as ornaments, and as armour; and this though it shall be a rich and heavy booty, yet, being expert in war, and expeditious, he will slip on with as much ease, and in as little time (in comparison) "as a shepherd slips on his garment," when he goes to turn out his sheep in a morning. And being loaded with the wealth of many nations, the fruits of his conquests, he shall make no more of the spoils of the land of Egypt than of a shepherd's coat; and when he has taken what he pleaseth, as Benhadad threatened to do, 1 Kin. xx. 6, he shall go forth in peace, without any molestation given him, or any precipitation for fear of it, so effectually reduced shall the land of Egypt be. This destruction of Egypt by the king of Babylon is foretold, Eze. xxix. 19; xxx. 10. Babylon lay at a great distance from Egypt, and yet from thence the destruction of Egypt comes; for God can make those judgments strike home which are far-fetched.

CHAPTER XLIV.

In this chapter we have, I. An awakening sermon, which Jeremiah preached to the Jews in Egypt, to reprove them for their idolatry, notwithstanding the warnings given them both by the word and rod of God, and to threaten the judgments of God against them for it, ver. 1—14. II. The impudent and impious contempt which the people put upon this admonition, and their declared resolution to persist in their idolatries notwithstanding, in despite of God and Jeremiah, ver. 15—19. III. The sentence passed upon them for their obstinacy, that they should all be cut off, and perish in Egypt, except a very small number, and as a sign or earnest of it the king of Egypt should shortly fall into the hands of the king of Babylon, and be unable any longer to protect them, ver. 20—30.

THE word that came to Jeremiah concerning all the Jews which dwell in the land of Egypt, which dwell at Migdol, and at Tahpanhes, and at Noph, and in the country of Pathros, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Ye have seen all the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, and upon all the cities of Judah; and, behold, this day they are a desolation, and no man dwelleth therein, 3 Because of their wickedness which they have committed to provoke me to anger, in that they went to burn incense, and to serve other gods, whom they knew not, neither they, ye, nor your fathers. 4 Howbeit I sent unto you all my servants the prophets, rising early and sending them, saying, Oh, do not this abominable thing that I hate. 5 But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear to turn from their wickedness, to burn no incense unto other gods. 6 Wherefore my fury and mine anger was poured forth, and was kindled in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem; and they are wasted and desolate, as at this day. 7 Therefore now thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel; Wherefore commit ye this great evil against your souls, to cut off from you man and woman, child and suckling, out of Judah, to leave you none to remain; 8 In that ye provoke me unto wrath with the works of your hands, burning incense unto other gods in the land of Egypt, whither ye be gone to dwell, that ye might cut yourselves off, and that ye might be a curse and a reproach among all the nations of the earth? 9 Have ye forgotten the wickedness of your fathers, and the wickedness of the kings of Judah, and the wickedness of their wives, and your own wickedness, and the wickedness of your wives, which they have committed in the land of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem? 10 They are not humbled even unto this day, neither have they feared, nor walked in my law, nor in my statutes, that I set before you and before your fathers. 11 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will set my face against you for evil, and to cut off all Judah. 12 And I will take the remnant of Judah, that have set their faces to go into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, and they shall all be consumed, and fall in the land of Egypt; they shall even be consumed by the sword and by the famine: they shall die, from the least even unto the greatest, by the sword and by the famine: and they shall be an execration, and an astonishment, and a curse, and a reproach. 13 For I will punish them that dwell in the land of Egypt, as I have punished Jerusalem, by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: 14 So that none of the remnant of Judah, which are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall escape or remain, that they should return into the land of Judah, to the which they have a desire to return to dwell there: for none shall return but such as shall escape.

PATHROS—RUINS OF CHNUBIS, NUBIA.—ver. 1.

The Jews in Egypt were now dispersed into divers parts of the country, into Migdol and Noph, and other places, and Jeremiah is sent of an errand from God to them, which he delivered either when he had the most of them together in Pathros, ver. 15, or going about from place to place, preaching to this purpose. He delivered his message in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, and in it,

First. God puts them in mind of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, which, though the captives by the rivers of Babylon were daily mindful of, (Ps. cxxxiv. 1,) the fugitives in the cities of Egypt seem to have forgotten, and needed to be put in mind of, though they had not been so long out of sight as to become out of mind; ver. 2, Ye have seen what a deplorable condition Judah and Jerusalem are brought into. Now, will you consider whence those desolations came? From the wrath of God; it was his fury and his anger that kindled the fire which made Jerusalem and the cities of Judah waste and desolate, ver. 6; whoever were the instruments of the destruction, they were but instruments. It was a destruction from the Almighty.

Secondly. He puts them in mind of the sins that brought these desolations upon Judah and Jerusalem. It was for their wickedness, (that was it that provoked God to anger,) and especially their idolatry; their serving other gods, ver. 3; and giving that honour to counterfeit deities, the creatures of their own fancy, and the work of their own hands, which should have been given to the true God only. They forsook the God that was known among them, and his name great, for gods that they knew not, upstart deities, whose original was obscure, and not worth taking notice of. Neither they, nor you, nor your fathers, could give any rational account why the God of Israel was exchanged for such impostors; they knew not that they were gods, nay, they could not but know that they were no gods.

Thirdly. He puts them in mind of the frequent fair warnings he had given them by his word not to serve other gods, the contempt of which warnings was a great aggravation of their idolatry, ver. 4. The prophets were sent with a great deal of care to call to them, saying, "O do not this abominable thing that I hate." It becomes us to speak of sin with the utmost dread and detestation, as an abominable thing; it is certainly so, for it is that which God hates, and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth; call it odious, call it grievous, that we may by all means possible put ourselves and others out of love with it. It becomes us to give warning of the danger of sin, and the fatal consequences of it, with all seriousness and earnestness; O do not do it! If you love God do not, for it is provoking to him; if you love your own souls do not, for it is destructive to them. Let conscience do this for us in an hour of temptation, when we are ready to yield: O take heed, "do not this abominable thing which the Lord hates;" for if God hates it thou shouldest hate it. But did they regard what God said to them? No, they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear, ver. 5. They still persisted in their idolatries, and you see what came of it; therefore God's anger was poured out upon them, as at this day. Now this was intended for warning to you, who have not only heard the judgments of God's mouth, as they did, but have likewise seen the judgments of his hand, by which you should be startled and awakened, for they were inflicted in terrorem, that others might hear and fear, and do no more as they did, lest they fare as they did.

Fourthly. He reproves them for, and upbraids them with, their continued idolatries, now they were come into Egypt; ver. 8, "Ye burn incense to other gods in the land of Egypt," therefore God forbade them to go into Egypt, because he knew it would be a snare to them. Those whom God sent into the land of the Chaldeans, though that was an idolatrous country, were there by the power of God's grace weaned from idolatry, but those who went against God's mind into the land of the Egyptians were there by the power of their own corruptions more wedded than ever to their idolatries; for when we thrust ourselves without cause or call into places of temptation it is just with God to leave us to ourselves. In doing this, 1. They did a great deal of injury to themselves and their families. You commit this great evil against your souls, ver. 7; you wrong them, you deceive them with that which is false, you destroy them, for it will be fatal to them. Note, In sinning against God we sin against our own souls. It is the ready way to cut ourselves off from all comfort and hopes, ver. 8, to cut off your name and honour. So that you will, both by your sin and by your misery, become a curse and reproach among all nations; it will become a proverb, As wretched as a Jew. It is the ready way to cut off from you all your relations, all that you should have joy of, and have your families built up in, man and woman, child and suckling, so that Judah shall be a land lost for want of heirs. 2. They filled up the measure of the iniquity of their fathers; and, as if that had been too little for them, added to it; ver. 9, "Have ye forgotten the wickedness" of those that are gone before you, that you are not humbled for it, as you ought to be, and afraid of the consequences of it? 'Have you forgotten the punishments of your fathers?' so some read it; do you not know how dear their idolatry cost them, and yet dare you continue in that "vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers," though you received the curse with it? He minds them of the sins and punishments of the kings of Judah, who, as great as they were, escaped not the judgments of God for their idolatry; yea, and they should have taken warning by the wickedness of their wives, who had seduced them to idolatry. In the original it is, 'and of his wives,' which Dr. Lightfoot thinks doth tacitly reflect upon Solomon's wives, particularly his Egyptian wives, to whom the idolatry of the kings of Judah owed its original. Have you forgotten this, and what came of it, that you dare venture upon the same wicked courses? see Neh. xiii. 18, 26. Nay, to come to your own times, "Have you forgotten your own wickedness, and the wickedness of your wives," when you lived in prosperity in Jerusalem, and what ruin it brought upon you? But, alas, to what purpose do I speak to them, saith God to the prophet; ver. 10, "They are not humbled unto this day," by all the humbling providences that they have been under. "They have not feared, nor walked in my law." Note, Those that walk not in the law of God thereby shew that they are destitute of the fear of God.

Fifthly. He threatens their utter ruin for their persisting in their idolatry, now they were in Egypt. Judgment is given against them, as before ch. xlii. 22, that they shall perish in Egypt. The decree is gone forth, and shall not be called back. They "set their faces to go into the land of Egypt," ver. 12, were resolute in their purpose against God, and now God is resolute in his purpose against them; "I will set my face to cut off all Judah," ver. 11. They that think not only to affront but to confront God Almighty will find themselves outfaced; for "the face of the Lord is against them that do evil," Ps. xxxiv. 16. It is here threatened concerning these idolatrous Jews in Egypt, 1. That they shall all be consumed, without exception; no degree or order among them shall escape. they shall fall, from the least to the greatest, ver. 12, high and low, rich and poor. 2. That they shall be consumed by the very same judgments which God made use of for the punishment of Jerusalem, the sword, famine, and pestilence, ver. 12, 13. They shall not be wasted by natural deaths, as Israel in the wilderness, but by these sore judgments which by flying into Egypt they thought to get out of the reach of. 3. That none, except a very few that shall narrowly escape, shall ever return to the land of Judah again, ver. 14. They thought, being nearer, they stood fairer for a return to their own land than those that were carried to Babylon, yet those shall return, and these shall not; for the much surer way to any comfort is that in which God has promised it to us than that in which we have projected it for ourselves. Observe, how those that are fretful and discontented will be uneasy and fond of change wherever they are; this people, when they were in the land of Judah, desired to go into Egypt, ch. xlii. 22, but when they were in Egypt they "desired to return to the land of Judah again;" they 'lift up their soul' to it, so it is in the margin, which notes an earnest desire. But, because they would not dwell there when God commanded it, they shall not dwell there when they desire it. If we walk contrary to God he will walk contrary to us. How can those expect to be well that would not know when they were well, though God himself told them?

15 Then all the men which knew that their wives had burned incense unto other gods, and all the women that stood by, a great multitude, even all the people that dwelt in the land of Egypt, in Pathros, answered Jeremiah, saying, 16 As for the word that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the LORD, we will not hearken unto thee. 17 But we will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth forth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, as we have done, we, and our fathers, our kings, and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and saw no evil. 18 But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword and by the famine. 19 And when we burned incense to the queen of heaven, and poured out drink offerings unto her, did we make her cakes to worship her, and pour out drink offerings unto her, without our men?

We have here the people's obstinate refusal to submit to the power of the word of God in the mouth of Jeremiah. We have scarce such an instance of downright daring contradiction to God himself as this here, or such an avowed rebellion of the carnal mind. Observe,

First. The persons that did thus set God and his judgments at defiance. It was not some one that was thus obstinate, but the generality of the Jews; and they were such as knew either themselves or their wives to be guilty of the idolatry Jeremiah had reproved, ver. 15; where we find, 1. That the women had been more guilty of idolatry and superstition than the men; not because the men stuck closer to the true God and the true religion than the women, but I fear because they were generally atheists, and were for no God, and no religion at all, and therefore could easily allow their wives to be of a false religion, and to worship false gods. 2. That it was consciousness of guilt that made them impatient of reproof. "They knew that their wives had burnt incense to other gods," and that they had countenanced them in it, and "the women that stood by" knew that they had joined with them in their idolatrous usages, so that what Jeremiah said touched them in a sore place, which made them kick against the pricks, as children of Belial, that will not bear the yoke.

Secondly. The reply which these persons made to Jeremiah, and in him to God himself; and it is in effect the same with theirs who had the impudence to say to the Almighty, "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways."

1. They declare their resolution not to do as God commanded them, but what they themselves had a mind to do, that is, they would go on to worship the moon, here called the queen of heaven; yet some understand it of the sun, which was much worshipped in Egypt, ch. xliii. 13, and had been so at Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxxiii. 11, and they say that, the Hebrew word for the sun being feminine, it may not unfitly be called the queen of heaven. And others understand it of all the host of heaven, or the frame of heaven, the whole machine, ch. vii. 18. These daring sinners do not now go about to make excuses for their refusal to obey, nor suggest that Jeremiah spoke from himself and not from God, as before, ch. xliii. 2. But they own he spake to them in the name of the Lord, and yet tell him flat and plain, in so many words, "We will not hearken unto thee," we will do that which is forbidden, and run the venture of that which is threatened. Note, Those that live in disobedience to God commonly grow worse and worse, and the heart is more and more hardened by the deceitfulness of sin. Here is the genuine language of the rebellious heart: "We will certainly do whatsoever thing goes forth out of our own mouth," let God and his prophets say what they please to the contrary. What they said many think, that yet have not arrived to such a degree of impudence as to speak it out. It is that which the young man would be at in the days of his youth; he would walk in the way of his heart, and the sight of his eyes, and would have and do every thing he has a mind to, Eccl. xi. 9.

2. They give some sort of reasons for their resolutions. For the most absurd and unreasonably wicked men will have something to say for themselves, till the day comes when every mouth shall be stopped.

1st. They plead many of those things which the advocates for Rome make the marks of a true church, and not only justify but magnify themselves with; and these here have as much right to them as they have. First. They plead antiquity: We are resolved to burn incense to the queen of heaven, for our fathers did so; it is a practice that pleads prescription, and why should we pretend to be wiser than our fathers? Secondly. They plead authority. They that had power practised it themselves, and prescribed it to others; our kings and our princes did it, whom God set over us, and who were of the seed of David. Thirdly. They plead unity. It was not here and there one that did it, but we,—we all with one consent, we that are a great multitude, ver. 15, we did it. Fourthly. They plead universality. It was not done here and there, but in the cities of Judah. Fifthly. They plead visibility. It was done not in a corner, in dark and shady groves only, but in the streets, openly and publicly. Sixthly. They plead that it was the practice of the mother church, the holy see; it was not now learned first in Egypt, but it had been done in Jerusalem. Seventhly. They plead prosperity; Then had we plenty of bread, and of all good things; we were well, and saw no evil. All the rest I fear were too true in fact, (God's witnesses against their idolatry were few and hid; Elijah thought he was left alone,) and this last might perhaps be true as to some particular persons; but as to their nation, they were still under rebukes for their rebellions, and there was no peace to them that went out or came in, 2 Chr. xv. 5. But supposing all to be true, yet this doth not at all excuse them from idolatry; it is the law of God that we must be ruled and judged by, not the practice of men.

2nd. They suggest, that the judgments they had of late been under were brought upon them for leaving off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, ver. 18. So perversely did they misconstrue providence, though God by his prophets had so often explained it to them, and the thing itself spoke the direct contrary. Since we forsook our idolatries "we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword;" the true reason of which was because they still retained their idols in their hearts, and an affection to their old sins. But they would have it thought it was because they had forsaken the acts of sin. Thus the afflictions which should have been for their welfare, to part between them and their sins, being misinterpreted, did but confirm them in their sins. Thus in the first ages of Christianity, when God chastised the nations by any public calamities for opposing the Christians and persecuting them, they put a contrary sense upon the calamities, as if they were sent to punish them for conniving at the Christians, and tolerating them, and cried, Christianos ad leones,—'Throw the Christians to the lions.' Yet if it had been true as they said here, that since they returned to the service of the true God, the God of Israel, they had been in want and trouble, was that a reason why they should revolt from him again? That was as much as to say, they served not him, but their own bellies. Those that know God, and put their trust in him will serve him, though he starve them, though he slay them, though they never see a good day with him in this world, being well assured that they shall not lose by him in the end.

3rd. They plead that, though the women were most forward and active in their idolatries, yet they did it with the consent and approbation of their husbands. The women were busy to make cakes for meat offerings to the queen of heaven, and to prepare and pour out the drink offerings, ver. 19. We found before it was their work, ch. vii. 18; but, did we do it without our husbands, privately and unknown to them, so as to give them occasion to be jealous of us? No, the fathers kindled the fire, while the women kneaded the dough. The men that were our heads, whom we were bound to learn of, and to be obedient to, taught us to do it by their example. Note, It is sad when those that are in the nearest relation to each other, that should quicken each other to that which is good, and so help one another to heaven, harden each other in sin, and so ripen one another for hell. Some understand this as spoken by the husbands, ver. 15, who plead they did not do it without their men, that is, without their elders and rulers, their great men, and men in authority; but, because the making of the cakes and the pouring out of the drink offerings is expressly spoken of as the women's work, ch. vii. 18, it seems rather to be understood as their plea. But it was a frivolous plea; what would it avail them to be able to say that it was according to their husband's mind, when they knew it was contrary to their God's mind?

20 Then Jeremiah said unto all the people, to the men, and to the women, and to all the people which had given him that answer, saying, 21 The incense that ye burned in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, ye, and your fathers, your kings, and your princes, and the people of the land, did not the LORD remember them, and came it not into his mind? 22 So that the LORD could no longer bear, because of the evil of your doings, and because of the abominations which ye have committed; therefore is your land a desolation, and an astonishment, and a curse, without an inhabitant, as at this day. 23 Because ye have burned incense, and because ye have sinned against the LORD, and have not obeyed the voice of the LORD, nor walked in his law, nor in his statutes, nor in his testimonies; therefore this evil is happened unto you, as at this day. 24 Moreover Jeremiah said unto all the people, and to all the women, Hear the word of the LORD, all Judah that are in the land of Egypt: 25 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying; Ye and your wives have both spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hand, saying, We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her: ye will surely accomplish your vows, and surely perform your vows. 26 Therefore hear ye the word of the LORD, all Judah that dwell in the land of Egypt; Behold, I have sworn by my great name, saith the LORD, that my name shall no more be named in the mouth of any man of Judah in all the land of Egypt, saying, the LORD God liveth. 27 Behold, I will watch over them for evil, and not for good: and all the men of Judah that are in the land of Egypt shall be consumed by the sword and by the famine, until there be an end of them. 28 Yet a small number that escape the sword shall return out of the land of Egypt into the land of Judah, and all the remnant of Judah, that are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall know whose words shall stand, mine, or their's. 29 And this shall be a sign unto you, saith the LORD, that I will punish you in this place, that ye may know that my words shall surely stand against you for evil: 30 Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life; as I gave Zedekiah king of Judah into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, his enemy, and that sought his life.

Daring sinners may speak many a bold word, and many a big word, but, after all, God will have the last word; for he will be justified when he speaks, and all flesh, even the proudest, shall be silent before him. Prophets may be run down, but God cannot; nay, here the prophet would not.

First. Jeremiah hath something to say to them from himself, which he could say without a spirit of prophecy, and that was to rectify their mistake, (a wilful mistake it was,) concerning the calamities they had been under, and the true intent and meaning of them. They said, these miseries came upon them, because they had now left off burning incense to the queen of heaven; No, saith he, it was because you had formerly done it, not because you had now left it off. When they gave him that answer, he presently replied upon them, ver. 20, that the incense which they and their fathers had burnt to other gods did indeed go unpunished a great while, for God was long-suffering towards them; and during the day of his patience it was perhaps, as they said, well with them, and they saw no evil. But at length they grew so provoking, that "the Lord could no longer bear," ver. 22, but began a controversy with them, whereupon some of them did a little reform; their sins left them, for so it might be said, rather than that they left their sins. But their old guilt being still upon the score, and their corrupt inclinations still the same, God remembered against them the idolatries of their fathers, their kings and their princes, in the streets of Jerusalem, which they, instead of being ashamed of, gloried in, as a justification of them in their idolatries; they all came into his mind, ver. 21, all the abominations which they had committed, ver. 22, and all their disobedience to the voice of the Lord, ver. 23. All was brought to account; and therefore, to punish them for these, is their land a desolation and a curse, as at this day, ver. 22; therefore, not for their late reformation, but for their old transgressions, is all this evil happened to them, as at this day, ver. 23. Note, The right understanding of the cause of our troubles, one would think, should go far towards the cure of our sins. Whatever evil comes upon us, it is because we have sinned against the Lord, and should therefore stand in awe, and not sin.

Secondly. Jeremiah hath something to say to them, to the women particularly, from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; they have given their answer, now let them hear God's reply, ver. 24. Judah, that dwells in the land of Egypt, hath God speaking to them even there, that is their privilege. Let them observe what he saith, that is their duty, ver. 26. Now God in his reply tells them plainly,

1. That, since they were fully determined to persist in their idolatry, God was fully determined to proceed in his controversy with them; if they would go on to provoke him he would go on to punish them, and see which would get the better at last. God repeats what they had said; ver. 25, You and your wives are agreed in this obstinacy, "you have spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hands;" you have said it, and you stand to it; have said it, and go on to do accordingly: "We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven;" as if, though it were a sin, yet their having vowed to do it were sufficient to justify them in the doing of it; whereas no man can by his vow make that lawful to himself, much less duty, which God has already made sin. Well, saith God, you will accomplish, you will perform your wicked vows; now hear what is my vow, what I have sworn, by my great name; and if the Lord hath sworn he will not repent. Since they have sworn and will not repent, with the froward he will shew himself froward, Ps. xviii. 26. He hath sworn, 1st. That what little remains of religion there were among them should be lost, ver. 26. Though they joined with the Egyptians in their idolatries, yet they continued upon many occasions to make mention of the name of Jehovah, particularly in their solemn oaths; they said, Jehovah liveth, he is the living God, so they owned him to be, though they worshipped dead idols. They swear, "The Lord liveth," ch. v. 2, but I fear they retained this form of swearing more in honour of their nation than of their God; but God saith, his name shall no more be thus named by any man of Judah, in all the land of Egypt; that is, there shall be no Jews remaining to use this dialect of their country; or, if there be, they shall have forgotten it, and shall learn to swear as the Egyptians do, by the life of Pharaoh, not of Jehovah. Note, Those are very miserable whom God hath so far left to themselves as that they have quite forgot their religion, and lost all the remains of their good education. Or, this may intimate that God would take it as an affront to him, and would resent it accordingly, if they did make mention of his name, and profess any relation to him. 2nd. He hath sworn that what little remnant of his people there was there should all be consumed, ver. 27. I will watch over them for evil, no opportunity shall be let slip to bring some judgment upon them, until there be an end of them, and they be quite rooted out. Note, To those whom God finds impenitent sinners he will be found an implacable judge. And when it comes to this they shall know, ver. 29, "Whose word shall stand, mine or theirs." They said they should recover themselves when they returned to worship the queen of heaven; God saith they should ruin themselves, and now the event will shew which was in the right. The contest between God and sinners is, whose word shall stand, whose will shall be done, who shall get the better. Sinners say they shall have peace, though they go on. God saith they shall have no peace; but when God judgeth he will overcome. God's word shall stand, and not the sinners'.

2. He tells them that a very few of them should escape the sword, and in process of time return into the land of Judah a small number, ver. 28. Next none, in comparison with the great numbers that should return out of the land of the Chaldeans. This seems designed to upbraid those who boasted of their numbers that concurred in sin; there were none to speak of that did not join in idolatry. Well, saith God, and there shall be as few that shall escape the sword and famine.

3. He gives them a sign that all these threatenings shall be accomplished in their season; that they shall be consumed here in Egypt, and shall quite perish. Pharaoh Hophra, the present king of Egypt, shall be delivered into the hand of his enemies that seek his life; of his own rebellious subjects, so some, under Amasis, who usurped his throne; of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, so others, who invaded his kingdom. The former is related by Herodotus, the latter by Josephus. It is likely this Pharaoh had tempted the Jews to idolatry by promises of his favour; however, they depended upon him for his protection; and it would be more than a presage of their ruin, it would be a step towards it, if he were gone. They expected more from him than from Zedekiah king of Judah, he was a more potent and politic prince; but, saith God, I will give him into the hand of his enemies, as I gave Zedekiah. Note, Those creature comforts and confidences that we promise ourselves most from may fail us as soon as those that we promise ourselves least from, for they are all what God makes them, not what we fancy them.

The sacred history records not the accomplishment of this prophecy; but its silence is sufficient. We hear no more of these Jews in Egypt, and therefore conclude them, according to this prediction, lost there; for no word of God shall fall to the ground.

CHAPTER XLV.

The prophecy we have in this chapter concerns Baruch only, yet is intended for the support and encouragement of all the Lord's people that serve him faithfully, and keep close to him in difficult trying times. It is laid here after the story of the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews, but was delivered long before, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, as was the prophecy in the next chapter, and probably those that follow. We here find, I. How Baruch was frightened when he was brought into trouble for writing and reading Jeremiah's roll, ver. 1—3. II. How his fears were checked with a reproof for his great expectations, and silenced with a promise of special preservation, ver. 4, 5. Though Baruch was only Jeremiah's scribe, yet this notice is taken of his frights, and this provision made for his comfort; for God despiseth not any of his servants, but graciously concerns himself for the meanest and weakest, for Baruch the scribe as well as for Jeremiah the prophet.

THE word that Jeremiah the prophet spake unto Baruch the son of Neriah, when he had written these words in a book at the mouth of Jeremiah, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, unto thee, O Baruch;

3 Thou didst say, Woe is me now!
For the LORD hath added grief to my sorrow;
I fainted in my sighing,
And I find no rest.

4 Thus shalt thou say unto him, The LORD saith thus;
Behold, that which I have built will I break down,
And that which I have planted I will pluck up,
Even this whole land.

5 And seekest thou great things for thyself?
Seek them not: [LORD:
For, behold, I will bring evil upon all flesh, saith the
But thy life will I give unto thee for a prey
In all places whither thou goest.

How Baruch was employed in writing Jeremiah's prophecies, and reading them, we had an account, ch. xxxvi., and how he was threatened for it by the king, warrants being out for him, and he forced to abscond, and how narrowly he escaped under a Divine protection, to which story this chapter should have been subjoined; but that, it having reference to a private person, it is here thrown into the latter end of the book, as St. Paul's epistle to Philemon is put after his other epistles. Observe,

First. The consternation that poor Baruch was in when he was sought for by the king's messengers, and obliged to hide his head, and the notice which God took of it. He cried out, "Woe is me now," ver. 3. He was a young man, setting out in the world, he was well affected to the things of God, and was willing to serve God and his prophet; but when it came to suffering he was desirous to be excused. Being an ingenious man and a scholar, he stood fair for preferment; and now to be driven into a corner, and in danger of a prison, or worse, was a great baulk to him. When he read the roll publicly, he hoped to gain reputation by it, that it would have made him to be taken notice of and employed; but when he found that instead of that it exposed him to contempt, and brought him into disgrace, he cried out, I am undone, I shall fall into the pursuivant's hands, and be imprisoned and put to death, or banished; "The Lord has added grief to my sorrow;" that is, has loaded me with one trouble after another. After the grief of writing and reading the prophecies of my country's ruin, I have the sorrow of being treated as a criminal for so doing; and though another might make nothing of this, yet for my part I cannot bear it, it is a burthen too heavy for me. "I fainted in my sighing," or, I am faint with my sighing, it just kills me, and "I find no rest," no satisfaction in my own mind; I cannot compose myself as I should and would to bear it, nor have I any prospect of relief or comfort. Baruch was a good man; but we must say, this was his infirmity. Note, 1. Young beginners in religion, like fresh-water soldiers, are apt to be discouraged with the little difficulties which they commonly meet with at first in the service of God. They do but run with the footmen, and it wearieth them; they faint upon the very dawning of the day of adversity, and it is an evidence that their strength is small, Pr. xxiv. 10; that their faith is weak, and they are yet but babes that cry for every hurt, and every fright. 2. Some of the best and dearest of God's saints and servants, when they have seen storms rising, have been in frights, and apt to make the worst of things, and to disquiet themselves with melancholy apprehensions more than there is cause for. 3. God takes notice of the frets and discontents of his people, and is displeased with them. Baruch should have rejoiced that he was counted worthy to suffer in such a good cause, and with such good company; but instead of that he vexeth at it, and blames his lot; nay, and reflects upon his God, as if he had dealt hardly with him. What he said was spoken in a heat and passion, but God was offended at it; as Moses himself did, and paid dear for it too, when, his spirit being provoked, he spake unadvisedly with his lips. Thou didst say so and so, and it was not well said. God keeps account what we say, even when we speak in haste.

Secondly. The reproof that God gave him for talking at this rate. Jeremiah was troubled to see him in such a toss, and knew not well what to say to him; he was loath to chide him, and yet thought he deserved it; was willing to comfort him, and yet knew not which way to go about it; but God tells him what he shall say unto him, ver. 3. Jeremiah could not be certain what was at the bottom of the complaints and fears, but God sees it. They came from his corruptions; and therefore the hurt might not be healed slightly. He searcheth the wound, and shews him that he had raised his expectations too high in this world, and had promised himself too much from it, and that made this distress and trouble he was in so very grievous to him, and so hard to be borne. Note, The frowns of the world would not disquiet us as they do if we did not foolishly flatter ourselves with the hopes of its smiles, and court and covet them too much. It is our over-fondness for the good things of this present time that makes us impatient under its evil things. Now God shews him that it was his fault and folly, at this time of day especially, either to desire or to look for an abundance of the wealth and honour of this world; for, 1. The ship was sinking; ruin was coming upon the Jewish nation, an utter and universal ruin. That which I have built to be a house for myself I am breaking down, and that which I have planted to be a vineyard for myself I am plucking up, even this whole land, the Jewish church and state, and dost thou now seek great things for thyself? Dost thou expect to be rich and honourable, and to make a figure now? No, 2. It is absurd for thee to be now painting thine own cabin. Canst thou expect to be high when all are brought low? to be full, when all about thee are empty? To seek ourselves more than the public welfare, especially to seek great things to ourselves, when the public is in danger, is very unbecoming Israelites. We may apply it to this world, and our state in it; God in his providence is breaking down and pulling up; everything is uncertain and perishing; we cannot expect any continuing city here. What folly is it then to seek great things for ourselves here, where every thing is little, and nothing certain!

Thirdly. The encouragement that God gave him to hope that, though he should not be great, yet he should be safe; "I will bring evil upon all flesh," all nations of men, all orders and degrees of men; "but thy life will I give to thee for a prey," (thy soul, so the word is,) in all places whither thou goest. Thou must expect to be hurried from place to place, and wherever thou goest to be in danger; but thou shalt escape, though often very narrowly; shalt have thy life, but it shall be as a prey which is got with much difficulty and danger; thou shalt be saved as by fire. Note, The preservation and continuance of life is a very great mercy, and we are bound to account it so, as it is the prolonging of our opportunity to glorify God in this world, and to get ready for a better; and at some times especially, when the arrows of death fly thick about us, it is a signal favour, and what we ought to be very thankful for, and while we have it must not complain though we be disappointed of the great things we expected. Is not the life more than meat?

CHAPTER XLVI.

How judgment began at the house of God we have found in the foregoing prophecy and history, but now we shall find that it did not end there. In this and the following chapters we have predictions of the desolations of the neighbour nations, and those brought upon them too mostly by the king of Babylon, till at length Babylon itself comes to be reckoned with. The prophecy against Egypt is here put first, and takes up this whole chapter, in which we have, I. A prophecy of the defeat of Pharaoh-necho's army by the Chaldean forces at Carchemish, which was accomplished presently in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, ver. 1—12. II. A prophecy of the descent which Nebuchadnezzar should make upon the land of Egypt, and his success in it, which was accomplished some years after the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 13—26. III. A word of comfort to the Israel of God in the midst of these calamities, ver. 27, 28.

THE word of the LORD which came to Jeremiah the prophet against the Gentiles; 2 Against Egypt, against the army of Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, which was by the river Euphrates in Carchemish, which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon smote in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah.

3 Order ye the buckler and shield,
And draw near to battle.
4 Harness the horses; and get up, ye horsemen,
And stand forth with your helmets;
Furbish the spears, and put on the brigandines.
5 Wherefore have I seen them dismayed and turned away back?
And their mighty ones are beaten down,
And are fled apace, and look not back:
For fear was round about, saith the LORD.
6 Let not the swift flee away,
Nor the mighty man escape;
They shall stumble, and fall
Toward the north by the river Euphrates.
7 Who is this that cometh up as a flood,
Whose waters are moved as the rivers?
8 Egypt riseth up like a flood,
And his waters are moved like the rivers;
And he saith, I will go up, and will cover the earth;
I will destroy the city and the inhabitants thereof.
9 Come up, ye horses;
And rage, ye chariots;
And let the mighty men come forth;
The Ethiopians and the Libyans, that handle the shield;
And the Lydians, that handle and bend the bow.
10 For this is the day of the Lord GOD of hosts,
A day of vengeance, that he may avenge him of his adversaries:
And the sword shall devour,
And it shall be satiate and made drunk with their blood:
For the Lord GOD of hosts hath a sacrifice
In the north country by the river Euphrates.
11 Go up into Gilead, and take balm,
O virgin, the daughter of Egypt:
In vain shalt thou use many medicines;
For thou shalt not be cured.
12 The nations have heard of thy shame,
And thy cry hath filled the land:
For the mighty man hath stumbled against the mighty.
And they are fallen both together.

The first verse is the title of that part of this book which relates to the neighbour nations, and follows here. It is the word of the Lord which came to Jeremiah against the Gentiles; for God is king and judge of nations, knows them, and will call them to an account that know him not, nor take any notice of him. Both Isaiah and Ezekiel prophesied against these nations, that Jeremiah here has a several saying to, and with reference to the same events. In the Old Testament we have the word of the Lord against the Gentiles. In the New Testament we have the word of the Lord for the Gentiles; that they who are far off are made nigh.

He begins with Egypt, because they were of old Israel's oppressors, and of late their deceivers, when they put confidence in them. In these verses he foretells the overthrow of the army of Pharaoh-necho by Nebuchadnezzar, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which was so complete a victory to the king of Babylon that thereby he recovered from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates all that pertained to the king of Egypt, and so weakened him that he "came not again any more out of his land," as we find, 2 Kin. xxiv. 7; and so made him pay dear for his expedition against the king of Assyria four years before, in which he slew Josiah, 2 Kin. xxiii. 29. This is the event that is here foretold in lofty expressions of triumph over Egypt, thus foiled; which Jeremiah would speak of with a particular pleasure, because the death of Josiah which he had lamented was now avenged on Pharaoh-necho. Now here,

First. The Egyptians are upbraided with the mighty preparations they made for this expedition, in which the prophet calls to them to do their utmost, for so they would. Come then, order the buckler, let the weapons of war be got ready, ver. 3. Egypt was famous for horses, let them be harnessed, and the cavalry well mounted; "Get up, ye horsemen, and stand forth," &c., ver. 4. See what preparations the children of men make with abundance of care and trouble, and at a vast expense, to kill one another, as if they did not die fast enough of themselves. He compares their marching out upon this expedition to the rising of their river Nile, ver. 7, 8. Egypt now riseth up like a flood, scorning to keep within its own banks, and threatening to overflow all the neighbouring lands. It is a very formidable army that the Egyptians bring into the field upon this occasion; the prophet summons them, ver. 9, "Come up, ye horses; rage, ye chariots." He challengeth them to bring all their confederate troops together, the Ethiopians, that descended from the same stock with the Egyptians, Gen. x. 6, and were their neighbours and allies; the Lybians and Lydians both seated in Africa, to the west of Egypt, and from them the Egyptians fetched their auxiliary forces. Let them strengthen themselves with all the art and interest they have, yet it shall be all in vain, they shall be shamefully defeated notwithstanding; for God will fight against them, and against him there is no wisdom, nor counsel, Pr. xxi. 30, 31. It concerns them that go forth to war, not only to order the buckler and harness the horses, but to repent of their sins, and pray to God for his presence with them, and that they may have it to keep themselves from every wicked thing.

Secondly. They are upbraided with the great expectations they had from this expedition, which were quite contrary to what God intended in bringing them together. They knew their own thoughts, and God knew them, and sate in heaven and laughed at them, but they knew not the thoughts of the Lord, for he gathers them as sheaves into the floor, Mic. iv. 11, 12. Egypt saith, ver. 8, "I will go up, I will cover the earth," and none shall hinder me, "I will destroy the city," whatever city it is that stands in my way; like Pharaoh of old, I will pursue, I will overtake. Egypt saith they shall have a day of it, but God saith it shall be his day; "This is the day of the Lord of hosts," ver. 10, the day in which he will be exalted in the overthrow of the Egyptians. They meant one thing, but God meant another; they designed it for the advancement of their dignity and the enlargement of their dominion; but God designed it for a great abasement and weakening of their kingdom. It is a day of vengeance for Josiah's death; it is a day of sacrifice to Divine justice, to which multitudes of the sinners of Egypt shall fall as victims. Note, When men think to magnify themselves by pushing on unrighteous enterprises, let them expect that God will glorify himself by blasting them and cutting them off.

Thirdly. They are upbraided with their cowardice and inglorious flight when they come to an engagement, ver. 5, 6. Wherefore have I seen them, notwithstanding these mighty and vast preparations, and all these expressions of bravery and resolution, when the Chaldean army faceth them, dismayed, turned back quite disheartened, and no spirit left in them. 1. They make a shameful retreat. Even their mighty ones, that one would think should have stood their ground, flee a flight, flee by consent, make the best of their way, flee in confusion and with the utmost precipitation; they have neither time nor heart to look back, but fear is round about them, for they apprehend it so. And yet, 2. They cannot make their escape. They have the shame of flying, and yet not the satisfaction of saving themselves by flight; they might as well have stood their ground and died upon the spot, for even the swift shall not flee away. The lightness of their heels shall fail them when it comes to the trial, as well as the stoutness of their hearts; the mighty shall not escape, nay, they are beaten down and broken to pieces. They shall stumble in their flight, and fall towards the north, towards their enemies' country; for such confusion were they in when they took to their feet, that instead of making homewards, as men usually do in that case, they made forwards. Note, The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong. Valiant men are not always victorious.

Fourthly. They are upbraided with their utter inability ever to recover this blow, which should be fatal to their nation, ver. 11, 12. The damsel, the daughter of Egypt, that lived in great pomp and state, is sorely wounded by this defeat. Let her now seek for balm in Gilead, and physicians there; let her use all the medicines her wise men can prescribe for the healing of this hurt and the repairing of the loss sustained by this defeat, but all in vain, no cure shall be to them; they shall never be able to bring such a powerful army as this into the field again. The nations that rang of thy glory and strength have now heard of thy shame, how shamefully thou wast routed, and how thou art weakened by it; it needs not be spread by the triumphs of the conquerors, the shrieks and outcries of the conquered will proclaim it; thy cry filled the country about. For when they fled several ways, one mighty man stumbled upon another and dashed against another, such confusion were they in, so that both together became a prey to the pursuers, an easy prey. A thousand such dreadful accidents there should be, which should fill the country with the cry of them that were overcome. Let not the mighty man, therefore, glory in his might, for the time may come when it will stand him in no stead.

13 The word that the LORD spake to Jeremiah the prophet, how Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon should come and smite the land of Egypt.

14 Declare ye in Egypt, and publish in Migdol,
And publish in Noph and in Tahpanhes:
Say ye, Stand fast, and prepare thee;
For the sword shall devour round about thee.
15 Why are thy valiant men swept away?
They stood not, because the LORD did drive them.
16 He made many to fall,
Yea, one fell upon another: [people,
And they said, Arise, and let us go again to our own
And to the land of our nativity,
From the oppressing sword.
17 They did cry there,
Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise;
He hath passed the time appointed.
18 As I live, saith the King,
Whose name is the LORD of hosts,
Surely as Tabor is among the mountains,
And as Carmel by the sea, so shall he come.
19 O thou daughter dwelling in Egypt,
Furnish thyself to go into captivity:
For Noph shall be waste
And desolate without an inhabitant.
20 Egypt is like a very fair heifer,
But destruction cometh;
It cometh out of the north. [bullocks;

For they also are turned back,
And are fled away together: they did not stand,
Because the day of their calamity was come upon them,
And the time of their visitation.
22 The voice thereof shall go like a serpent;
For they shall march with an army,
And come against her with axes,
As hewers of wood.
23 They shall cut down her forest, saith the LORD,
Though it cannot be searched;
Because they are more than the grasshoppers,
And are innumerable.

Behold, I will punish the multitude of No,
And Pharaoh, and Egypt,
With their gods, and their kings;
Even Pharaoh, and all them that trust in him:

And into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon,
And into the hand of his servants:
And afterward it shall be inhabited,
As in the days of old, saith the LORD.
27 But fear not thou, O my servant Jacob,
And be not dismayed, O Israel:
For, behold, I will save thee from afar off,
And thy seed from the land of their captivity;
And Jacob shall return, and be in rest
And at ease, and none shall make him afraid.
28 Fear thou not, O Jacob my servant,
Saith the LORD: for I am with thee;
For I will make a full end of all the nations
Whither I have driven thee:
But I will not make a full end of thee,
But correct thee in measure;
Yet will I not leave thee wholly unpunished.

NO—THEBES.—ver. 25.

In these verses we have,

First. Confusion and terror spoken to Egypt. The accomplishment of the prediction in the former part of the chapter disabled the Egyptians to make any attempts upon other nations; for what could they do when their army was routed? But still they remained strong at home, and none of their neighbours durst make any attempts upon them. Though the kings of Egypt came no more out of their land, 2 Kin. xxiv. 7, yet they kept safe and easy in their land; and what would they desire more than peaceably to enjoy their own? which, one would think, all men should be content to do, and not covet to invade their neighbours. But the measure of Egypt's iniquity is full, and now they shall not long enjoy their own; they that encroached on others shall now be themselves encroached on. The scope of the prophecy here is to shew how the king of Babylon should shortly come, and smite the land of Egypt, and bring the war into their own bosoms, which they had formerly carried into his borders, ver. 13. This was fulfilled by the same hand with the former, even Nebuchadnezzar's, but many years after, twenty at least, and probably the prediction of it was long after the former prediction, and perhaps much about the same time with that other prediction of the same event which we had ch. xliii. 10.

1. Here is the alarm of war sounded in Egypt, to their great amazement, ver. 14. Notice given to the country that the enemy is approaching, the sword is devouring round about in the neighbouring countries, and therefore it is time for the Egyptians to put themselves in a posture of defence, to prepare for war, that they may give the enemy a warm reception. This must be proclaimed in all parts of Egypt, particularly in Migdol, Noph, and Tahpanhes, because in these places especially the Jewish refugees, or fugitives rather, had planted themselves in contempt of God's command, ch. xliv. 1, and let them hear what a sorry shelter Egypt is like to be to them.

2. The retreat of the forces of other nations, which the Egyptians had in their pay, hereupon, is here foretold. Some considerable number of those troops, it is probable, were posted upon the frontiers, to guard them, where they were beaten off by the invaders and put to flight. Then were the "valiant men swept away," ver. 15, as with a sweeping rain; it is the word that is used, Pr. xxviii. 3. They can none of them stand their ground, because the Lord driveth them from their respective posts; he drives them by his terrors, he drives them by enabling the Chaldeans to drive them. It is not possible those should fix whom the wrath of God chaseth. He it was, ver. 16, that "made many to fall." Yea, when their day is come to fall, the enemy needs not throw them down, they shall fall one upon another, every man shall be a stumbling-block to his fellow, to his follower; nay, if God pleaseth they shall be made to fall one upon another, every man's sword shall be against his fellow. Her hired men, the troops Egypt has in her service, are indeed in the midst of her like fatted bullocks, lusty men, able-bodied, and great spirited, that were likely for action, and to have made their part good against the enemy, but they are turned back. Their hearts failed them, and instead of fighting they are fled away together; how could they withstand their fate, when the day of their calamity was come, the day in which God will visit them in wrath? Some think they are compared to fatted bullocks for their luxury; they had wantoned in pleasures, so that they were very unfit for hardships, and therefore turned back, and could not stand. In this consternation, 1st. They all made homewards, towards their own country, ver. 16. They said, "Arise, and let us go again to our own people," where we may be safe from the oppressing sword of the Chaldeans, that bears down all before it. In times of exigence little confidence is to be put in mercenary troops, that fight purely for pay, and have no interest in them whom they fight for. 2nd. They exclaimed mightily against Pharaoh, to whose cowardice or ill conduct it is probable their defeat was owing. When he posted them there upon the borders of his country it is likely he told them he would, within such a time, come himself, with a gallant army of his own subjects, to support them; but he failed them, and when the enemy advanced they found they had none to back them, so that they were perfectly abandoned to the fury of the invaders. No marvel, then, that they quitted their post and deserted the service, crying out, "Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise," ver. 17. He can hector, and bounce, and talk big, what mighty things he would do, but that is all, he brings nothing to pass. All his promises to those in alliance with him, or that are employed for him, vanish into smoke; he brings not the succours he engaged to bring, or not till it is too late. He hath passed the time appointed, did not keep his word, nor keep his day, and therefore they bid him farewell, they will never serve under him any more. Note, Many times those that make most noise in any business are but a noise; great talkers are little doers.

3. The formidable power of the Chaldean army is here described bearing down all before it. The King of kings, whose name is the Lord of hosts, and before whom the mightiest kings on earth, though gods to us, are but grasshoppers; he hath said it, he hath sworn it, As I live, saith this king, as Tabor overtops the mountains, and Carmel overlooks the sea, so shall the king of Babylon overpower all the force of Egypt, such a command shall he have, such a sway shall he bear, ver. 18. He and his army shall come against Egypt "with axes, as hewers of wood," ver. 22, and the Egyptians shall be no more able to resist them than the tree is to resist the man that comes with an axe to cut it down. So that Egypt shall be felled as a forest is by the hewers of wood, which, if they be many of them, and those well provided with instruments for the purpose, will be done in a little time. Egypt is very populous, full of towns and cities, like a forest, the trees of which cannot be searched or numbered, and very rich; full of hid treasures, many of which will escape the searching eye of the Chaldean soldiers. But they shall make a great spoil in the country, for they are more than the locusts, that come in vast swarms, and overrun a country, devouring every green thing, Joel i. 6, 7; so shall the Chaldeans do, for they are innumerable. Note, The Lord of hosts hath numberless hosts at his command.

4. The desolation of Egypt hereby is foretold, and the waste that should be made of that rich country. Egypt is now like a very fair heifer or calf, ver. 20, fat and shining, and not accustomed to the yoke of subjection; wanton as a heifer that is well fed and very sportful. Some think here is an allusion to Apis, the bull or calf which the Egyptians worshipped, from whom the children of Israel learned to worship the golden calf. Egypt is as fair as a goddess, and adores herself; but destruction cometh, cutting up comes, (so some read it;) it comes out of the north. Thence the Chaldean soldiers shall come as so many butchers, or sacrificers, to kill and cut up this fair heifer. 1st. The Egyptians shall be brought down, shall be tamed, and their tune changed. "The daughter of Egypt shall be confounded," ver. 24, shall be filled with astonishment. Their voice shall go like a serpent, that is, it shall be very low and submissive; they shall not low like a fair heifer that makes a great noise, but hiss out of their holes like serpents. They shall not dare to make loud complaints of the cruelty of their conquerors, but vent their griefs in silent murmurs. They shall not now, as they used to do, answer roughly, but with the poor use entreaties and beg for their lives. 2nd. They shall be carried away prisoners into their enemies' land; ver. 19, "O thou daughter," dwelling securely and delicately in Egypt, that fruitful pleasant country, do not think this world will last always, but "furnish thyself to go into captivity;" instead of rich clothes, which will but tempt the enemy to strip thee, get plain and warm clothes; instead of fine shoes provide strong ones, and inure thyself to hardship, that thou mayest bear it the better. Note, It concerns us, among all our preparations, to prepare for trouble; we provide for the entertainment of our friends, let us not neglect to provide for the entertainment of our enemies, nor among all our furniture omit furniture for captivity. The Egyptians must prepare to flee, for their cities shall be evacuated; Noph particularly shall be "desolate, without an inhabitant," so general shall the slaughter and the captivity be. There are some penalties which we say the king and the multitude are exempted from, but here even these are obnoxious. The multitude of No shall be punished; it is called "populous No," Nah. iii. 8. Though hand join in hand, yet they shall not escape; nor can any think to go off in the crowd. Be they never so many, they shall find God will be too many for them. Their kings and all their petty princes shall fall, and their gods too, ch. xliii. 12, 13, their idols and their great men. Those which they call tutelar deities shall be no protection to them. Pharaoh shall be brought down, and all those that trust in him, ver. 25, particularly the Jews that came to sojourn in his country, trusting in him rather than in God. All these shall be delivered into the hand of the northern nations, ver. 24; into the hand not only of Nebuchadnezzar, that mighty potentate, but into the hand of his servants, according to the curse on Ham's posterity, of which the Egyptians were, that they should be the servant of servants. These seek their lives, and into their hands they shall be delivered.

5. An intimation is given that in process of time Egypt shall recover itself again; ver. 26, "Afterwards it shall be inhabited," shall be peopled again, whereas by this destruction it was almost dispeopled. Ezekiel foretells that this should be at the end of forty years, Eze. xxix. 13. See what changes the nations of the earth are subject to, how they are emptied and increased again; and let not nations that prosper be secure, nor those that for the present are under hatches despair.

Secondly. Here is comfort and peace spoken to the Israel of God, ver. 27, 28. Some understand it of those whom the king of Egypt had carried into captivity with Jehoahaz, but we read not of any that were carried captives with him; it may therefore refer rather to the captives in Babylon whom God had mercy in store for, or, more generally to all the people of God, designed for their encouragement in the most difficult times, when the judgments of God are abroad among the nations. We had these words of comfort before, ch. xxx. 10, 11. 1. Let the wicked of the earth tremble, they have cause for it; "But fear not thou, O my servant Jacob; and be not dismayed, O Israel." And again, "Fear thou not, O Jacob." God would not have his people be a timorous people. 2. The wicked of the earth shall be put away like dross, not to be looked after any more; but God's people, in order to their being saved, shall be found out and gathered, though they be afar off; shall be redeemed, though they be held fast in captivity, and shall return. 3. The wicked is like the troubled sea when it cannot rest, flee when none pursues; but Jacob being at home in God, shall be in rest and at ease, and none shall make him afraid; for what time he is afraid, he has a God to trust to. 4. The wicked, God beholds afar off; But wherever thou art, O Jacob, I am with thee, a very present help. 5. A full end shall be made of the nations that oppress God's Israel, as Egypt and Babylon; but mercy shall be kept in store for the Israel of God. They shall be corrected, but not cast off, the correction shall be in measure, in respect of degree and continuance. Nations have their periods; the Jewish nation itself is come to an end as a nation; but the gospel church, God's spiritual Israel, still continues, and will to the end of time. In that this promise is to have its full accomplishment, that though God correct it he will never make an end of it.

CHAPTER XLVII.

This chapter reads the Philistines their doom, as the former read the Egyptians theirs; and by the same hand, that of Nebuchadnezzar. It is short, but terrible; and Tyre and Sidon, though they lay at some distance from them, come in sharers with them in the destruction here threatened. I. It is foretold that the forces of the northern crowns should come upon them, to their great terror, ver. 1—5. II. That the war should continue long, and their endeavours to put an end to it should be in vain, ver. 6, 7.

THE word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet against the Philistines, before that Pharaoh smote Gaza. 2 Thus saith the LORD;

Behold, waters rise up out of the north,
And shall be an overflowing flood,
And shall overflow the land, and all that is therein;
The city, and them that dwell therein:
Then the men shall cry,
And all the inhabitants of the land shall howl. [horses,
3 At the noise of the stamping of the hoofs of his strong
At the rushing of his chariots,
And at the rumbling of his wheels,
The fathers shall not look back to their children
For feebleness of hands;
4 Because of the day that cometh
To spoil all the Philistines,
And to cut off from Tyrus and Zidon
Every helper that remaineth:
For the LORD will spoil the Philistines,
The remnant of the country of Caphtor.
5 Baldness is come upon Gaza;
Ashkelon is cut off with the remnant of their valley:
How long wilt thou cut thyself?
6 O thou sword of the LORD,
How long will it be ere thou be quiet? put up thyself into thy scabbard,
Rest, and be still.
7 How can it be quiet,
Seeing the LORD hath given it a charge
Against Ashkelon, and against the sea shore?
There hath he appointed it.

ASHKELON.

As the Egyptians had often proved false friends, so the Philistines had always been sworn enemies, to the Israel of God, and the more dangerous and vexatious for their being such near neighbours to them. They were pretty well humbled in David's time, but it seems they had got head again, and were a considerable people till Nebuchadnezzar cut them off with other their neighbours, which is the event here foretold. The date of this prophecy is observable; it was before Pharaoh smote Gaza. When this blow was given to Gaza by the king of Egypt is not certain; whether in his expedition against Carchemish, or in his return from thence, after he had slain Josiah, or when he afterwards came with design to relieve Jerusalem; but this is mentioned here to shew that this word of the Lord came to Jeremiah against the Philistines, when they were in their full strength and lustre, themselves and their cities in good condition, in no peril from any adversity, or evil occurrent, when no disturbance of their repose was foreseen by any human probabilities; yet then Jeremiah foretold their ruin, which Pharaoh's smiting Gaza soon after would be but an earnest of, and, as it were, the beginning of sorrows to that country. It is here foretold,

First. That a foreign enemy, and a very formidable one, shall be brought upon them; "Waters rise up out of the north," ver. 2. Waters sometimes signify multitudes of people and nations, Rev. xvii. 15; sometimes great and threatening calamities, Ps. lxix. 1; these here signify both. They rise out of the north, whence fair weather used to come, and the wind that drives away rain; but now a terrible storm comes out of that cold climate. The Chaldean army shall overflow the land like a deluge. Probably this happened before the destruction of Jerusalem, for it should seem that in Gedaliah's time, which was just after, the army of the Chaldeans was quite withdrawn out of those parts. The country of the Philistines was but of small extent, so that it would soon be overwhelmed by so vast an army.

Secondly. That they shall all be in a mighty fright and consternation upon it. The men shall have no heart to fight, but shall sit down and cry like children; "All the inhabitants of the land shall howl," so that nothing but lamentation shall be heard in all places. The occasion of the fright is elegantly described, ver. 3; before it comes to killing and slaying, the very stamping of the horses, and rattling of the chariots, when the enemy makes his approach, shall strike a terror upon the people, to that degree that parents in their fright shall seem void of natural affection, for they "shall not look back to their children," to provide for their safety, or so much as to see what becomes of them. Their hands shall be so feeble, that they shall despair of carrying them off with them, and therefore they shall not care for seeing them, but leave them to take their lot; or they shall be in such a consternation that they shall quite forget even those pieces of themselves. Let none be over fond of their children, nor doat upon them, since such distress may come as that they may either wish they had none or forget that they have, and have no heart to look upon them.

Thirdly. That the country of the Philistines shall be spoiled and laid waste, and the other countries adjoining to them, and in alliance with them. It is a day to spoil the Philistines, for the Lord will spoil them, ver. 4. Note, Those whom God will spoil must needs be spoiled, for if God be against them who can be for them? Tyre and Sidon were strong and wealthy cities, and they used to help the Philistines in a strait, but now they shall themselves be involved in the common ruin, and God will cut off from them every helper that remains. Note, Those that trust to help from creatures will find it cut off when they most need it, and will thereby be put into the utmost confusion. Who the "remnant of the country of Caphtor" were is uncertain, but we find that the Caphtorim were near akin to the Philistines, Gen. x. 14, and probably, when their own country was destroyed, such of them as remained came and settled with their kinsmen the Philistines, and were now spoiled with them. Some particular places are here named, Gaza and Askelon, ver. 5. Baldness is come upon them, the invaders have stripped them of all their ornaments, or, they have made themselves bald in token of extreme grief; and they are cut off, with the other cities that were in the plain or valley about them. The products of their fruitful valleys shall be spoiled, and made a prey of by the conquerors.

Fourthly. That these calamities shall continue long. The prophet in the foresight of this, with his usual tenderness, asks them first, ver. 5, How long will you cut yourselves? as men in extreme sorrow and anguish do. O how tedious will the calamity be! not only cutting, but long cutting. But he turns from the effect to the cause; they cut themselves, for the sword of the Lord cuts them. And therefore, 1. He bespeaks that to be still; ver. 6, "O thou sword of the Lord, how long wilt it be ere thou be quiet?" He begs it would put up itself into the scabbard, would devour no more flesh, drink no more blood. This expresseth the prophet's earnest desire to see an end of the war, looking with compassion as became a man, even upon the Philistines themselves, when their country was made desolate by the sword. Note, War is the sword of the Lord, with it he punisheth the crimes of his enemies, and pleads the cause of his own people. When war is once begun, it often lasts long; the sword once drawn doth not quickly find the way into the scabbard again; nay, some when they draw the sword throw away the scabbard, for they delight in war. So deplorable are the desolations of war, that the blessing of peace cannot but be very desirable. O that swords might be beaten into ploughshares! 2. Yet he gives a satisfactory account of the continuance of the war, and stops the mouth of his own complaint; ver. 7, "How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge" against such and such places, particularly specified in its commission? "there hath he appointed it." Note, 1st. That the sword of war hath its charge from the Lord of hosts. Every bullet hath so; you call them blind bullets, but they are directed by an all-seeing God. The war itself is so: he saith to it, Go, and it goes; Come, and it comes; Do this, and it doth it; for he is commander-in-chief. 2nd. When the sword is drawn, we cannot expect it should be sheathed till it has fulfilled its charge. As the word of God, so his rod and his sword, shall accomplish that for which he sends them.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Moab is next set to the bar before Jeremiah the prophet, whom God had constituted judge over the nations and kingdoms, from his mouth to receive its doom. Isaiah's predictions concerning Moab had had their accomplishment; we had the predictions, Isa. xv. and xvi., and the like, Am. ii. 1; and they were fulfilled when the Assyrians under Salmanasser invaded and distressed Moab. But this is a prophecy of the desolations of Moab by the Chaldeans, which were accomplished under Nebuzar-adan, about five years after he had destroyed Jerusalem. Here is, I. The destruction foretold, that it should be great and general, should extend itself to all parts of the country, ver. 1—6, 8; and again, ver. 21—25, 34; that spoilers should come upon them, and force some to flee, ver. 9; should carry many into captivity, ver. 12, 46; that the enemy should come shortly, ver. 16; come swiftly and surprise them, ver. 40, 41; that he should make thorough work, ver. 10; and lay the country quite waste, though it was very strong, ver. 14, 15; that there should be no escaping, ver. 42, 45; that that should force them to quit their idols, ver. 13, 35; and put an end to all their joy, ver. 33, 34; their neighbours shall lament them, ver. 17—19; and the prophet himself doth, ver. 31, 36, &c. II. The causes of this destruction assigned; it was sin that brought this ruin upon them, their pride and security, and carnal confidence, ver. 7, 11, 14, 29; and contempt of, and enmity to, God and his people, ver. 26, 27, 30. III. A promise of the restoration of Moab, ver. 47.

AGAINST Moab thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Woe unto Nebo! for it is spoiled:
Kiriathaim is confounded and taken:
Misgab is confounded and dismayed.
2 There shall be no more praise of Moab:
In Heshbon they have devised evil against it;
Come, and let us cut it off from being a nation.
Also thou shalt be cut down, O Madmen;
The sword shall pursue thee.
3 A voice of crying shall be from Horonaim,
Spoiling and great destruction.
4 Moab is destroyed;
Her little ones have caused a cry to be heard.
5 For in the going up of Luhith
Continual weeping shall go up;
For in the going down of Horonaim
The enemies have heard a cry of destruction.
6 Flee, save your lives,
And be like the heath in the wilderness.
7 For because thou hast trusted in thy works and in thy treasures,
Thou shalt also be taken:
And Chemosh shall go forth into captivity
With his priests and his princes together.
8 And the spoiler shall come upon every city,
And no city shall escape:
The valley also shall perish,
And the plain shall be destroyed,
As the LORD hath spoken.
9 Give wings unto Moab,
That it may flee and get away:
For the cities thereof shall be desolate,
Without any to dwell therein.
10 Cursed be he that doeth the work of the LORD deceitfully,
And cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood.
11 Moab hath been at ease from his youth,
And he hath settled on his lees,
And hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel,
Neither hath he gone into captivity:
Therefore his taste remained in him,
And his scent is not changed.
12 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will send unto him wanderers, that shall cause him to wander,
And shall empty his vessels, and break their bottles.
13 And Moab shall be ashamed of Chemosh,
As the house of Israel was ashamed of Beth-el their confidence.

We may observe in these verses,

First. The author of Moab's destruction. It is the Lord of hosts, that has armies, all armies at his command, and the God of Israel, ver. 1, who will herein plead the cause of his Israel against a people that has always been vexatious to them, and will punish them now for the injuries done to Israel of old, though Israel was forbidden to meddle with them, Deu. ii. 9; therefore the destruction of Moab is called the work of the Lord, ver. 10, for it is he that pleads for Israel, and his work will exactly agree with his word, ver. 8.

Secondly. The instruments of it. Spoilers shall come, ver. 8, shall come with a sword, a sword that shall pursue them, ver. 2; "I will send unto him wanderers," (ver. 12,) such as come from afar, as if they were vagrants, or had missed their way, but they shall "cause him to wander." They seem as wanderers themselves, but they shall make the Moabites to be really wanderers, some to flee, and others to be carried into captivity. These destroyers stir up themselves to do execution; they have devised evil against Heshbon, one of the principal cities of Moab, and they aim at no less than the ruin of the kingdom; "Come, and let us cut it off from being a nation," ver. 2. Nothing less will serve the turn of the invaders; they come not to plunder it, but to ruin it. The prophet in God's name engageth them to make thorough work of it; ver. 10, "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully." This bloody work, this destroying work, though it goes against the grain with men of compassion, yet it is the work of the Lord, and must not be done by the halves. The Chaldeans have it in charge, by a secret instinct, (saith Mr. Gataker,) to destroy the Moabites, and therefore they must not spare, must not out of foolish pity keep back their sword from blood. They would thereby bring a sword, and a curse with it, upon themselves, as Saul did by sparing the Amalekites, and Ahab by letting Benhadad go. Thy life shall go for his life. To this work is applied that general rule, given to all that are employed in any service for God; "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully," or negligently, that pretends to do it, but doth it not to purpose; makes a show of serving God's glory, but is really serving his own ends, and carries on the work of the Lord no farther than will suit his own purposes; or that is slothful in business for God, and takes neither care nor pains to do it as it should be done, Mal. i. 14. Let not such deceive themselves, for God will not thus be mocked.

Thirdly. The woful instances and effects of this destruction. The cities shall be laid in ruins, they shall be spoiled, ver. 1, and cut down, ver. 2; they shall be desolate, ver. 9, "without any to dwell therein." There shall be no houses to dwell in, or no people to dwell in them, or no safety and ease to those that would dwell in them. Every city shall be spoiled, and no city escape. The strongest city shall not be able to secure itself against the enemies' power, nor shall the finest city be able to recommend itself to the enemies' pity and favour. The country also shall be wasted, the valley shall perish, and the plain be destroyed, ver. 8. The corn and the flocks that used to cover the plains, and make the valleys rejoice, shall all be destroyed, eaten up, trodden down, or carried off. The most sacred persons shall not escape; the priests and people shall go together into captivity. Nay, Chemosh, the god they worship, who they expect should protect them, shall share with them in the ruin, his temple shall be laid in ashes, and his image carried away with the rest of the spoil. Now the consequence of all this will be, 1. Great shame and confusion. Kiriathaim is confounded, and Misgab is so. They shall be ashamed of the mighty boasts they have sometimes made of their cities. There shall be no more vaunting in Moab concerning Heshbon, so it might be read, ver. 2; they shall no more brag of the strength of that city, when the evil which is designed against it is brought upon it. Nor shall they any more boast of their gods, ver. 13, they shall be ashamed of Chemosh, ashamed of all the prayers they made, and all the confidence they put in the dunghill deity; as Israel was ashamed of Bethel, of the golden calf they had at Bethel, which they confided in as their protector, but were deceived in, for it was not able to save them from the Assyrians: nor shall Chemosh be able to save the Moabites from the Chaldeans. Note, Those that will not be convinced and made ashamed of the folly of their idolatry by the word of God, shall be convinced and made ashamed of it by the judgments of God, when they shall find by woful experience the utter inability of the gods they have served to do them any service. 2. There will be great sorrow. There is a "voice of crying" heard, ver. 3, and the cry of nothing but "spoiling and great destruction." Alas! alas! "Moab is destroyed," ver. 4. The great ones having quitted the cities to shift for their own safety, even the "little ones have caused a cry to be heard," the meaner sort of people, or the little children, the innocent, harmless ones, whose cries at such a time are the most piteous. Go up to the hills, go down to the valleys, and you meet with continual weeping, weeping with weeping, all are in tears, you light on none with dry eyes. Even the enemies have heard the cry, from whom it had been policy to conceal it, for they will be animated and encouraged by it; but it is so great it cannot be hid. 3. There will be great hurry. They will cry to one another, Away, away, "flee, save your lives," ver. 6, shift for your own safety, with all imaginable speed, though you escape as bare and naked as the heath, or grig, or dry shrub in the wilderness; think not of carrying away any thing you have, for it may cost you your life to attempt it, Mat. xxiv. 16—18. Take shelter, though it be in a barren wilderness, that you may have your lives for a prey. The danger will come suddenly and swiftly, and therefore "give wings unto Moab," ver. 9, that would be the greatest kindness you could do them; that is that they will call for; O that we had wings like a dove! For unless they had wings, and could fly, there will be no escaping.

Fourthly. The sins for which God will now reckon with Moab, and which justify God in these severe proceedings against them. 1. It is because they have been secure, and have trusted to their wealth and strength, in their works, and in their treasures, ver. 7. They had taken a great deal of pains to fortify their cities, and make large works about them, and to fill their exchequer, and private coffers; so that they thought themselves in as good a posture for war as any people could be, and that none durst invade them, and therefore set danger at defiance; they trusted in the abundance of their riches, and strengthened themselves in their wickedness, Ps. lii. 7. Now for this reason, that they may have a sensible conviction of the vanity and folly of their carnal confidences, God will send an enemy that shall master their works, and rifle their treasures. Note, We forfeit the comfort of that creature which we repose that confidence in that should be reposed in God only. The reed will break that is leaned upon. 2. It is because they have not made a right improvement of the days of their peace and prosperity, ver. 11. 1st. They had been long undisturbed; "Moab hath been at ease from his youth." It was an ancient kingdom before Israel was, and had enjoyed great tranquillity, though a small country, and surrounded with potent neighbours. God's Israel was afflicted from their youth, Ps. cxxix. 1, 2; but Moab at ease from his youth. He "hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel," has not known any troublesome, weakening changes, but is as wine kept on the lees, and not racked or drawn off, by which it retains its strength and body. He has not been unsettled, nor any way made uneasy; he has not gone into captivity, as Israel hath often done, and yet Moab is a wicked, idolatrous nation, and one of the confederates against God's hidden ones, Ps. lxxxiii. 6. Note, There are many that persist in unrepented of iniquity, and yet enjoy uninterrupted prosperity. 2nd. They had been as long corrupt and unreformed. "He hath settled on his lees," he hath been secure and sensual in his prosperity, hath rested in it, and fetched all the strength and life of the soul from it, as the wine from the lees; "his taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed." He is still the same, as bad as ever he was. Note, While bad people are as happy as they used to be in the world, it is no marvel if they are as bad as they used to be. They have no changes of their peace and prosperity, therefore fear not God; their hearts and lives are unchanged, Ps. lv. 19.

14 How say ye, We are mighty
And strong men for the war?
15 Moab is spoiled, and gone up out of her cities,
And his chosen young men are gone down to the slaughter,
Saith the King, whose name is the LORD of hosts.
16 The calamity of Moab is near to come,
And his affliction hasteth fast.
17 All ye that are about him, bemoan him;
And all ye that know his name, say,
How is the strong staff broken,
And the beautiful rod!
18 Thou daughter that dost inhabit Dibon,
Come down from thy glory, and sit in thirst;
For the spoiler of Moab shall come upon thee,
And he shall destroy thy strong holds.
19 O inhabitant of Aroer,
Stand by the way, and espy;
Ask him that fleeth, and her that escapeth,
And say, What is done?
20 Moab is confounded; for it is broken down:
Howl and cry;
Tell ye it in Arnon, that Moab is spoiled,
21 And judgment is come upon the plain country;
Upon Holon, and upon Jahazah, and upon Mephaath,
22 And upon Dibon, and upon Nebo, and upon Beth-diblathaim,
[Beth-meon,
23 And upon Kiriathaim, and upon Beth-gamul, and upon
24 And upon Kerioth, and upon Bozrah,
And upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far or near.
25 The horn of Moab is cut off,
And his arm is broken, saith the LORD.
26 Make ye him drunken:
For he magnified himself against the LORD:
Moab also shall wallow in his vomit,
And he also shall be in derision.
27 For was not Israel a derision unto thee?
Was he found among thieves?
For since thou spakest of him, thou skippedst for joy.
28 O ye that dwell in Moab,
Leave the cities, and dwell in the rock,
And be like the dove
That maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth.
29 We have heard the pride of Moab, (he is exceeding proud)
His loftiness, and his arrogancy,
And his pride, and the haughtiness of his heart.
30 I know his wrath, saith the LORD;
But it shall not be so;
His lies shall not so effect it.
31 Therefore will I howl for Moab,
And I will cry out for all Moab;
Mine heart shall mourn for the men of Kir-heres.
32 O vine of Sibmah,
I will weep for thee with the weeping of Jazer:
Thy plants are gone over the sea,
They reach even to the sea of Jazer:
[thy vintage.
The spoiler is fallen upon thy summer fruits and upon 33 And joy and gladness is taken
From the plentiful field, and from the land of Moab;
And I have caused wine to fail from the winepresses:
None shall tread with shouting;
Their shouting shall be no shouting.
34 From the cry of Heshbon even unto Elealeh,
And even unto Jahaz, have they uttered their voice,
From Zoar even unto Horonaim,
As an heifer of three years old:
For the waters also of Nimrim shall be desolate.
35 Moreover I will cause to cease in Moab, saith the LORD,
Him that offereth in the high places,
And him that burneth incense to his gods.
36 Therefore mine heart shall sound for Moab like pipes,
And mine heart shall sound like pipes for the men of Kir-heres:
Because the riches that he hath gotten are perished.
37 For every head shall be bald,
And every beard clipped:
Upon all the hands shall be cuttings,
And upon the loins sackcloth.
[tops of Moab,
38 There shall be lamentation generally upon all the house-
And in the streets thereof:

For I have broken Moab
Like a vessel wherein is no pleasure, saith the LORD.
39 They shall howl, saying, How is it broken down!
How hath Moab turned the back with shame!
So shall Moab be a derision
And a dismaying to all them about him.
40 For thus saith the LORD;
Behold, he shall fly as an eagle,
And shall spread his wings over Moab.
41 Kerioth is taken, and the strong holds are surprised,
And the mighty men's hearts in Moab at that day shall be
As the heart of a woman in her pangs.
42 And Moab shall be destroyed from being a people,
Because he hath magnified himself against the LORD.
43 Fear, and the pit, and the snare, shall be upon thee,
O inhabitant of Moab, saith the LORD.
44 He that fleeth from the fear shall fall into the pit;
And he that getteth up out of the pit shall be taken in
For I will bring upon it, even upon Moab, [the snare:
The year of their visitation, saith the LORD.
45 They that fled
Stood under the shadow of Heshbon because of the force:
But a fire shall come forth out of Heshbon,
And a flame from the midst of Sihon,
And shall devour the corner of Moab,
And the crown of the head of the tumultuous ones.
46 Woe be unto thee, O Moab!
The people of Chemosh perisheth:
For thy sons are taken captives,
And thy daughters captives.
47 Yet will I bring again the captivity of Moab
In the latter days, saith the LORD.
Thus far is the judgment of Moab.

The destruction is here farther prophesied of very largely, and with a great copiousness and variety of expression; and very pathetically and in moving language, designed not only to awaken them by a national repentance and reformation to prevent the trouble, or by a personal repentance and reformation to prepare for it, but to affect us with the calamitous state of human life, which is liable to such lamentable occurrences; and with the power of God's anger, and the terror of his judgments, when he comes forth to contend with a provoking people. In reading this long roll of threatenings, and meditating the terror of them, it will be of more use to us to keep this in our eye, and to get our hearts thereby possessed with a holy awe of God, and of his wrath, than to inquire critically into all the lively figures and metaphors here used.

First. It is a surprising destruction, and very sudden that is here threatened. They were very secure, thought themselves strong for war, and able to deal with the most powerful enemy, ver. 14; and yet the calamity is near, and he is not able to keep it off, nor so much as to keep the enemy long in parley, for the affliction hastens fast, ver. 16, and will soon come to a crisis. The enemy shall fly as an eagle, so swiftly, so strongly shall he come, ver. 40, as an eagle flies upon his prey; and he shall spread his wings, the wings of his army, over Moab; he shall surround it that none may escape. The strongholds of Moab are taken by surprise, ver. 41, so that all their strength stood them in no stead; and this made the hearts even of their mighty men to fail, for they had not time to recollect the considerations that might have animated them. It requires a more than ordinary degree of courage not to be afraid of sudden fear.

Secondly. It is an utter destruction, and such as lays Moab all in ruins. "Moab is spoiled," ver. 15; quite spoiled, is confounded and broken down, ver. 20. Their cities are laid in ashes, or seized by the enemy, so that they are forced to quit them, ver. 15. Divers cities are here named, upon which judgment is come, and the list concludes with an et cætera,—'and such like;' what need he mention more particulars, when it comes upon all the cities of Moab in general, far and near? ver. 21—24. Note, When iniquity is universal, we have reason to expect that calamity should be so too. The kingdom is deprived of its dignity and authority, "the horn of Moab is cut off;" of its strength and power, both offensive and defensive: "his arm is broken," that he can neither give a blow, nor save a blow, ver. 25. Is the youth of the kingdom the strength and beauty of it? "His chosen young men are gone down to the slaughter," ver. 15; They went down to the battle, promising themselves that they should return victorious, but God told them they went down to the slaughter; so sure are they to fall against whom God fights. In a word, "Moab shall be destroyed from being a people," ver. 42. Those that are enemies to God's people will soon be made no people.

Thirdly. It is a lamentable destruction; it will be just matter of mourning, and will turn joy into heaviness.

1. The prophet that foretells it doth himself lament it; and mourns at the very foresight of it, from a principle of compassion to his fellow-creatures, and concern for the human nature. The prophet will himself "howl for Moab," his very heart shall mourn for them, ver. 31; he will weep for the vine of Sibmah, ver. 32; his heart shall "sound like pipes" for Moab, ver. 36. Though the destruction of Moab would prove him a true prophet, yet he could not think of it without trouble. The ruin of sinners is no pleasure to God; and, therefore, should be a pain to us; even those that give warning of it should lay it to heart. These passages, and many others in this chapter, are much the same with what Isaiah had used in his prophecies against Moab, Isa. xv. and xvi.; for though there was a long distance of time between that prophecy and this, yet they were both dictated by one and the same Spirit; and it becomes God's prophets to speak the language of those that went before them. It is no plagiarism sometimes to make use of old expressions, provided it be with new affections and applications.

2. The Moabites themselves shall lament; it will be the greatest mortification and grief imaginable to them. Those that sat in glory, in the midst of wealth, and mirth, and all manner of pleasure, shall sit in thirst, in a dry and thirsty land, where no water, no comfort is, ver. 18. It is time to sit in thirst, and inure themselves to hardship, when the spoiler is come, that will strip them of all, and empty them. The Moabites in the remote corners of the country, that are farthest from the danger, will be inquisitive how the matter goes, what news from the army, will ask every one that escapeth, "What is done?" ver. 19. And when they are told that all is gone, that the invader is the conqueror, they will howl and cry in bitterness and anguish of spirit, ver. 20. They will abandon themselves to solitude to lament the desolations of their country, they will leave the cities that used to be full of mirth, and dwell in the rock, where they may have their fill of melancholy. They shall no more be singing birds, but mourning birds, like the dove, ver. 28; the doves of the valleys, Eze. vii. 16. Those that give up themselves to mirth, let them know that God can soon change their note. Their sorrow shall be so very extreme, that they shall make themselves bald, and cut themselves, ver. 37; which were expressions of a desperate grief, such as tempted men to be even their own destroyers. Job indeed rent his mantle, and shaved his head, but he did not cut himself. When the flood of passion riseth never so high, wisdom and grace must set bounds to it, set banks to it, to restrain it from such barbarities. The sorrow shall be universal; ver. 38, "there shall be a general lamentation upon all the housetops of Moab," where they worshipped their idols, to whom they shall in vain bemoan themselves; and in all the streets where they conversed with one another, for they shall be free in communicating their griefs and fears, and in propagating them, for they see all lost: "I have broken Moab like a vessel wherein is no pleasure," which shall not be regarded, and cannot be pieced again. That which Moab used to rejoice in was their pleasant fruits, and the abundance of their rich wines. The delights of sense were all the matter of their joy. Take away these, destroy their gardens and vineyards, and you make all their mirth to cease, Hos. ii. 11, 12. There is great weeping when their plants are transplanted, are "gone over the sea," ver. 32; are carried into other countries to be planted there: "The spoiler is fallen upon thy summer fruits, and upon thy vintage;" and that is it that makes the cry of Heshbon to reach even to Elealeh, ver. 34. Take joy and gladness from the plentiful field, and you take it from the land of Moab, ver. 33. If the wine fail from the winepresses, that used to be trodden with acclamations of joy, all their gladness is cut off. Take away that shouting, and there shall be no shouting. Note, Those who make the delights of sense their chief joy, their exceeding joy, since those are things they may easily be deprived of in a little time, subject themselves to the tyranny of the greatest grief; whereas they that rejoice in God may do that even when the fig-tree doth not blossom, and there is no fruit in the vine. These Moabites lost not only their wine, but their water too, even "the waters of Nimrim shall be desolate," ver. 34; and, therefore, their grief grew extravagantly loud and noisy, and their lamentations were heard in all places like the lowing of a heifer of three years old. The expressions here are borrowed from Isa. xv. 5, 6.

3. All their neighbours are called to mourn with them, and to condole their ruin; ver. 17, "All ye that are about him, bemoan him." Let him have that allay to his grief, let him see himself pitied by the adjoining countries. Nay, let those at a distance, that do but know his name, and have heard of his fame, take notice of his fall, and say, "How is the strong staff broken," whose strength was the terror of its enemies; "and the beautiful rod," whose beauty was the pride of its friends. Let the nations take notice of this, and receive instruction. Let none be puffed up with, or put confidence in, their strength or beauty, for neither will be a security against the judgments of God.

Fourthly. It is a shameful destruction, and such as shall expose them to contempt. Moab is made drunk, ver. 26; and he that is made drunk is made vile. He shall wallow in his vomit, and become an odious spectacle, and shall justly be in derision. Let the Moabites be intoxicated with the cup of God's wrath, until they stagger and fall, and be brought to their wits' end, and make themselves ridiculous by the wildness not only of their passions, but of their counsels. And again, ver. 39, Moab shall be a derision, and a dismaying to all about him; they shall laugh at the fall of the pomp and power he was so proud of. Note, They that are haughty are preparing reproach and ignominy for themselves.

Fifthly. It is the destruction of that which is dear to them, not only of their summer fruits and their vintage, but of their wealth; ver. 36, "The riches that he hath gotten are perished;" though he thought he had laid them up very safe, and promised himself a long enjoyment of them, yet they are gone. Note, The money that is hoarded in the chest is as liable to perish as the summer fruits that lie exposed in the open fields. Riches are shedding things, and, like dust as they are, slip through our fingers then when we are in most care to hold them fast, and gripe them hard. Yet this is not the worst neither: even those whose religion was false and foolish, were fond of it above any thing, and such as it was, would not part with it; and, therefore, though it was really a promise, yet to them it was a threatening, (ver. 35,) that God will "cause to cease him that offereth in the high places," for the high places shall be destroyed, and the fields of offerings shall be laid waste; and the priests themselves, that burnt incense to their gods, shall be slain or carried into captivity, ver. 7. Note, It is only the true religion, and the worship and service of the true God, that will stand us in stead in a day of trouble.

Sixthly. It is a just and righteous destruction, and that which they have deserved and brought upon themselves by sin.

1. The sin which they had been most notoriously guilty of, and for which God now reckoned with them, was pride. It is mentioned six times, ver. 29. We have all heard of the pride of Moab; his neighbours took notice of it, it has testified to his face, as Israel's did; he is exceedingly proud, and grows worse and worse. Observe his loftiness, his arrogancy, his pride, his haughtiness; the multiplying of words to the same purpose intimates in how many instances he discovered his pride, and how offensive it was both to God and man. It was charged upon them, Isa. xvi. 6; but here it is expressed more largely than there. Since then they had been under humbling providences, and yet were unhumbled; nay, they grew more arrogant and haughty, which plainly marked them for that utter destruction which pride is the forerunner of. Two instances are here given of the pride of Moab: 1st. He had carried it insolently towards God. He must be brought down with shame, ver. 26; for he hath "magnified himself against the Lord;" and again, ver. 42, he shall be "destroyed from being a people," for this very reason. The Moabites preferred Chemosh before Jehovah, and thought themselves a match for the God of Israel, whom they set at defiance. 2nd. He had carried it scornfully towards Israel, particularly in their late troubles; therefore Moab shall fall into the same troubles, into the same hands, and be a derision, for Israel was a derision to him, ver. 26, 27. The generality of the Moabites, when they heard of the calamities and desolations of their neighbours the Jews, instead of lamenting them, rejoiced in them, as if they had been thieves taken in the act of robbing. As often as they spoke of them they skipped for joy. Many in such a case entertain in their minds a secret pleasure at the fall of those they had a dislike to, who yet have so much discretion as to conceal it, it is so invidious a thing; but the Moabites industriously proclaimed their joy, and avowed the enmity they had to Israel, triumphing over every Israelite they met with in distress, and laughing at him; which was as inhuman as it was impious, and an impudent affront both to men, whose nature they were of, and to God whose name they were called by. Note, Those that deride others in distress, will justly and certainly, sooner or later, come into distress themselves, and be had in derision. Those that are glad at calamities, especially the calamities of God's church, shall not long go unpunished.

2. Besides this, they had been guilty of malice against God's people, and treachery in their dealings with them, ver. 30. They made a jest of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, and pretended when they laughed at them, it was but in sport, and to make themselves merry; but, saith God, "I know his wrath," I know it comes from the old enmity he hath to the seed of Abraham, and the worshippers of the true God. I know he thinks these calamities of the Jewish nation will end in their utter extirpation. He now tells the Chaldeans what ill people the Jews are, and irritates them against them; but it shall not be so as he expects, "his lies shall not so effect it." The nation, whose fall they triumph in, shall recover itself. Some read it, 'I know his rage, is it not so?' (is he not very furious against the people of God?) 'and his lies I know also, do they not do so? Do they not belie them?' Note, All the fury and all the falsehood of the church's enemies is perfectly known to God, whatever the pretences are with which they think to cover it, Isa. xxxvii. 28.

Seventhly. It is a complicated destruction, and by one instance after another will at length be completed; for those that make their escape from one judgment shall perish by another; "Fear, and the pit, and the snare shall be upon them," ver. 43. There shall be fear to drive them into the pit, and a snare to hold them fast in it when they are in it; so that they shall neither escape from the destruction nor escape out of it. What was said of sinners in general, Isa. xxiv. 17, 18, that they who flee from the fear shall fall into the pit, and they who come up out of the pit shall be taken in the snare, is here particularly foretold concerning the sinners of Moab, ver. 44; for it is the year of their visitation, when God comes to reckon with them, and will be known by the judgments which he executeth, for he is "the King whose name is the Lord of hosts," ver. 15; he is not only the King that has authority to give judgment, but he is the Lord of hosts, that is able to do what he has determined. The figurative expressions used, ver. 44, are explained in one instance, ver. 45. Those that fled out of the villages for fear of the enemy's forces, put themselves "under the shadow of Heshbon," stood there, and supposed they stood safe, as now armies sometimes retire under the cannon of a fortified city, and it is their protection; but here they should be disappointed, for when they flee out of the pit they fall into the snare. Heshbon, which they thought would have sheltered them, devours them, as Moses had foretold long since, Num. xxi. 28. "A fire is gone out of Heshbon, and a flame from the city of Sihon," and devours those that come from all the corners of Moab, and fastens upon the crown of the head of the tumultuous, noisy ones; or of the revellers, or children of noise; not meant of the rude, clamorous multitude, but of the great men that bluster, and hector, and make a noise. The judgments of God shall light on them. Shall we hear the conclusion of this whole matter? We have it, ver. 46, "Woe be unto thee, O Moab," thou art undone; the people that worship Chemosh perisheth, and is gone; farewell Moab. The sons and daughters, the hopes of the next generation, are gone into captivity after the Jews, whose calamities they rejoiced in.

Eighthly. Yet it is not a perpetual destruction. The chapter concludes with a short promise of their return out of captivity in the latter days. God, that brings them into captivity, will bring again their captivity, ver. 47. Thus tenderly does God deal with Moabites, much more with his own people; even with Moabites he will not contend for ever, nor be always wroth. When Israel returned, Moab did; and perhaps the prophecy was intended chiefly for the encouragement of God's people, to hope for that salvation which even Moabites shall share in. Yet it looks farther to gospel times, (the Jews themselves refer it to the days of the Messias,) then the captivity of the Gentiles, under the yoke of sin and Satan, shall be brought back by Divine grace, which shall make them free, free indeed. This prophecy concerning Moab is long, but here it ends; it ends comfortably, "Thus far is the judgment of Moab."

CHAPTER XLIX.

The cup of trembling still goes round, and the nations must all drink of it according to the instruction given to Jeremiah, ch. xxv. 15. This chapter puts it into the hands, I. Of the Ammonites, ver. 1—6. II. Of the Edomites, ver. 7—22. III. Of the Syrians, ver. 23—27. IV. Of the Kedarenes, and the kingdoms of Hazor, ver. 28—33. V. Of the Elamites, ver. 34—39. When Israel was scarcely saved, where shall all these appear?

CONCERNING the Ammonites, thus saith the LORD;
Hath Israel no sons?
Hath he no heir?
When then doth their king inherit Gad,
And his people dwell in his cities?
2 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will cause an alarm of war to be heard
In Rabbah of the Ammonites;
And it shall be a desolate heap,
And her daughters shall be burned with fire:
Then shall Israel be heir unto them that were his heirs,
saith the LORD.
3 Howl, O Heshbon, for Ai is spoiled:
Cry, ye daughters of Rabbah,
Gird you with sackcloth;
Lament, and run to and fro by the hedges;
For their king shall go into captivity,
And his priests and his princes together.
4 Wherefore gloriest thou in the valleys,
Thy flowing valley, O backsliding daughter?
That trusted in her treasures, saying,
Who shall come unto me?
5 Behold, I will bring a fear upon thee,
Saith the Lord GOD of hosts,
From all those that be about thee;
And ye shall be driven out every man right forth;
And none shall gather up him that wandereth.
6 And afterward I will bring again the captivity
Of the children of Ammon, saith the LORD.

The Ammonites were next both in kindred and in neighbourhood to the Moabites, and therefore are next set to the bar. Their country joined to that of the two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan, and was but an ill neighbour; however, being a neighbour, they shall have a share in these circular predictions.

First. An action is here brought in God's name against the Ammonites for an illegal encroachment upon the rightful possessions of the tribe of Gad, that lay next them, ver. 1. A writ of inquiry is brought to discover what title they had to those territories which, upon the carrying away of the Gileadites by the king of Assyria, (2 Kin. xv. 29; 1 Chr. v. 26,) were left almost dispeopled, at least unguarded, and an easy prey to the next invader. What! doth it escheat ob defectum sanguinis?—'for want of an heir?' "Hath Israel no sons? hath he no heir?" Are there no Gadites left to whom the right of inheritance belongs? Or if there were not, are there no Israelites, none left of Judah that is nearer akin to them than you are? Why then doth their king, as if he were entitled to the forfeited estates, or Milcom their idol, as if he had the disposal of it to his worshippers, "inherit Gad, and his people dwell in the cities" which fell by lot to that tribe of God's people? Nay, there were sons and heirs of their own body, en ventre de sa mere,—'in their mothers' wombs,' and the Ammonites, to prevent their claim, most barbarously murdered them; Am. i. 13, "They ripped up the women with child, of Gilead, that they might enlarge their border;" that having seized it, none might rise up hereafter to recover it from them. Thus they "magnified themselves against their border," and boasted it was their own, Zeph. ii. 8. Note, Though among men might often prevails against right, yet that might shall be controlled by the Almighty, who sits in the throne judging right; and those will find themselves mistaken who think every thing their own that they can lay their hands on, or which none yet appears to lay claim to. As there is justice owing to owners, so also to their heirs, when they are dead, whom it is a great sin to defraud, though they either know not their right or know not how to come at it. This shall be reckoned for particularly when injuries of this kind are done to God's people.

Secondly. Judgment is here given against them for this violence.

1. Terrors shall come upon them. God will "cause an alarm of war to be heard," even in Rabbah, their capital city, and a very strong one, ver. 2. The Lord God of hosts, that has all armies at his command, will bring a fear upon them from all that be about them, ver. 5. Note, God has many ways to terrify those that have been a terror to his people.

2. Their cities shall be laid in ruins. Rabbah, the mother city, shall be a desolate heap; and her daughters, the other cities that have a dependence upon her, and receive law from her as daughters, shall be burnt with fire; so that the inhabitants shall be forced to quit them, and they shall cry, and gird themselves with sackcloth, as having lost all they have, and not knowing whither to betake themselves.

3. Their country, which they were so proud of, shall be wasted; ver. 4, "Wherefore gloriest thou in the valleys," and trustest in thy treasures, "O backsliding daughter?" They are charged with backsliding, or turning away from God and from his worship, for they were the posterity of righteous Lot. It is true they had never been so in covenant with God as Israel was; yet all idolaters may be called backsliders, for the worship of the true God was prior to that of false gods. They were untoward and refractory, so some read it; and when they had forsaken their God they gloried in their valleys, particularly one that was called the flowing valley, because it flowed with all good things. These they had violently taken away from Israel, and gloried in it when they had done so. They gloried in the strength of their valleys, so surrounded with mountains, that they were inaccessible; gloried in the products of them, gloried in the treasures they got together out of them, saying, "Who shall come unto me?" While they bathed themselves in the pleasures of their country, they flattered themselves with a conceit that they should never be disturbed in the enjoyment of them. To-morrow shall be as this day; therefore they set God and his judgments at defiance. They are proud, voluptuous, and secure; but wherefore dost thou do so? Note, Those who backslide, and turn away from God, have little reason either to take a complacency or to put a confidence in any worldly enjoyments whatsoever, Hos. ix. 1.

4. Their people, from the least to the greatest, shall be forced out of the country. Some shall flee to seek for shelter, others shall be carried into captivity, so that their land shall be quite evacuated. Their king and his princes, nay, and Milcom their god, and his priests, shall go into captivity, ver. 3, and every man shall be driven out right forth, shall take the next way, and make the best of it in his flight, ver. 5, forgetting the valleys, the flowing valleys, which now fail them. And, to complete their misery, none shall gather up him that wandereth, none shall open their doors to them, as Jael to Sisera, to entertain them; and those that flee shall be so much in care to secure themselves, that they shall not take notice of others, no, not of those that are nearest to them, that wander, and are at a loss which way to go, as ch. xlvii. 3.

5. Then the country of the Ammonites shall fall into the hands of the remaining Israelites; ver. 2, "Then shall Israel be heir to them that were his heirs," shall possess himself of their land who had possessed themselves of his, by way of reprisal. Note, The equity of Divine providence is to be acknowledged when the losses of the injured are recompensed out of the unjust gains of the injurious. Though the enemies of God's Israel may make a prey of them for a while, the tables will shortly be turned.

Thirdly. Yet there is a prospect given them of mercy hereafter, ver. 6, as before to Moab. The day will come when the captivity of the children of Ammon will be brought again; for so it is in human affairs, the wheel goes round.

7 Concerning Edom, thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Is wisdom no more in Teman?
Is counsel perished from the prudent?

Is their wisdom vanished?
8 Flee ye, turn back, dwell deep, O inhabitants of Dedan;
For I will bring the calamity of Esau upon him,
The time that I will visit him.
9 If grapegatherers come to thee,
Would they not leave some gleaning grapes?
If thieves by night, they will destroy till they have 10 But I have made Esau bare, [enough.
I have uncovered his secret places,
And he shall not be able to hide himself:
His seed is spoiled, and his brethren, and his neighbours,
And he is not.
11 Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive;
And let thy widows trust in me.
12 For thus saith the LORD; [cup
Behold, they whose judgment was not to drink of the
Have assuredly drunken;
And art thou he that shall altogether go unpunished?
Thou shalt not go unpunished,
But thou shalt surely drink of it.
13 For I have sworn by myself, saith the LORD,
That Bozrah shall become a desolation,

BOZRAH.

A reproach, a waste, and a curse;
And all the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes.
14 I have heard a rumour from the LORD,
And an ambassador is sent unto the heathen, saying,
Gather ye together, and come against her,
And rise up to the battle.
15 For, lo, I will make thee small among the heathen,
And despised among men.
16 Thy terribleness hath deceived thee,
And the pride of thine heart, O thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock,
That holdest the height of the hill: [eagle,
Though thou shouldest make thy nest as high as the
I will bring thee down from thence, saith the LORD.
17 Also Edom shall be a desolation:
Every one that goeth by it shall be astonished,
And shall hiss at all the plagues thereof.
18 As in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah
And the neighbour cities thereof, saith the LORD,
No man shall abide there,
Neither shall a son of man dwell in it.
19 Behold, he shall come up
Like a lion from the swelling of Jordan
Against the habitation of the strong:
But I will suddenly make him run away from her:
And who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her?
For who is like me? and who will appoint me the time?
And who is that shepherd that will stand before me?
20 Therefore hear the counsel of the LORD,
That he hath taken against Edom;
And his purposes, that he hath purposed against the inhabitants of Teman:
Surely the least of the flock shall draw them out:
Surely he shall make their habitations desolate with them.
21 The earth is moved at the noise of their fall,
At the cry the noise thereof was heard in the Red sea.
22 Behold, he shall come up and fly as the eagle,
And spread his wings over Bozrah: [Edom be
And at that day shall the heart of the mighty men of
As the heart of a woman in her pangs.

The Edomites come next to receive their doom from God by the mouth of Jeremiah. They also were old enemies to the Israel of God, but their day will come to be reckoned with, and it is now at hand; and is foretold, not only for warning to them, but for comfort to the Israel of God, whose afflictions were very much aggravated by their triumphs over them, and joy in their calamity, Ps. cxxxvii. 7. Many of the expressions used in this prophecy concerning Edom are borrowed from the prophecy of Obadiah, which is concerning Edom; for, all the prophets being inspired by one and the same Spirit, there must needs be a wonderful harmony and agreement in their predictions. Now here it is foretold,

First. That the country of Edom shall be wasted and made desolate; that the calamity of Esau should be brought upon him, the calamity he has deserved, and God has long designed him, for his old sins, ver. 8. The time is at hand when God will visit him, and call him to an account; and then they shall flee from the sword, turn back from the battle, and dwell deep in some close caverns where they shall hide themselves. All they have shall be carried off by the conqueror. Whereas grape-gatherers will leave some gleanings, and even thieves know when they have enough, and will destroy no farther, they that destroy them shall never be satiated; ver. 9, 10, they shall make Esau quite bare, shall strip the Edomites of all they have, shall find out ways and means to come at their most hidden treasure, shall discover even the secret places where they thought to secure their wealth, and rifle them; so that they shall none of them save their wealth, no, nor save themselves or their children, that might be concealed in a little room; "He shall not be able to hide himself," and his seed, too, is spoiled. His brethren the Moabites, and his neighbours the Philistines, whom he might have expected succours from, or at least shelter with, are spoiled as well as he, and disabled to do him any service. And he is not, or, there is not he, there is none to him, none left him that may say what follows, ver. 11, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive." When they are flying or dying, there shall be none left; no relation, no friend, no, not so much as any parish officers, to take care of their wives and children that they leave behind. Edom is not, he is cut off and gone; nor is there any to say, Leave me thine orphans. If the master of a family be cut off, or forced away, it is some comfort if he have a friend to leave his family with whom he can confide in; but they shall have none such, for they shall all be involved in the same calamity. The Chaldee makes these to be the words of God to his people, distinguishing them from the Edomites in this calamity; and they read it, 'But you, O house of Israel, you shall not leave your orphans; I will secure them, and let your widows rest on my word;' whatever becomes of the widows and fatherless of the Edomites, I will take care of yours. Note, It is unspeakable comfort to the people of God when they are dying, that they may leave their surviving relations with God, may in faith commit them to him, and encourage them to trust in him; and, though they cannot promise themselves great things in the world for them, yet they may hope that he will preserve them alive, always provided that they trust in him. Let the Edomites, for their part, count upon no other but to be made a desolation and a reproach, for the decree is gone forth, God hath sworn it by himself, ver. 13, that their city shall be wasted; nay, they shall be perpetual wastes, they shall be made mean and despicable. They had made a mighty figure, but God will make them "small among the heathen;" and they that despised God's people shall themselves be "despised among men," ver. 15; Obad. 2. Nay, they shall be made monstrous, and even a prodigy, ver. 17; Edom shall be such a desolation, that every one that goes by shall be astonished; nay, worse yet, they shall be made a terror. Edom shall be made like Sodom and Gomorrah, none shall care for coming near the ruins of it; "no man shall abide there," ver. 18, such a frightful place shall it be made.

Secondly. That the instruments of this destruction should be very resolute and formidable. They have their commission from God, he summons them into this service; ver. 14, "I have heard a rumour," or report from the Lord, heard it by the prophecy of Obadiah, heard it by a whisper to myself, that an ambassador, or herald, or messenger, is sent to the Gentiles, that are to lay Edom waste, saying, "Gather ye together," muster all the forces ye can, and come against her; for, ver. 20, this is the counsel that he hath taken against Edom. The matter is settled, the decree is gone forth, and there is no resisting it. God has determined that Edom shall be laid waste, and then he that is to be employed in it shall come swiftly and strongly. Nebuchadnezzar is he of whom it is here foretold, 1. That he shall "come up like a lion," with fierceness and fury; like a lion enraged by the swelling of Jordan overflowing his banks, which force him out of his covert by the water side into the higher grounds, ver. 19. He shall come roaring, come to devour all that come in his way; he shall come "against the habitation of the strong," the forts and castles; and I will cause him to come suddenly into the land, (so the next words might well be read,) so as to find them unprovided with necessaries for a defence: for I will look out a chosen man to appoint over her, to do this execution, a man fit for the purpose, one chosen out of the people; for when God has work to do he will find out the fittest instruments to be employed in it. And in this who is like me for choosing the instruments, and spiriting them for the work? and "who will appoint me the time?" that is, who will challenge me, and fix a time and place to meet? who will join issue with me in battle? And when I send a lion into the flock, "who is that shepherd," that can dare stand before me, or against me, to oppose that lion, and think to rescue any of the flock? Note, When God has work of any kind, he will soon find those that are able to engage in it; and all the world cannot find those that are able to engage against it. Nay, if God will have Edom destroyed, and their people dislodged, there needs not a lion, a fierce lion to do it, even "the least of the flock shall draw them out," ver. 20; the meanest servant in Nebuchadnezzar's retinue, the weakest of all that follow his camp, shall draw them out for the slaughter, shall force them to flee or to surrender, and "make their habitations desolate with them." God can bring to pass the greatest works by instruments least likely. When the Chaldean army comes against the Edomites, all hands shall be employed, and the poorest soldier in it shall have a pluck at them. 2. Nebuchadnezzar shall come, not only like a lion, the king of beasts, but like an eagle, the king of birds; ver. 22, He shall fly as the eagle upon his prey, so swiftly, so strongly; shall clap his wings upon Bozrah, to secure it for himself, as before, ch. xlviii. 40; and immediately the hearts of the mighty men shall fail them, for they shall see he is an enemy that it is in vain to struggle with.

Thirdly. That the Edomites' confidences should all fail them in the day of their distress. 1. They trusted to their wisdom, but that shall stand them in no stead; this is the first thing fastened upon in this prophecy against Edom, ver. 7. That nation used to be famous for wisdom, and their statesmen were thought to excel in politics, and yet now they shall take such wrong measures in all their counsels, and be so baffled in all their designs that people shall ask with wonder, What is the matter with the Edomites? "Is wisdom no more in Teman?" Are the wise men of the east country, 1 Kin. iv. 30, become fools? Are those at their wits' end that were thought to have the monopoly of prudence? Is counsel perished from the understanding of men? It is so, when God is designing the ruin of a people; for whom he will destroy he infatuates: see Job xii. 20, "Is their wisdom vanished?" Is it tired? so some; is it worn out? so others; is it become useless? so others. Yes, it will do them no service, when God comes forth to contend with them. 2. They trusted to their strength, but neither shall that avail them, ver. 16. They had been a terror to all their neighbours, every body feared them and truckled to them, and this made them proud and conceited of themselves and their own strength, and very secure; because no neighbour nation durst meddle with them, they thought no nation in the world durst. Their country was much of it mountainous, having many passes which they thought themselves able to make good against any invader; but this terribleness of theirs deceived them, and so did their imaginary inaccessibleness; they did not prove so strong as they were formidable, nor so safe as they were secure. As high as they are God will bring them down; for as there is no wisdom, so there is no might against the Lord: see these expressions, Obad. 3, 4, 8.

Fourthly. That their destruction should be inevitable, and very remarkable. 1. God hath determined it, ver. 12; he hath said it; nay, ver. 13, he hath sworn it, that the Edomites shall not go unpunished, but they shall drink the cup of trembling, which is put into the hands of all their neighbours. Even they whose judgment or doom was not to drink of the cup, that is, that had not so well deserved it as they had done, nations that had not been such enemies to Israel as they had been,—or, Israel itself, that was God's peculiar people, and among whom there were many, very many, that kept his ordinances, upon which account they might have expected an exemption,—and yet they had been made to drink of the bitter cup; and shall the Edomites think to pass it? No, they shall surely drink of it. Note, When God punisheth the less guilty, it is folly for the more guilty to promise themselves impunity; and when judgment begins at God's house, it will reach the strangers. 2. All the world shall take notice of it; ver. 21, "The earth is moved," and all the nations put into a concern, "at the noise of their fall;" the news of it shall make them tremble. The noise of the outcry is heard to the Red sea, which flowed upon the coasts of Edom; so loud shall be the shouts of the conquerors and the shrieks of the conquered, and such a mighty noise shall the news of this destruction of Idumea make in the nations, that it shall be heard among the ships that lie in the Red sea, to take in lading, 1 Kin. ix. 26, and they shall carry the news of it to the remotest shores. Note, Those that have affected to make a noise with their pomp and power, their fall, when it comes, will make so much the greater noise.

23 Concerning Damascus.
Hamath is confounded, and Arpad:
For they have heard evil tidings:
They are fainthearted:
There is sorrow on the sea;
It cannot be quiet.
24 Damascus is waxed feeble,
And turneth herself to flee,
And fear hath seized on her:
Anguish and sorrows have taken her,

ANCIENT WALL AND GATE OF DAMASCUS.

As a woman in travail.
25 How is the city of praise not left,
The city of my joy!
26 Therefore her young men shall fall in her streets,
And all the men of war shall be cut off in that day,
Saith the LORD of hosts.
27 And I will kindle a fire in the wall of Damascus,
And it shall consume the palaces of Ben-hadad.

The kingdom of Syria lay north of Canaan, as that of Edom lay south, and thither we must now remove, and take a view of the approaching fate of that kingdom, which had been often vexatious to the Israel of God. Damascus was the metropolis of that kingdom, and the ruin of the whole is supposed in the ruin of that; yet Hamath and Arpad, two other considerable cities, are named, ver. 23. And the palaces of Benhadad, which he built, are particularly marked for ruin, ver. 27, as also Am. i. 9. Some think Benhadad, the son of Hadad, either their idol, or one of their ancient kings whence the rest descended, was a common name of the kings of Syria, as Pharaoh of the kings of Egypt. Now observe concerning the judgment of Damascus,

First. It begins with a terrible fright and faintheartedness. They hear evil tidings, that the king of Babylon, with all his force, is coming against them, and they are confounded, they know not what measures to take for their own safety, their souls are melted, they are fainthearted, they have no spirit left them, they are like the troubled sea, that cannot be quiet, Isa. lvii. 20, or like men in a storm at sea, Ps. cvii. 26; or the sorrow that begins in the city shall go to the sea coast, ver. 23. See how easily God can dispirit those nations that have been most celebrated for valour; Damascus now waxeth feeble, ver. 24. A city that thought she could have looked the most formidable enemy in the face, now turns herself to flee, and owns it is to no more purpose to think of contending with her fate than for a woman in labour to contend with her pains, which she cannot escape, but must yield to. It was a "city of praise," ver. 25; not praise to God, but to herself, a city much commended and admired by all strangers that visited it. It was a city of joy, where there was an affluence and confluence of all the delights of the sons of men, and abundance of mirth in the enjoyment of them. We read it, though it needs not, "the city of my joy," which the prophet himself had sometimes visited with pleasure; or, it may be the speech of the king, lamenting the ruin of the city of his joy. But now it is all overwhelmed with fear and grief. Note, Those deceive themselves who place their happiness in carnal joys; for God, in his providence, can soon cast a damp upon them and put an end to them. He can soon make a city of praise to be a reproach, and a city of joy to be a terror to itself.

Secondly. It ends with a terrible fall and fire. 1. The inhabitants are slain, ver. 26. The young men, that should fight the enemy and defend the city, shall fall by the sword in the street; and all the men of war, mighty men, expert in war, and engaged in the service of their country, shall be cut off. 2. The city is laid in ashes, ver. 27. The fire is kindled by the besiegers in the wall, but it shall devour all before it, the palaces of Benhadad particularly, where so much mischief had formerly been hatched against God's Israel, for which it is now thus visited.

28 Concerning Kedar, and concerning the kingdoms of Hazor, which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon shall smite, thus saith the LORD;
Arise ye, go up to Kedar,
And spoil the men of the east.
29 Their tents and their flocks shall they take away:
They shall take to themselves their curtains,
And all their vessels, and their camels;
And they shall cry unto them, Fear is on every side.
30 Flee, get you far off,
Dwell deep, O ye inhabitants of Hazor, saith the LORD;
For Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath taken counsel against you,
And hath conceived a purpose against you.
31 Arise, get you up unto the wealthy nation,
That dwelleth without care, saith the LORD,
Which have neither gates nor bars,
Which dwell alone.
32 And their camels shall be a booty,
And the multitude of their cattle a spoil:
And I will scatter into all winds them that are in the utmost corners;
And I will bring their calamity
From all sides thereof, saith the LORD.
33 And Hazor shall be a dwelling for dragons,
And a desolation for ever: [dwell in it.
There shall no man abide there, nor any son of man

These verses foretell the desolation that Nebuchadnezzar and his forces should make among the people of Kedar, (who descended from Kedar the son of Ishmael, and inhabited a part of Arabia the Stony,) and of the kingdoms, the petty principalities of Hazor, that joined to them, who perhaps were originally Canaanites of the kingdom of Hazor, in the north of Canaan, which had Jabin for its king, but, being driven thence, settled in the deserts of Arabia, and associated themselves with the Kedarenes. Concerning this people we may here observe,

First. What was their present state and posture. They dwelt in tents, and had no walls but curtains, ver. 29, no fortified cities; they had "neither gates nor bars," ver. 31; they were shepherds, and had no treasures but stock upon land, no money but flocks and camels; they had no soldiers among them, for they were in no fear of invaders; no merchants, for they dwelt alone, ver. 31. Those of other nations neither came among them nor traded with them, but they lived within themselves, content with the products and pleasures of their own country. This was their manner of living, very different from that of the nations that were round about them. And, 1. They were very rich; though they had no trade, no treasures, yet they are here said to be a wealthy nation, ver. 31, because they had a sufficiency to answer all the occasions of human life, and they were content with it. Note, Those are truly rich that have enough to supply their necessities, and know when they have enough. We need not go to the treasures of kings and provinces, or the cash of merchants, to look for wealthy people; they may be found among shepherds that dwell in tents. 2. They were very easy; they dwelt without care, their wealth was such as nobody envied them, or, if any did, they might come peaceably and enjoy the like, and therefore they fear nobody. Note, Those that live innocently and honestly may live very securely, though they have neither gates nor bars.

Secondly. The design of the king of Babylon against them, and the descent he made upon them; "He hath taken counsel against you, and hath conceived a purpose against you," ver. 30. That proud man resolves it shall never be said that he who had conquered so many strong cities will leave those unconquered that dwell in tents. It was strange that eagle would stoop to catch these flies; that so great a prince should play at such small game; but all is fish that comes to the ambitious, covetous man's net. Note, It will not always secure men from suffering wrong to be able to say they have done no wrong; not to have given offence will not be a defence against such men as Nebuchadnezzar. Yet, how unrighteous soever he was in doing it, God was righteous in directing it. These people have lived inoffensively among their neighbours, as many do, who yet like them are guilty before God; and it was to punish them for their offences against him that God said, ver. 28, "Arise ye, go up to Kedar, and spoil the men of the east." They will do it to gratify their own covetousness and ambition, but God orders it for the correcting of an unthankful people, and for warning to a careless world to expect trouble when they seem to be most safe. God saith to the Chaldeans, ver. 31, "Arise, get you up unto the wealthy nation that dwell without care;" go, and give them an alarm, that none may imagine their mountain stands so strong that it cannot be moved.

Thirdly. The great amazement that this put them into, and the great desolation hereby made among them; "They shall cry unto them," that is, those on the borders shall send the alarm into all parts of the country, which shall be put into the utmost confusion by it; they shall cry, "Fear is on every side," we are surrounded by the enemy, the very terror of which shall drive them all to their feet, and they shall none of them have any heart to make resistance. The enemy shall proclaim fear upon them or against them on every side; they need not strike a stroke, they shall shout them out of their tents, ver. 29. Upon the first alarm they shall flee, get far off, and dwell deep, ver. 30, as the Edomites, ver. 8. And it will be found that this fear on every side is not groundless, for their calamity shall be brought from all sides thereof, ver. 32. No marvel there are fears on every side, when there are foes on every side. The issue will be, 1. What they have will be a prey to the Chaldeans. They shall take to themselves their curtains and vessels; though they are but plain and coarse, and they have better of their own, yet they shall take them for spite and spoil, for spoiling sake; they shall carry away their tents and their flocks, ver. 29. Their camels shall be a booty to those that came for nothing else, ver. 32. 2. It is not said that any of them shall be slain, for they attempt not to make any resistance, and their tents and flocks are accepted as a ransom of their lives; but they shall be dislodged and dispersed, though now they dwell in the utmost corners, out of the way, and therefore they think out of the reach of danger. By this character those people were distinguished, ch. ix. 26, xxv. 23; yet they shall from thence be scattered into all winds, into all parts of the world. Note, Privacy and obscurity are not always a protection and security. Many that affect to be strangers to the world may yet, by unthought of providences, be forced into it; and those that live most retired may have the same lot with those that thrust themselves forth and lie most exposed. 3. Their country shall lie uninhabited; for, lying remote and out of all high roads, and having neither cities nor lands inviting to strangers, none shall care to succeed them, so that Hazor shall be "a desolation for ever," ver. 33. If busy men be displaced, many strive to get into their places, because they lived great; but here are easy, quiet men displaced, and no man cares to abide where they did, because they lived mean.

34 The word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet against Elam in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, saying,

35 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Behold, I will break the bow of Elam,
The chief of their might.

36 And upon Elam will I bring the four winds
From the four quarters of heaven,
And will scatter them toward all those winds;
And there shall be no nation
Whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come.

37 For I will cause Elam to be dismayed before their enemies,
And before them that seek their life:
And I will bring evil upon them,
Even my fierce anger, saith the LORD;
And I will send the sword after them,
Till I have consumed them:

38 And I will set my throne in Elam,
And will destroy from thence
The king and the princes, saith the LORD.

39 But it shall come to pass in the latter days, [LORD.
That I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith the

This prophecy is dated in the beginning of Zedekiah's reign; it is probable the other prophecies against the Gentiles going before, were at the same time. The Elamites were the Persians, descended from Elam the son of Shem, Gen. x. 22; yet some think it was only that part of Persia which lay nearest to the Jews, which was called Elymais, and adjoined to Media-Elam, had acted against God's Israel, bare the quiver in an expedition against them, Isa. xxii. 6, and therefore must be reckoned with among the rest. It is here foretold in general that God will "bring evil upon them" even his fierce anger, and that is evil enough, it has all evil in it, ver. 37. In particular,

First. Their forces shall be disabled, and rendered incapable to do them any service. The Elamites were famous archers, but, "Behold, I will break the bow of Elam," ver. 35, will ruin their artillery, and then the chief of their might is gone. God often orders it so that that which we most trust to first fails us, and that which was the chief of our might proves the least of our help.

Secondly. Their people shall be dispersed. There shall come enemies against them from all parts of the world, and they shall all carry some of them away captives into their respective countries, while others shall flee, some one way and some another, to shift for themselves, so that "There shall be no nation whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come," ver. 36. The four winds shall be brought upon them, the storm shall come, sometimes from one point and sometimes from another, to toss and hurry them several ways. And we know not from what point the wind of trouble may blow; but if God compass us with his favour we are safe, and may be easy, which way soever the storm comes. Fear shall drive them into other countries, they shall be dismayed before their enemies; but, as if that were not enough, "I will send the sword after them," ver. 37. Note, God can make his judgments follow those that think by flight to escape them, and to get out of the reach of them; evil pursues sinners.

Thirdly. Their princes shall be destroyed, and the government quite changed; ver. 38, "I will set my throne in Elam." The throne of Nebuchadnezzar shall be set there, or the throne of Cyrus, who began his conquests with Elymais; or it may be meant of the throne on which God sits for judgment. He will make them know that he reigns, that he judgeth in the earth, and that kings and princes are accountable to him, and that, as high as they are, he is above them. The king of Elam was famous of old, Gen. xiv. 1. Chedorlaomer was king of Elam, and a mighty man he was in his day; the nations about him served him; his successors, we may suppose, made a great figure; but the king of Elam is no more to God than another man. When God sets his throne in Elam he will "destroy from thence the king and the princes" that are, and set up whom he pleaseth.

Fourthly. Yet the destruction of Elam shall not be perpetual; ver. 39, "In the latter days I will bring again the captivity of Elam." When Cyrus had destroyed Babylon, brought the empire into the hands of the Persians, the Elamites, no doubt, returned in triumph, out of all the countries whither they were scattered, and settled again in their own country. But this promise was to have its full and principal accomplishment in the days of the Messiah, when we find Elamites particularly among those who, when the Holy Ghost was given, heard spoken in their own tongues the wonderful works of God, Acts ii. 11, and that is the most desirable return of the captivity. If the Son make you free, then you shall be free indeed.

CHAPTER L.

In this chapter, and that which follows, we have the judgment of Babylon, which is put last of Jeremiah's prophecies against the Gentiles, because it was last accomplished; and when the cup of God's fury went round, ch. xxv. 17, the king of Sheshach, that is, Babylon, drunk last. Babylon was employed as the rod in God's hand for the chastising of all the other nations, and now at length that rod shall be thrown into the fire. The destruction of Babylon by Cyrus was foretold, long before it came to its height, by Isaiah, and now again, when it is come to its height, by Jeremiah; for, though at this time he saw that kingdom flourishing like a green bay-tree, yet at the same time he foresaw it withered and cut down. And, as Isaiah's prophecies of the destruction of Babylon, and the deliverance of Israel out of it, seem designed to typify the evangelical triumphs of all believers over the powers of darkness, and in the great salvation wrought out by our Lord Jesus Christ, so Jeremiah's prophecies of the same events seem designed to point at the Apocalyptic triumphs of the Gospel church in the latter days over the New Testament Babylon, many passages in the Revelation being borrowed from hence. The kingdom of Babylon being much larger and stronger than any other of the kingdoms here prophesied against, its fall was the more considerable in itself; and it having been more oppressive to the people of God than any of the other, therefore the prophet is very large upon this subject, for the comfort of the captives; and what was foretold in general often before, ch. xxv. 12, xxvii. 7, is here more particularly described, and with a great deal of prophetic heat as well as light. The terrible judgments God had in store for Babylon, and the glorious blessings he had in store for his people that were captives there, are intermixed and counterchanged in the prophecy of this chapter; for therefore Babylon was destroyed to make way for the turning again of the captivity of God's people. Here is, I. The ruin of Babylon, ver. 1—3; and again, ver. 9—16; and again, ver. 21—32; and again, ver. 35—46. II. The redemption of God's people, ver. 4—8; and again, ver. 17—20; and again, ver. 33, 34. And these being set the one over against the other it is easy to say which one would choose to take one's lot with, the persecuting Babylonians, who, though now in pomp, are reserved for so great a ruin, or the persecuted Israelites, who, though now in thraldom, are reserved for so great a glory.

THE word that the LORD spake against Babylon and against the land of the Chaldeans by Jeremiah the prophet.

2 Declare ye among the nations,
And publish, and set up a standard;
Publish, and conceal not:
Say, Babylon is taken,
Bel is confounded,
Merodach is broken in pieces;
Her idols are confounded,
Her images are broken in pieces.

3 For out of the north there cometh up a nation against her,
Which shall make her land desolate,
And none shall dwell therein:

They shall remove, they shall depart,
Both man and beast.
4 In those days, and in that time, saith the LORD,
The children of Israel shall come,
They and the children of Judah together,
Going and weeping:
They shall go, and seek the LORD their God.
5 They shall ask the way to Zion
With their faces thitherward, saying,
Come, and let us join ourselves to the LORD
In a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten.
6 My people hath been lost sheep:
Their shepherds have caused them to go astray,
They have turned them away on the mountains:
They have gone from mountain to hill,
They have forgotten their restingplace.
7 All that found them have devoured them:
And their adversaries said, We offend not,
Because they have sinned against the LORD, the habitation of justice,
Even the LORD, the hope of their fathers.
8 Remove out of the midst of Babylon,
And go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans,
And be as the he goats before the flocks.

BIRS NIMROUD—THE SUPPOSED SITE OF BABYLON.

Here is, First. A word spoken against Babylon, by him whose works all agree with his word, and none of whose words fall to the ground. The king of Babylon had been very kind to Jeremiah, and yet he must foretell the ruin of that kingdom; for God's prophets must not be governed by favour or affection. Whoever are your friends, if, notwithstanding, they be God's enemies, we dare not speak peace to them.

1. The destruction of Babylon is here spoken of as a thing done, ver. 2. Let it be published to the nations as a piece of news, true news, and great news, and news they are all concerned in; let him hang out the flag, as is usual, on days of triumph, to give notice of it, let all the world take notice of it,—Babylon is taken; let God have the honour of it, let his people have the comfort of it, and therefore do not conceal it. Take care that it be known, that the Lord may be known by those judgments which he executeth, Ps. ix. 16.

2. It is spoken of as a thing done thoroughly; for, 1st. The very idols of Babylon, which the people would protect with all possible care, and from which they expected protection, shall be destroyed. Bel and Merodach were their two principal deities; they shall be confounded, and the images of them broken to pieces. 2nd. The country shall be laid waste, ver. 3, out of the north, from Media, which lay north of Babylon, and from Assyria, through which Cyrus made his descent upon Babylon; from thence the nation shall come that shall make her land desolate. Their land was north to the countries that they destroyed, who were therefore threatened with evil from the north; omne malum ab aquilone,—'every evil comes from the north.' But God will find out nations yet farther north to come upon them. The pomp and power of old Rome was brought down by northern nations, the Goths and Vandals.

Secondly. Here is a word spoken for the people of God, and for their comfort, both the children of Israel and Judah; for many there were of the ten tribes associated with those of the two tribes in their return out of Babylon. Now here,

1. It is promised, that they shall return to their God first, and then to their own land; and the promise of their conversion and reformation is that which makes way for all the other promises, ver. 4, 5. 1st. They shall lament after the Lord, as the whole house of Israel did in Samuel's time, 1 Sam. vii. 2. They shall go weeping. These tears flow not from the sorrow of the world, as those when they went into captivity, but from godly sorrow; they are tears of repentance for sin, tears of joy for the goodness of God, in the dawning of the day of their deliverance, which, for aught appears, doth more towards the bringing of them to mourn for sin than all the calamities of their captivity; that prevails to lead them to repentance when the other did not prevail to drive them to it. Note, It is a good sign God is coming towards a people in ways of mercy when they begin to be tenderly affected under his hand. 2nd. They shall inquire after the Lord; they shall not sink under their sorrows, but bestir themselves to find out comfort where it is to be had; they shall go weeping to seek the Lord their God. Those that seek the Lord must seek him sorrowing, as Christ's parents sought him, Lu. ii. 48. And those that sorrow must seek the Lord, and then their sorrow shall soon be turned into joy, for he will be found of those that seek him. They shall seek the Lord as their God, and shall now have no more to do with idols. When they shall hear that the idols of Babylon are confounded and broken, it will be seasonable for them to inquire after their own God, and return to him who lives for ever. Therefore men are deceived in false gods, that they may depend on the true God only. 3rd. They shall think of returning to their own country again, shall think of it not only as a mercy, but as a duty, because there only is the holy hill of Zion, on which once stood the house of the Lord their God; ver. 5, "They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward." Zion was the city of their solemnities; they often thought of it in the depth of their captivity, Ps. cxxxvii. 1, but now the ruin of Babylon gave them some hopes of a release; they talk of nothing else but of going back to Zion. Their hearts were upon it before, and now they set their faces thitherwards; they long to be there; they set out for Zion, and resolve not to take up short. The journey is long; they know not the road, but they shall ask the way; for they will press forward till they come to Zion; and, as they are determined not to turn back, so they are in care not to miss the way. This represents the return of poor souls to God; heaven is the Zion they aim at as their end, on this they have set their hearts, towards this they have set their faces, and therefore ask the way thither. Not ask the way to heaven, and set their faces towards the world; nor set their faces towards heaven, and go on at a venture without asking the way. But in all true converts there is both a sincere desire to attain the end and a constant care to keep in the way; and a blessed sight it is to see people thus asking their way to heaven with their faces thitherwards. 4th. They shall renew their covenants with God of closer walking for the future; "Come, and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant." They had broken covenant with God, had in effect separated themselves from him, but now they resolve to join themselves to him again, by engaging themselves afresh to be his. Thus, when backsliders return, they must do their first works, must renew the covenant they first made, and it must be a perpetual covenant, that must never be broken, and in order to that must never be forgotten; for a due remembrance of it will be the means of a due observance of it.

2. Their present case lamented as very sad, and as having been long so; "My people," (for he owns them as his now they are returning to him) "hath been lost sheep," ver. 6. "They have gone from mountain to hill," have been hurried from place to place, and could find no pasture; "they have forgotten their resting place" in their own country, and cannot find a way to it. And that which aggravated their misery was, 1st. That they were led astray by their own shepherds, their own princes and priests; they turned them from their duty, and so provoked God to turn them out of their own land. It is ill with a people when their leaders cause them to err, when those that should direct and reform them seduce and debauch them, and when those that should secure and advance their interests are the betrayers of them. 2nd. That in their wanderings they lay exposed to the beasts of prey, who thought they were entitled to them, as waifs and strays that had no owner, ver. 7. It is with with them as with wandering sheep, "All that found them have devoured them," and made a prey of them; and when they did them the greatest injuries they laughed at them, telling them it was what their own prophets had many a time told them they deserved. That was far from justifying those who did them wrong, yet they bantered them with this excuse, "We offend not, because they have sinned against the Lord," but they could not pretend they had sinned against them. And see what notion they had of the Lord they had sinned against, not as the only true and living God, but only as "the habitation of justice," and "the hope of their fathers." They had put a contempt upon the temple, and upon the tradition of their ancestors, and therefore deserved to suffer these hard things. And yet it was indeed an aggravation of their sin, and justified God, though it did not justify their adversaries in what was done to them, that they had forsaken "the habitation of justice," and him that was "the hope of their fathers."

3. They are called upon to hasten away as soon as ever the door of liberty was opened to them, ver. 8. Remove not only out of the borders, but "out of the midst of Babylon;" though you be never so well seated there, think not to settle there, but hasten to Zion, and "be as the he-goats before the flocks," that is, strive which shall be foremost, which shall lead in so good a work. A he-goat is therefore comely in going, (Pr. xxx. 31,) because he goes first. It is a graceful thing to be forward in a good work, and to set others a good example.

9 For, lo, I will raise
And cause to come up against Babylon
An assembly of great nations from the north country:
And they shall set themselves in array against her;
From thence she shall be taken:
Their arrows shall be as of a mighty expert man;
None shall return in vain.
10 And Chaldea shall be a spoil:
All that spoil her shall be satisfied, saith the LORD.
11 Because ye were glad, because ye rejoiced,
O ye destroyers of mine heritage,
Because ye are grown fat as the heifer at grass,
And bellow as bulls;
12 Your mother shall be sore confounded;
She that bare you shall be ashamed:
Behold, the hindermost of the nations shall be
A wilderness, a dry land, and a desert.
13 Because of the wrath of the LORD it shall not be inhabited,
But it shall be wholly desolate:
Every one that goeth by Babylon shall be astonished,
And hiss at all her plagues.
14 Put yourselves in array against Babylon round about:

All ye that bend the bow,
Shoot at her, spare no arrows:
For she hath sinned against the LORD.
15 Shout against her round about:
She hath given her hand:
Her foundations are fallen,
Her walls are thrown down:
For it is the vengeance of the LORD:
Take vengeance upon her;
As she hath done, do unto her.
16 Cut off the sower from Babylon,
And him that handleth the sickle in the time of harvest:
For fear of the oppressing sword
They shall turn every one to his people,
And they shall flee every one to his own land.
17 Israel is a scattered sheep;
The lions have driven him away:
First the king of Assyria hath devoured him;
And last this Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones.
18 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Behold, I will punish the king of Babylon and his land,
As I have punished the king of Assyria.
19 And I will bring Israel again to his habitation,
And he shall feed on Carmel and Bashan,
And his soul shall be satisfied
Upon mount Ephraim and Gilead.
20 In those days, and in that time, saith the LORD, [none;
The iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be
And the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found:
For I will pardon them whom I reserve.

God is here, by his prophet, as afterwards in his providence, proceeding in his controversy with Babylon. Observe,

First. The commission and charge given to the instruments that were employed in destroying Babylon. The army that is to do it is called "an assembly of great nations," ver. 9, the Medes and Persians, and all their allies and auxiliaries; it is called an assembly, because regularly formed by the Divine will and counsel to do this execution. God will raise them up to do it,—will incline them to, and fit them for, this service, and then he will cause them to come up, for all their motions are under his conduct and direction. He shall give the word of command, shall order them to put themselves in array against Babylon, ver. 14, and then they shall put themselves in array, ver. 9, for what God appoints to be done shall be done; and from thence presently she shall be taken,—from their first sitting down before it they shall be still gaining ground against it till it be taken. God shall bid them "shoot at her, and spare no arrows," ver. 14; and then "their arrows shall be as of a mighty expert man," that has both skill and strength, a good eye and a good hand; ver. 9, "None shall return in vain." When God gives commission he will give success. Nay, they are bidden not only to "shoot at her," ver. 14, but to "shout against her," ver. 15, with a triumphant shout, as those that are already sure of victory. Those whom God directs to shoot may do it with shouting, for they are sure not to miss the mark.

Secondly. The desolation and destruction itself that shall be brought upon Babylon. This is set forth here in a great variety of expressions. 1. The wealth of Babylon shall be a rich and easy prey to the conquerors; ver. 10, "Chaldea shall be a spoil" to all her destroyers, who shall enrich themselves by plundering her, and, which is strange, "all that spoil her shall be satisfied." They shall have so much, that even they themselves shall say they have enough. 2. The country of Babylon shall be dispeopled, and lie uninhabited; "It shall be wholly desolate," ver. 13, to that degree, that every one that goes by shall triumph in their fall, and, instead of condoling them, shall "hiss at all her plagues," ver. 13. 3. Their ancestors shall be ashamed of their cowardice, in fleeing from the first onset, ver. 12. Or, your mother, that is, Babylon itself, the mother city, shall be confounded, when she sees herself deserted by those that should have been her guards. Thus the first ages of Christians may justly be confounded and ashamed, to see how unlike them the latter ages are, and how wretchedly they have degenerated; and no sin brings a surer and sorer ruin upon persons or people than apostacy. 4. The great admirers of Babylon shall see it rendered very despicable. The last of kingdoms, the very tail of the nations, shall it be, "a wilderness, a dry land, and a desert," ver. 12. The country that was populous shall be dispeopled, that was enriched with a fertile soil shall become barren. 5. The great city, the head of it, shall be quite ruined; "her foundations are fallen," and therefore "her walls are thrown down;" for how can the walls stand when Divine vengeance is at the door, and shakes the very foundations? It is the vengeance of the Lord, which nothing can contend with either in law or battle. 6. There shall not be left in Babylon so much as the poor of the land for vinedressers and husbandmen, as there was in Israel, ver. 16. The sower shall be cut off from Babylon, and him that handleth the sickle; the country shall be so emptied of people that there shall be none to till the ground, and gather in the fruits of it. Harvest shall come, and there shall be no reapers; seedness shall come, but there shall be no sowers; God will do his part, but there shall be no men to do theirs. 7. All their auxiliary forces, which they have hired into their service, shall desert them, as mercenary men often do, upon the approach of danger; ver. 16, "for fear of the oppressing sword, they shall turn every one to his people." This was threatened before concerning Egypt, ch. xlvi. 16.

Thirdly. The procuring provoking cause of this destruction. It comes from God's displeasure: it is "because of the wrath of the Lord," that Babylon is wholly desolate, ver. 13, and his wrath is righteous; for, ver. 14, "She hath sinned against the Lord," therefore "spare no arrows." Note, It is sin that makes men a mark for the arrows of God's judgments. A great deal of idolatry and immorality were to be found in Babylon, yet those are not mentioned as the reason of God's displeasure against them, but the injuries they had done to the people of God, from a principle of enmity to them as his people. They have been the destroyers of God's heritage, ver. 11. Herein indeed God made use of them for the necessary correction of his people; and yet it is laid to their charge as a heinous crime, because they designed nothing but their utter destruction. 1. What they did against Jerusalem they did with pleasure; ver. 11, "Ye were glad, ye rejoiced." God doth not afflict his people willingly, and therefore takes it very ill if the instruments he employs afflict them willingly. When Titus Vespasian destroyed Jerusalem, he wept over it, but these Chaldeans triumphed over it. 2. The spoils of Jerusalem they made use of to feed their own luxury; "Ye are grown fat as the heifer at grass, and bellow as bulls." Your having conquered Jerusalem has made you very wanton and proud, easy to yourselves, and formidable to all about you, and therefore you must be a spoil. They that have thus swallowed down riches must vomit them up again. Therefore they have given their hand, ver. 15; that is, they have surrendered themselves to the conqueror, have tamely yielded, so that now you may take vengeance on her, now you may make reprisals, and do unto her as she hath done. 3. They aimed at nothing less than the utter ruin of God's Israel. "Israel is a scattered sheep," as before, ver. 6, that is, not only barked at and worried by dogs, but even lions, the most potent adversaries, have roared upon him, and driven him away, ver. 17. One king of Assyria carried the ten tribes quite away, and devoured them; another invaded Judah, and plundered and impoverished it; tore the fleece and flesh of this poor sheep, and now at last, this Nebuchadnezzar, that is the terror and plague of all his neighbours, has taken advantage of the low condition to which he is reduced, and he has fallen upon him, and broken his bones, has quite ruined him, has unboned him; and therefore this king of Babylon must be punished as the king of Assyria was, ver. 18. Note, Those who pursue and prosecute the sins of their predecessors must expect to be pursued and prosecuted by their plagues; if they do as they did, let them fare as they fared.

Fourthly. The mercy promised to the Israel of God, which shall not only accompany but accrue from the destruction of Babylon. 1. God will return their captivity; they shall be released out of their bondage, and brought again to their own habitation, as sheep that were scattered to their own fold, ver. 19. They still retained a title to the land of Canaan, it is their habitation still, the discontinuance of their possession was not the destruction of their right; but now they shall recover the enjoyment of it again. 2. He will restore their prosperity. They shall not only live, but live comfortably in their own land again; they shall feed upon Carmel and Bashan, the richest and most fruitful parts of the country. These sheep shall be gathered from the deserts to which they were dispersed, and put again into good pasture, which their soul shall be satisfied with; though they shall come hungry to it, having been so long stinted and straitened, and kept short, yet they shall find enough to satiate them, and shall have hearts to be satiated with it. They inquired the way to Zion, ver. 5, where God was to be served and worshipped, that was it which they chiefly aimed at in their return; but God will not only bring them thither, but bring them also to Carmel and Bashan, where they shall abundantly feed themselves. Note, They that return to God and their duty shall find true satisfaction of soul in so doing; and they that seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, that aim to make their habitation in Zion, the holy hill, other things shall be added to them, even all the comforts of Ephraim and Gilead, the fruitful hills. 3. God will pardon their iniquity. This is the root of all the rest; ver. 20, "In those days the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none." Not only the punishments of their iniquity shall be taken off, but the offence which it gave to God shall be forgotten, and he will be reconciled to them. Their sin shall be before him as if it had never been; it shall be blotted out as a cloud, crossed out as a debt, shall be cast behind his back, nay, it shall be cast into the depth of the sea, shall be no longer sealed up among God's treasures, nor in any danger of appearing again, or rising up against them. This notes how fully God forgives sin, he remembers it no more. Note, Deliverances out of trouble are then comforts indeed, when they are the fruits of the forgiveness of sin, Isa. xxxviii. 17. Judah and Israel were so fully forgiven when they were brought back out of Babylon, that they are said to have "received of the Lord's hand double for all their sins," Isa. xl. 2. This may include also a thorough reformation of their hearts and lives, as well as a full remission of their sins. If any seek for idols, or any idolatrous customs among them, after their return, there shall be none, they shall not find them; their dross shall be purely purged away, and by that it shall appear that their guilt is so; "for I will pardon them whom I reserve." I will be propitious to them, so the word is: and that must be through him who is the great propitiation. Note, Those whose sins God pardons he reserves for something very great; for whom he justifies them he glorifies.

21 Go up against the land of Merathaim,
Even against it, and against the inhabitants of Pekod:
Waste and utterly destroy after them, saith the LORD,
And do according to all that I have commanded thee.
22 A sound of battle is in the land,
And of great destruction. [broken!
23 How is the hammer of the whole earth cut asunder and How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations!
24 I have laid a snare for thee, and thou art also taken,
O Babylon, and thou wast not aware:
Thou art found, and also caught,
Because thou hast striven against the LORD.
25 The LORD hath opened his armoury,
And hath brought forth the weapons of his indignation:
For this is the work of the Lord GOD of hosts
In the land of the Chaldeans.
26 Come against her from the utmost border,
Open her storehouses:
Cast her up as heaps, and destroy her utterly:

Let nothing of her be left.
27 Slay all her bullocks;
Let them go down to the slaughter:
Woe unto them! for their day is come,
The time of their visitation. [Babylon,
28 The voice of them that flee and escape out of the land of
To declare in Zion the vengeance of the LORD our God,
The vengeance of his temple.
29 Call together the archers against Babylon:
All ye that bend the bow,
Camp against it round about;
Let none thereof escape:
Recompense her according to her work;
According to all that she hath done, do unto her:
For she hath been proud against the LORD,
Against the Holy One of Israel.
30 Therefore shall her young men fall in the streets,
And all her men of war shall be cut off in that day, saith the LORD.
31 Behold, I am against thee, O thou most proud,
Saith the Lord GOD of hosts:
For thy day is come, the time that I will visit thee.
32 And the most proud shall stumble and fall,
And none shall raise him up:
And I will kindle a fire in his cities,
And it shall devour all round about him.

Here, First. The forces are mustered and commissioned to destroy Babylon, and every thing got ready for a descent upon that potent kingdom. Go up against that land by Merathaim, that is, the country of the Mardi, that lay part in Assyria and part in Armenia, and go among the inhabitants of Pekod, another country mentioned, Eze. xxiii. 23, which Cyrus took in his way to Babylon. The forces of Cyrus are called to go up against Babylon, ver. 21, to "come against her from the utmost border;" let all come together, for there will be both work and pay enough for them all, ver. 26. Distance of place must not be their hindrance from engaging in this work; the archers particularly must be called together against Babylon, ver. 29. Thus "the Lord hath opened his armoury," ver. 25, his treasury, so the word is, and hath "brought forth the weapons of his indignation," as great princes fetch out of their magazines and stores all necessary provisions for their armies, when they undertake any great expedition. Media and Persia are now God's armoury; thence he fetcheth the weapons of his wrath, Cyrus and his great officers and armies, whom he will make use of for the destruction of Babylon. Note, Great men are but instruments which the great God makes use of to serve his own purposes. He hath variety of instruments, hath them at command, hath armouries ready to be opened according as the occasion is. "This is the work of the Lord God of hosts." Note, When God hath work to do, he will make it appear that he is God of hosts, and will not want instruments to do it with.

Secondly. Instructions are given them what to do. In general, "Do according to all that I have commanded thee," ver. 21. It was said of Cyrus, Isa. xliv. 28, He shall perform all my pleasure in his expedition against Babylon. They must "waste and utterly destroy after them;" when they have destroyed once, they must go over them again; or, destroy their posterity that should come after them. They must "open her storehouses," ver. 26, rifle her treasures, and turn her artillery against herself; they must "cast her up as heaps;" let all the wealth and pomp of Babylon be shovelled up in a heap of ruins and rubbish. 'Tread her down as heaps,' so the margin reads it, and destroy her utterly. See how little account the great God makes of those things which men so much value, and value themselves by. Their princes and great men, that are fat and bulky, shall fall by the sword, not as men of war in the field of battle, which we call a bed of honour, but as beasts by the butcher's hand; ver. 27, "Slay all her bullocks," all her mighty men, let them go down sottishly and insensibly, as an ox to the slaughter. "Woe unto them," their cause is the more sad for the little sense they have of it; their day is come to fall, the time when they must be reckoned with, and they are not aware of it.

Thirdly. Assurances are given them of success. Let them do what God commands, and they shall accomplish what he threatens. A great destruction shall be made, ver. 22. Babylon shall become a desolation, ver. 23; her young men, and all her men of war, shall be cut off in that day, that should have been her defence, ver. 30. God is against her, ver. 31; he hath laid a snare for her, ver. 24; he hath formed this enterprise against her, that she should be surprised as a bird taken in a snare. Cyrus shall no doubt prevail, for he fights under God. God will kindle a fire in the cities of Babylon, ver. 32, and who can stand before him when he is angry, or quench the fire he has kindled?

Fourthly. Reasons are given for these severe dealings with Babylon. They that are employed in this war may, if they please, know the grounds of it, and be satisfied in the justice of it, which it is fit all should be that are called to such work. 1. Babylon has been very troublesome, vexatious, and injurious to all its neighbours. It has been "the hammer of the whole earth," ver. 23, beating, beating down and beating to pieces, all the nations far and near. It has done so long enough, it is time now that it be cut asunder and broken. Note, He that is the God of nations will, sooner or later, assert the injured rights of nations against those that unjustly and violently invade them. The God of the whole earth will break the hammer of the whole earth. 2. Babylon has bid defiance to God himself; "Thou hast striven against the Lord," ver. 24, hast joined issue with him, (so the word signifies,) as in law or battle, hast openly opposed him, set up rivals with him, raised rebellion against him, therefore thou art now found and caught, as in a snare. Note, Those that strive against the Lord will soon find themselves overmatched. 3. Babylon ruined Jerusalem, the holy city, and the holy house there, and must now be called to an account for that. This is the manifesto published in Zion, in the day of Babylon's visitation; it is "the vengeance of the Lord our God, the vengeance of his temple," ver. 28. The burning of the temple, and carrying away the vessels of that, was an article in the charge against Babylon, on which greater stress was laid than upon its being the hammer of the whole earth, for Zion was the joy and glory of the whole earth. Note, Whatever wrong is done to God's church, his temple in the world, it will certainly be reckoned for; and no vengeance will be sorer and heavier than the vengeance of the temple. 4. Babylon had been very haughty and insolent, and therefore must have a fall, for it is the glory of God to look upon those that are proud, and to abase them, Job xl. 12. "I am against thee, O thou most proud," ver. 31. 'Thou pride,' so the word is; and again, ver. 32, as proud as pride itself. Note, The pride of men's hearts sets God against them, and ripens them apace for ruin; for God resists the proud, and will bring them down. The most proud shall stumble and fall; they shall fall not so much by others thrusting them down as by their own stumbling; for they hold their heads so high that they never look under their feet, to choose their way, and avoid stumblingblocks, but walk at all adventures. Babylon's pride must unavoidably be her ruin, for "she has been proud against the Lord, against the Holy One of Israel," ver. 29; has insulted him in insulting over his people; she has made him her enemy, and therefore, when she is fallen none shall raise her up, ver. 32. Who can help those up whom God will throw down?

33 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
The children of Israel and the children of Judah were oppressed together:
And all that took them captives held them fast;
They refused to let them go.
34 Their Redeemer is strong;
The LORD of hosts is his name:
He shall throughly plead their cause,
That he may give rest to the land,
And disquiet the inhabitants of Babylon.
35 A sword is upon the Chaldeans, saith the LORD,
And upon the inhabitants of Babylon,
And upon her princes, and upon her wise men.
36 A sword is upon the liars; and they shall dote: [mayed.
A sword is upon her mighty men; and they shall be dis-
37 A sword is upon their horses, and upon their chariots,
And upon all the mingled people that are in the midst
And they shall become as women: [of her;
A sword is upon her treasures; and they shall be robbed.
38 A drought is upon her waters;
and they shall be dried up:
For it is the land of graven images,
And they are mad upon their idols.
39 Therefore the wild beasts of the desert
With the wild beasts of the islands shall dwell there,
And the owls shall dwell therein:
And it shall be no more inhabited for ever;
Neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation.
40 As God overthrow Sodom and Gomorrah
And the neighbour cities thereof, saith the LORD;
So shall no man abide there,
Neither shall any son of man dwell therein.
41 Behold, a people shall come from the north, and a great nation,
And many kings shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth.

ASSYRIAN GOD.

42 They shall hold the bow and the lance:
They are cruel, and will not shew mercy:
Their voice shall roar like the sea,
And they shall ride upon horses,
Every one put in array, like a man to the battle,
Against thee, O daughter of Babylon.
43 The king of Babylon hath heard the report of them,
And his hands waxed feeble:
Anguish took hold of him,
And pangs as of a woman in travail.

44 Behold, he shall come up
Like a lion from the swelling of Jordan
Unto the habitation of the strong:
But I will make them suddenly run away from her;
And who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her?
For who is like me? and who will appoint me the time?
And who is that shepherd that will stand before me?
45 Therefore hear ye the counsel of the LORD,
That he hath taken against Babylon;
And his purposes, that he hath purposed against the land of the Chaldeans:
Surely the least of the flock shall draw them out:
Surely he shall make their habitation desolate with them.
46 At the noise of the taking of Babylon the earth is moved,
And the cry is heard among the nations.

We have in these verses,

First. Israel's sufferings, and their deliverance out of those sufferings. God takes notice of the bondage of his people in Babylon, as he did of their bondage in Egypt; he hath surely seen it, and has heard their cry. Israel and Judah were "oppressed together," ver. 33. Those that remained of the captives of the ten tribes, upon the uniting of the kingdoms of Assyria and Chaldea, seemed to have come and mingled themselves with those of the two tribes, and to have mingled tears with them, so that they were oppressed together. They were humble supplicants for their liberty, and that was all; they could not attempt any thing towards it, for all that took them captives held them fast, and were quite too hard for them. But this is their comfort in distress, that, though they are weak, "their Redeemer is strong," ver. 34; their avenger, so the word signifies, that has a right to them, and will claim his right, and make good his claim: he is stronger than their enemies, that hold them fast; he can overpower all the force that is against them, and put strength into his own people, though they are very weak. "The Lord of hosts is his name," and he will answer his name, and make it to appear that he is what his people call him, and will be that to them for which they depend upon him. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of the people of God that, though they have hosts against them, they have the Lord of hosts for them. And "he shall thoroughly plead their cause;" pleading he shall plead it, plead it with jealousy, plead it effectually, plead it and carry it, "that he may give rest to the land," to his people's land, rest from all their enemies round about. This is applicable to all believers that complain of the dominion of sin, and corruption, and of their own weakness and manifold infirmities, let them know that "their Redeemer is strong," he is able to keep what they commit to him, and he will plead their cause; sin shall not have dominion over them, he will make them free, and they shall be free indeed; he will give them rest, that rest which remains for the people of God.

Secondly. Babylon's sin, and their punishment for that sin.

1. The sins they are here charged with are idolatry and persecution. 1st. They oppressed the people of God, they held them fast, and would not let them go; they "opened not the house of his prisoners," Isa. xiv. 17. This was God's quarrel with them, as of old with Pharaoh; it cost him dear, and yet they would not take warning. Therefore the inhabitants of Babylon must be disquieted, ver. 34, because they have disquieted God's people, whose honour and comfort he is jealous for, and therefore will recompense tribulation to those that trouble them, as well as rest to them that are troubled, 2 Thes. i. 6, 7. 2nd. They wronged God himself, and robbed him, giving that glory to others which is due to him alone; for, ver. 38, it is the land of graven images. All parts of the country abounded with idols, and they were mad upon them, were in love with them, and doated on them, cared not what cost and pains they were at in the worship of them, were unwearied in paying their respects to them; and in all this they were wretchedly infatuated, and acted like men out of their wits. They were carried on in their idolatry without reason or discretion, like men in a perfect fury. The word here used for idols properly signifies terrors, Enim, the name given to giants that were formidable, because they made the images of their gods to look frightful, to strike a terror upon fools and children. Their idols were scarecrows, yet they doated on them. Babylon was the mother of harlots, Rev. xvii. 5, the source of idolatry. Note, It is the maddest thing in the world to make a god of any creature; and those who are proud against the Lord, the true God, are justly given up to strong delusions, to be mad upon idols, that cannot profit. But this madness is wickedness, for which sinners will be certainly and severely reckoned with.

2. The judgments of God upon them for these sins are such as will quite lay them waste, and ruin them.

1st. All that should be their defence and support shall be cut off by the sword. The Chaldeans had long been God's sword, wherewith he had done execution upon the sinful nations round about; but now, they being as bad as any of them, or worse, a sword is brought upon them, even upon the inhabitants of Babylon, ver. 35, a sword of war; and as it is in God's hand, sent and directed by him, it is a sword of justice. It shall be, First. Upon their princes. They shall fall by it, and their dignity, wealth, and power shall not secure them. Secondly Upon their wise men, their philosophers, their statesmen, and privy counsellors. Their learning and policy shall neither secure themselves nor stand the public in any stead. Thirdly. Upon their soothsayers and astrologers, here called the liars, ver. 36, for they cheated with their prognostications of peace and prosperity. The sword upon them shall make them doat, so that they shall talk like fools, and be as men that had lost all their wits. Note, God has a sword that can reach the soul, and affect the mind, and bring men under spiritual plagues. Fourthly. Upon their mighty men. A sword shall be upon their spirits; if they are not slain, yet they shall be dismayed, and shall be no longer mighty men; for what stead will their hands stand them in when their hearts fail them. Fifthly. Upon their militia, ver. 37. The sword shall be upon their horses and chariots; the invaders shall make themselves masters of all their warlike stores, shall seize their horses and chariots for themselves, or destroy them. The troops of other nations, that were in their service, shall be quite disheartened, the mingled people shall become as weak and timorous as women. Sixthly. Upon their exchequer. The sword shall be upon her treasures, which are the sinews of war, and they shall be robbed and made use of by the enemy against them. See what universal destruction the sword makes when it comes with commission.

2nd. The country shall be made desolate, ver. 38, the waters shall be dried up; the water that secures the city. Cyrus drew the river Euphrates into so many channels as made it passable for his army, so that they got with ease to the walls of Babylon, which were thought to be by that river inaccessible. The water likewise that makes the country fruitful should be dried up, so that it shall be turned into barrenness, and shall be no more inhabited by the children of men, but by the "wild beasts of the desert," ver. 39. This was foretold concerning Babylon, Isa. xiii. 19—22. It shall become like Sodom and Gomorrah, ver. 40. The same was foretold concerning Edom, ch. xlix. 18. As the Chaldeans had laid Edom waste, so they shall themselves be laid waste.

3rd. The king and kingdom shall be put into the utmost confusion and consternation by the enemies' invading of them, ver. 41—43. All the expressions here used, speaking the formidable power of the invaders, the terrors wherewith they should array themselves, and the mighty fright which both court and country should be put into thereby, we met with before, ch. vi. 22—24, concerning the Chaldeans' invading the land of Judah. The battle which is there said to be against thee, O daughter of Zion, is here said to be against thee, O daughter of Babylon, to intimate that they should be paid in their own coin. Those that are for terror and destruction to others, God can find out such as shall be for terror and destruction to them; and those who have dealt cruelly, and have shewed no mercy, may expect to be cruelly dealt with, and to find no mercy. Only there is one difference between these passages: there it is said, "We have heard the fame thereof, and our hands wax feeble," &c.; here it is said, "The king of Babylon has heard the report," and "his hands waxed feeble," which intimates, that that proud and daring prince shall in the day of his distress be as weak and dispirited as the meanest Israelites were in the day of their distress.

4th. That they shall be as ill hurt as frightened; for the invader shall come up as a lion, to tear and destroy, ver. 44; and shall make them and their habitation desolate, ver. 45; and the desolation shall be so astonishing, that all the nations about shall be terrified by it, ver. 46. These three verses we had before, ch. xlix. 19—21, in the prophecy of the destruction of Edom, which was accomplished by the Chaldeans, and they are here repeated mutatis mutandis,—with a few necessary alterations,' in the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon, which was to be accomplished upon the Chaldeans, to shew that, though the distributions of providence may appear unequal for a time, its retributions will be equal at last; When thou shalt make an end to spoil thou shalt be spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1; Rev. xiii. 10.

CHAPTER LI.

The prophet in this chapter goes on with the prediction of Babylon's fall, to which other prophets also bare witness. He is very large and lively in describing the foresight God had given him of it, for the encouragement of the pious captives whose deliverance depended upon it, and was to be the result of it. Here is, I. The record of Babylon's doom with the particulars of it, intermixed with the grounds of God's controversy with her, many aggravations of her fall, and great encouragements given from thence to the Israel of God that suffered such hard things by her, ver. 1—58. II. The representation and ratification of this, by the throwing of a copy of this prophecy into the river Euphrates, ver. 59—64.

THUS saith the LORD;
Behold, I will raise up against Babylon,
And against them that dwell in the midst of them that rise up against me,
A destroying wind;
2 And will send unto Babylon fanners,
That shall fan her, and shall empty her land; [about.
For in the day of trouble they shall be against her round
3 Against him that bendeth let the archer bend his bow,
And against him that lifteth himself up in his brigan-
And spare ye not her young men; [dine:
Destroy ye utterly all her host.
4 Thus the slain shall fall in the land of the Chaldeans,
And they that are thrust through in her streets.
5 For Israel hath not been forsaken,
Nor Judah of his God, of the LORD of hosts;
Though their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel.
6 Flee out of the midst of Babylon,
And deliver every man his soul:
Be not cut off in her iniquity;
For this is the time of the LORD's vengeance;
He will render unto her a recompence.
7 Babylon hath been a golden cup in the LORD's hand,
That made all the earth drunken:
The nations have drunken of her wine;
Therefore the nations are mad.
8 Babylon is suddenly fallen and destroyed:
Howl for her;
Take balm for her pain,
If so be she may be healed.
9 We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed.
Forsake her, and let us go every one into his own country:
For her judgment reacheth unto heaven,
And is lifted up even to the skies.
10 The LORD hath brought forth our righteousness:

Come, and let us declare in Zion the work of the LORD
11 Make bright the arrows; gather the shields: [our God.
The LORD hath raised up the spirit of the kings of the
For his device is against Babylon, to destroy it; [Medes:
Because it is the vengeance of the LORD,
The vengeance of his temple.
12 Set up the standard upon the walls of Babylon,
Make the watch strong, set up the watchmen,
Prepare the ambushes:
For the LORD hath both devised and done
That which he spake against the inhabitants of Babylon.
13 O thou that dwellest upon many waters, abundant in treasures,
Thine end is come, and the measure of thy covetousness.
14 The LORD of hosts hath sworn by himself, saying,
Surely I will fill thee with men, as with caterpillers;
And they shall lift up a shout against thee.
15 He hath made the earth by his power,
He hath established the world by his wisdom,
And hath stretched out the heaven by his understanding.
16 When he uttereth his voice, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens;
And he causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of
He maketh lightnings with rain, [the earth:
And bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures.
17 Every man is brutish by his knowledge;
Every founder is confounded by the graven image:
For his molten image is falsehood,
And there is no breath in them.
18 They are vanity, the work of errors:
In the time of their visitation they shall perish.
19 The portion of Jacob is not like them;
For he is the former of all things:
And Israel is the rod of his inheritance:
The LORD of hosts is his name.
20 Thou art my battle ax and weapons of war:
For with thee will I break in pieces the nations,
And with thee will I destroy kingdoms; [rider;
21 And with thee will I break in pieces the horse and his
And with thee will I break in pieces the chariot and his rider;
22 With thee also will I break in pieces man and woman;
And with thee will I break in pieces old and young;
And with thee will I break in pieces the young man and the maid; [flock;
23 I will also break in pieces with thee the shepherd and his
And with thee will I break in pieces the husbandman and his yoke of oxen;
And with thee will I break in pieces captains and rulers.
24 And I will render unto Babylon
And to all the inhabitants of Chaldea
All their evil that they have done in Zion
In your sight, saith the LORD.
25 Behold, I am against thee, O destroying mountain, saith
Which destroyest all the earth: [the LORD,
And I will stretch out mine hand upon thee,
And roll thee down from the rocks,
And will make thee a burnt mountain.
26 And they shall not take of thee a stone for a corner,
Nor a stone for foundations;
But thou shalt be desolate for ever, saith the LORD.
27 Set ye up a standard in the land,
Blow the trumpet among the nations,
Prepare the nations against her,
Call together against her the kingdoms
Of Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz;
Appoint a captain against her;
Cause the horses to come up as the rough caterpillers.
28 Prepare against her the nations with the kings of the
The captains thereof, and all the rulers thereof, [Medes,
And all the land of his dominion.
29 And the land shall tremble and sorrow: [Babylon,
For every purpose of the LORD shall be performed against
To make the land of Babylon a desolation
Without an inhabitant.
30 The mighty men of Babylon have forborn to fight,
They have remained in their holds:
Their might hath failed;
They became as women:
They have burned her dwellingplaces;
Her bars are broken.
31 One post shall run to meet another,
And one messenger to meet another,
To shew the king of Babylon
That his city is taken at one end,
32 And that the passages are stopped,
And the reeds they have burned with fire,
And the men of war are affrighted.
33 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
The daughter of Babylon is like a threshingfloor,
It is time to thresh her:
Yet a little while, and the time of her harvest shall come.
34 Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon hath devoured me,
He hath crushed me,
He hath made me an empty vessel,
He hath swallowed me up like a dragon,
He hath filled his belly with my delicates,
He hath cast me out. [Babylon,
35 The violence done to me and to my flesh be upon
Shall the inhabitant of Zion say;
And my blood upon the inhabitants of Chaldea,
Shall Jerusalem say
36 Therefore thus saith the LORD; [thee;
Behold, I will plead thy cause, and take vengeance for
And I will dry up her sea, and make her springs dry.
37 And Babylon shall become heaps,
A dwellingplace for dragons,
An astonishment, and an hissing,
Without an inhabitant.
38 They shall roar together like lions:
They shall yell as lions' whelps.
39 In their heat I will make their feasts,
And I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice,
And sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake,
Saith the LORD.
40 I will bring them down like lambs to the slaughter,
Like rams with he goats.
41 How is Sheshach taken!
And how is the praise of the whole earth surprised!
How is Babylon become an astonishment among the 42 The sea is come up upon Babylon: [nations!
She is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof.
43 Her cities are a desolation,
A dry land, and a wilderness,
A land wherein no man dwelleth,
Neither doth any son of man pass thereby.
44 And I will punish Bel in Babylon,
And I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up: [him:
And the nations shall not flow together any more unto

Yea, the wall of Babylon shall fall.
45 My people, go ye out of the midst of her,
And deliver ye every man his soul
From the fierce anger of the LORD.
46 And lest your heart faint, [land;
And ye fear for the rumour that shall be heard in the
A rumour shall both come one year,
And after that in another year shall come a rumour,
And violence in the land, ruler against ruler.
47 Therefore, behold, the days come, [Babylon:
That I will do judgment upon the graven images of
And her whole land shall be confounded,
And all her slain shall fall in the midst of her.
48 Then the heaven and the earth, and all that is therein, shall sing for Babylon:
For the spoilers shall come unto her from the north,
saith the LORD.
49 As Babylon hath caused the slain of Israel to fall,
So at Babylon shall fall the slain of all the earth.
50 Ye that have escaped the sword, go away,
Stand not still:
Remember the LORD afar off,
And let Jerusalem come into your mind.
51 We are confounded, because we have heard reproach:
Shame hath covered our faces: [house.
For strangers are come into the sanctuaries of the LORD's
52 Wherefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will do judgment upon her graven images:
And through all her land the wounded shall groan.
53 Though Babylon should mount up to heaven,
And though she should fortify the height of her strength,
Yet from me shall spoilers come unto her, saith the 54 A sound of a cry cometh from Babylon, [LORD.
And great destruction from the land of the Chaldeans:
55 Because the LORD hath spoiled Babylon,
And destroyed out of her the great voice;
When her waves do roar like great waters,
A noise of their voice is uttered:
56 Because the spoiler is come upon her,
Even upon Babylon,
And her mighty men are taken,
Every one of their bows is broken:
For the LORD God of recompences shall surely requite.
57 And I will make drunk her princes, and her wise men,
Her captains, and her rulers, and her mighty men:
And they shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake,
Saith the King, whose name is the LORD of hosts.
58 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken,
And her high gates shall be burned with fire;
And the people shall labour in vain,
And the folk in the fire, and they shall be weary.

OVERFLOW OF THE EUPHRATES ON BABYLON.—ver. 42.

The particulars of this copious prophecy are dispersed and interwoven, and the same things left and returned to so often, that it could not well be divided into parts, but we must endeavour to collect them under their proper heads. Let us then observe here,

First. An acknowledgment of the great pomp and power that Babylon had been in, and the use that God in his providence had made of it; ver. 7, "Babylon hath been a golden cup," a rich and glorious empire, a golden city, Isa. xiv. 4; a head of gold, Dan. ii. 38; filled with all good things as a cup with wine; nay, she had been "a golden cup in the Lord's hand;" he had in a particular manner filled and favoured her with blessings; he had made the earth drunk with this cup; some were intoxicated with her pleasures, and debauched by her, others intoxicated with her terrors, and destroyed by her. And in both senses the New Testament Babylon is said to have made the kings of the earth drunk, Rev. xvii. 4; xviii. 3. Babylon had also been God's battle-axe; it was so at this time when Jeremiah prophesied, and was likely to be yet more so, ver. 20. The forces of Babylon were God's weapons of war, tools in his hand with which he broke in pieces and knocked down nations and kingdoms, horses and chariots, which are so much the strength of kingdoms, ver. 21; man and woman, young and old, with which kingdoms are replenished, ver. 22; the shepherd and his flock, the husbandman and his oxen, with which kingdoms are maintained and supplied, ver. 24. Such havoc as this the Chaldeans had made, when God employed them as instruments of his wrath for the chastising of the nations; and yet now Babylon herself must fall. Note, Those that have carried all before them a great while, yet will at length meet with their match, and their day also will come to fall; the rod will itself be thrown into the fire at last; nor can any think it will exempt them from God's judgments, that they have been instrumental in executing his judgments on others.

Secondly. A just complaint made of Babylon, and a charge drawn up against her by the Israel of God. 1. They are complained of for their incorrigible wickedness; ver. 9, "We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed." The people of God, that were captives among them, endeavoured according to the instructions given them, ch. x. 11, to convince them of the folly of their idolatry, but they could not do it; still they doated as much as ever upon their graven images, and therefore they resolve to quit them, and go to their own country. Yet some understand this as spoken by the forces they had hired for their assistance, declaring they had done their best to save her from ruin; but it was all to no purpose, and therefore they had as good go home to their respective countries; "for her judgment reacheth unto heaven," and it is in vain to withstand it, or think to avert it. 2. They are complained of for their inveterate malice against Israel. Other nations had been hardly used by the Chaldeans, but Israel only complains to God of it, and with confidence appeals to him, ver. 34, 35. "The king of Babylon has devoured me, and crushed me," and never thought he could do enough to ruin me; he has emptied me of all that was valuable, "hath swallowed me up" as a dragon or whale swallows up the little fish by shoals; "he hath filled his belly," filled his treasures, "with my delicates," with all my pleasant things, and "hath cast me out," cast me away as a vessel in which there is no pleasure; and now let them be accountable for all this. Zion and Jerusalem shall say, Let the violence done to me and my children, that are my own flesh, and pieces of myself, and all the blood of my people which they have shed like water, be upon them; let the guilt of it lie upon them, and let it be required at their hands. Note, Ruin is not far off from those that lie under the guilt of wrong done to God's people.

Thirdly. Judgment given upon this appeal by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, on behalf of Israel against Babylon. He sits in the throne judging right, is ready to receive complaints, and answers, ver. 36, "I will plead thy cause, leave it with me;" I will in due time plead it effectually, and take vengeance for thee; and every drop of Jerusalem's blood shall be accounted for with interest. Israel and Judah seem to have been neglected and forgotten, but God has an eye to them, ver. 5. It is true, "their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel." They were a provoking people, and their sins were a great offence to God as a holy God, and as their God,—their Holy One; and therefore he justly delivered them up into the hands of their enemies,—might justly have abandoned them, and left them to perish in their hands; but God deals better with them than they deserve; and, notwithstanding their iniquities, and his severities, Israel is not forsaken, is not cast off, though he be cast out, but is owned and looked after by his God, by the Lord of hosts. God is his God still, and will act for him as the Lord of hosts, a God of power. Note, Though God's people may have broken his laws, and fallen under his rebukes, yet it doth not therefore follow that they are thrown out of covenant, but God's care of them and love to them will flourish again, Ps. lxxxix. 30, 33. The Chaldeans thought they should never be called to an account for what they had done against God's Israel, but there is a time fixed for vengeance, ver. 6. We cannot expect it should come sooner than the time fixed; but then it will come. He will render unto Babylon a recompence; for the avenging of Israel is the vengeance of the Lord, who espouseth their cause; it is the vengeance of his temple, ver. 11, as before, ch. l. 28. The Lord God of recompences, the God to whom vengeance belongs, will surely requite, ver. 56, will pay them home; he will render unto Babylon all the evil they have done in Zion, ver. 24. He will return it in the sight of his people; they shall have the satisfaction to see their cause pleaded with jealousy; they shall not only live to see those judgments brought upon Babylon, but they shall plainly see them to be the punishment of the wrong they have done to Zion. Any man may see it, and say, Verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth; for, just as Babylon "hath caused the slain of Israel to fall," has not only slain those that were found in arms, but all without distinction, even all the land, almost all were put to the sword; so at Babylon shall fall, not only the slain of the city, but of all the country, ver. 49. Cyrus shall measure to the Chaldeans the same that they measured to the Jews, so that every observer may discern that God is recompensing them for what they did against his people. Zion's children shall in a particular manner triumph in it; ver. 10, "The Lord hath brought forth our righteousness." He has appeared in our behalf against those that dealt unjustly with us, and has righted us; he has also made it to appear that he is reconciled to us, and that we are yet in his eyes a righteous nation. Let it therefore be spoken to his praise, "Come, and let us declare in Zion the work of the Lord our God," that others may be invited to join with us in praising him.

Fourthly. A declaration of the greatness and sovereignty of that God who espouseth Zion's cause, and undertakes to reckon with this proud and potent enemy, ver. 14. It is the Lord of hosts that hath said it, that hath sworn it, hath sworn it by himself; for he could swear by no greater, that he will fill Babylon with vast and incredible numbers of the enemies' forces; will "fill it with men as with caterpillars," that shall overpower it with multitudes, and need only to lift up a shout against it, for that shall be so terrible as to dispirit all the inhabitants, and make them an easy prey to this numerous army. But who and where is he that can break so powerful a kingdom as Babylon? The prophet gives an account of him from the description he had formerly given of him, and of his sovereignty and victory over all pretenders, ch. x. 12—16, which was there intended for the conviction of the Babylonian idolaters, and the confirmation of God's Israel in the faith and worship of the God of Israel; and it is here repeated to shew that God will convince those by his judgments who would not be convinced by his word, that he is God over all. Let not any doubt but that he who has determined to destroy Babylon is able to make his words good; for, 1. He is the God that made the world, ver. 15, and therefore nothing is too hard for him to do. It is in his name that our help stands, and on him our hope is built. 2. He has the command of all the creatures that he has made, ver. 16. His providence is a continued creation; he hath wind and rain at his dispose; if he speak the word, "there is a multitude of waters in the heavens," and it is a wonder how they hang there; fed by vapours out of the earth, and it is a wonder how they ascend thence. Lightnings and rains seem contraries, as fire and water, and yet they are produced together; and the wind which seems arbitrary in its motions, and we know not whence it comes, yet we are sure is brought out of his treasuries. 3. The idols that oppose the accomplishment of his word are a mere sham, and their worshippers brutish people, ver. 17, 18. The idols are falsehood, they are vanity, they are the work of errors; when they come to be visited, that is, to be examined and inquired into, they perish, that is their reputation sinks, and they appear to be nothing, and those that make them are like unto them. But between the God of Israel and these gods of the heathen there is no comparison; ver. 19, "The portion of Jacob is not like them." God, who speaks this, and will do it, is the former of all things, and the Lord of all hosts, and therefore can do what he will, and there is a near relation between him and his people; for he is their portion, and they are his; they put a confidence in him as their portion, and he is pleased to take complacency in them, and a particular care of them, as the lot of his inheritance; and therefore he will do what is best for them. The repetition of these things here which were said before, intimates both the certainty and importance of them, and obligeth us to take special notice of them. "God hath spoken once, yea, twice have we heard this, that power belongs to God;" power to destroy the most formidable enemies of his church. And if God thus speak once, yea, twice, we are inexcusable if we do not perceive it, and receive it.

Fifthly. A description of the instruments that are to be employed in this service. God hath "raised up the spirit of the kings of the Medes," ver. 11, Darius and Cyrus, who came against Babylon by a Divine instinct; for God's device is against Babylon, to destroy it. They do it, but God devised it; he designed it, they are but accomplishing his purpose, and acting as he directed. Note, God's counsel shall stand, and according to it all hearts shall move. Those whom God employs against Babylon are compared, ver. 1, to a destroying wind, which either by its coldness blasts the fruits of the earth or by its fierceness blows down all before it. This wind is brought out of God's treasuries, ver. 16, and it is here said to be raised up against them that dwell in the midst of the Chaldeans,—those of other nations that inhabit among them, and are incorporated with them. The Chaldeans rise up against God, by falling down before idols, and against them God will raise up destroyers, for he will be too hard for them that contest with him. These enemies are compared to fanners, ver. 2, who shall drive them away as chaff is driven away by the fan. The Chaldeans had been fanners to winnow God's people, ch. xv. 7, and to empty them; and now they shall themselves be in like manner despoiled and dispersed.

Sixthly. An ample commission given them to destroy and lay all waste. Let them bend their bow against the archers of the Chaldeans, ver. 3, and not spare her young men, but utterly destroy them; "for the Lord hath both devised and done what he spake against Babylon," ver. 12. This may animate the instruments he employs, by assuring them of success. The methods they take are such as God has devised, and therefore they shall surely prosper; what he hath spoken shall be done, for he himself will do it. And therefore let all necessary preparations be made; this they are called to, ver. 27, 28. Let a standard be set up, under which to list soldiers for this expedition; let a trumpet be blown to call men together to it, and animate them in it; let the nations out of which Cyrus' army is to be raised prepare their recruits; let the kingdoms of Ararat and Minni, and Ashkenaz, of Armenia, both the higher and the lower, and of Ascania, about Phrygia and Bithynia, send in their quota of men for this service. Let general officers be appointed, and the cavalry advance; let the horses come up in great numbers, as the caterpillars, and come like them leaping and pawing in the valley. Let them lay the country waste as caterpillars do, Joel ii. 4, especially rough caterpillars. Let the kings and captains prepare nations against Babylon, for the service is great, and there is occasion for many hands to be employed in it.

Seventhly. The weakness of the Chaldeans, and their inability to make head against this threatening, destroying force. When God employed them against other nations, they had spirit and strength to act offensively, and went on with admirable resolution, conquering and to conquer. But, now it comes to their turn to be reckoned with, all their might and courage is gone, their hearts fail them, and none of all their men of might and mettle have found their hands to act so much as defensively. They are called upon here to prepare for action, but it is ironically, and in an upbraiding way; ver. 11, "Make bright the arrows," which are grown rusty through disuse; "gather the shields," that in a time of long peace and security have been scattered and thrown out of the way; ver. 12, "Set up the standard upon the walls of Babylon," upon the towers on those walls, to summon all that owed suit and service to that mother city, now to come in to her assistance. Let them make the watch as strong as they can, and appoint the sentinels to their respective posts, and prepare ambushes for the reception of the enemy. This intimates that they would be found very secure and remiss, and would need to be thus quickened,—and they were so to that degree, that they were in the midst of their revels when the city was taken,—but that all their preparations should be to no purpose; who will may call them to it, but they shall have no heart to come at the call, ver. 29. The whole "land shall tremble and sorrow," a universal consternation shall seize upon them; for they shall see both the irresistible arm and the irreversible counsel and decree of God against them; they shall see that God is making Babylon a desolation, and therein is performing what he hath purposed; and then the mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight, ver. 30. God having taken away their strength and spirit, so that they have remained in their holds, not daring so much as to peep forth, the might both of their hearts and of their hands fails. They became as timorous as women, so that the enemy has, without any resistance, burnt her dwelling-places, and broken her bars. It is to the same purpose, ver. 56—58. When the spoiler comes upon Babylon, her mighty men, that should make head against him, are presently taken, their weapons of war fail them; "every one of their bows is broken," and stands them in no stead. Their politics fail them; they call councils of war, but their princes and captains that sit in council to concert measures for the common safety are made drunk; they are as men intoxicated through stupidity or despair; they can form no right notions of things, stagger, and are unsteady in their counsels and resolves, and dash one against another, and like drunken men fall out among themselves; and at length "sleep a perpetual sleep," and never awake from their wine, the wine of God's wrath, for it is to them an opiate that lays them into a fatal lethargy. The walls of their city fail them, ver. 58. When the enemy had found ways to ford Euphrates, which was thought impassable, yet sure, think they, the walls are impregnable; they are the broad walls of Babylon, or, as the margin reads it, the walls of broad Babylon. The compass of the city within the walls was 385 furlongs, some say 408, that is about sixty miles; the walls were 200 cubits high, and fifty cubits broad, so that two chariots might easily pass by one another upon them. Some say there was a threefold wall about the inner city, and the like about the outer; and the stones of the wall being laid in pitch instead of mortar, Gen. xi. 3, were scarce separable. And yet they shall be utterly broken, and the high gates and towers shall be burnt, and the people that are employed in defence of the city shall labour in vain, in the fire; they shall quite tire themselves, but shall do no good.

Eighthly. The destruction that shall be made of Babylon by these invaders.

1. It is a certain destruction. The doom is past, and it cannot be reversed; a Divine power is engaged against it, which cannot be resisted; ver. 8, "Babylon is fallen and destroyed," is as sure to fall, to fall into destruction, as if it were fallen and destroyed already; though when Jeremiah prophesied this, and many a year after, it was in the height of its power and greatness. God declares, God appears against Babylon; ver. 25, "Behold, I am against thee," and those cannot stand long whom God is against; he will stretch out his hand upon it, a hand which no creature can bear the weight of, or withstand the force of. It is his purpose, which shall be performed, that Babylon must be a desolation, ver. 29.

2. It is a righteous destruction. Babylon has made herself meet for it, and therefore cannot fail to meet with it; for, ver. 25, Babylon has been a destroying mountain, very lofty and bulky as a mountain, and destroying all the earth, as the stones that are tumbled from high mountains spoil the grounds about them. But now it shall itself be rolled down from its rocks, which were as the foundations on which it stood; it shall be levelled, its pomp and power broken. It is now a burning mountain, like Etna and the other volcanos, that throw out fire, to the terror of all about them. But it shall be a burnt mountain; it shall at length have consumed itself, and shall remain a heap of ashes; so will this world be at the end of time. Again; ver. 33, "Babylon is like a threshing-floor," in which the people of God have been long threshed, as sheaves in the floor. But now the time is come that she shall herself be threshed, and her sheaves in her. Her princes and great men, and all her inhabitants, shall be beaten in their own land, as in the threshing-floor. The threshing-floor is prepared, Babylon is by sin made meet to be a seat of war, and her people, like corn at harvest, are ripe for destruction, Rev. xiv. 16; Mic. iv. 12.

3. It is an unavoidable destruction. Babylon seems to be well fenced and fortified against it; "She dwells upon many waters," ver. 13. The situation of her country is such as that it seems inaccessible, it is so surrounded, and the march of an enemy into it so embarrassed by rivers. In allusion to this, the New Testament Babylon is said to sit upon many waters, that is, to rule over many nations, as the other Babylon did, Rev. xvii. 15. Babylon is abundant in treasures, and yet "thine end is come," and neither thy waters nor thy wealth shall secure thee. This end that comes shall be "the measure of thy covetousness," that is, it shall be the stint of thy gettings; it shall set bounds to thine ambition and avarice, which otherwise had been boundless. God, by the destruction of Babylon, said to its proud waves, "Hitherto shall ye come, and no farther." Note, If men will not set a measure to their covetousness by wisdom and grace, God will set a measure to it by his judgments. Babylon, thinking herself very safe, and very great, was very proud; but she will be deceived, ver. 53. Though Babylon should mount her walls and palaces up to heaven, and though (because what is high is apt to totter) she should take care to "fortify the height of her strength," yet all will not do, God will send spoilers against her, that shall break through her strength, and bring down her height.

4. It is a gradual destruction, which, if they had pleased, they might have foreseen, and had warning of; for, ver. 46, a rumour will come one year, that Cyrus is making vast preparations for war, and after that, in another year, shall come a rumour, that his design is upon Babylon, and he is steering his course that way; so that when he was a great way off they might have sent and desired conditions of peace; but they were too proud, too secure, to do that, and their hearts were hardened to their destruction.

5. Yet when it comes it is a surprising destruction. Babylon is suddenly fallen, ver. 15; the destruction comes upon them when they did not think of it, and is perfected in a little time, as that of the New Testament Babylon in one hour, Rev. xviii. 17. The king of Babylon, who should have been observing the approaches of the enemy, was himself at such a distance from the place where the attack was made, that it was a great while ere he had notice that the city was taken, so that they who were posted near the place sent one messenger, one courier, after another with advice of it, ver. 31. The foot-posts shall meet at the court from several quarters with this intelligence to the king of Babylon, that his city is taken at one end, and there is nothing to obstruct the progress of the conquerors, but they will be at the other end quickly. They are to tell him that the enemy hath seized the passes, ver. 32, the forts, or blockades upon the river; and, having got over the river, they set fire to the reeds, on the river side, to alarm and terrify the city, so that all the men of war are affrighted and have thrown down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. The messengers come like Job's, one upon the heels of another, with these tidings, which are immediately confirmed with a witness, by the enemies being in the palace, and slaying the king himself, Dan. v. 30. And that profane feast which they were celebrating at the very time when the city was taken, which was both an evidence of their strange security and a great advantage to the enemy, seems here to be referred to; ver. 38, 39, "They shall roar together like lions," as men in their revels use to do, when the wine is got into their heads. They call it singing, but in Scripture language, and in the language of sober men, it is called yelling like lions' whelps. It is likely they were drinking confusion to Cyrus and his army, with loud huzzas. Well, saith God, in their heat, when they are inflamed (Isa. v. 11) and their heads are hot with hard drinking, I will make their feasts, I will give them their potion; they have passed their cup round, now "the cup of the Lord's right hand shall be turned unto them," Hab. ii. 15, 16; a cup of fury, which shall make them drunk, that they may rejoice, or rather that they may revel it, and sleep a perpetual sleep. Let them be as merry as they can with that bitter cup, but it shall lay them to sleep never to wake more, as ver. 57; for on that night, in the midst of the jollity, was Belshazzar slain.

6. It is to be a universal destruction. God will make thorough work of it; for, as he will perform what he hath purposed, so he will perfect what he has begun. The slain shall fall in great abundance throughout the land of the Chaldeans; multitudes shall be "thrust through in her streets," ver. 4. They are brought "down like lambs to the slaughter," ver. 40, in such great numbers, so easily, and the enemies make no more of killing them than the butcher doth of killing lambs. The strength of the enemy, and their invading of them, is here compared to an irruption and inundation of waters; ver. 42, "The sea is come up upon Babylon," which, when it has once broke through its bounds, there is no fence against, so that she is covered with the multitude of its waves, —overpowered by a numerous army. Her cities then become a desolation, an uninhabited, uncultivated desert, ver. 43.

7. It is a destruction that shall reach the gods of Babylon, the idols and images, and fall with a particular weight upon them. In token that the whole land shall be confounded, and all her slain shall fall, and that throughout all the country the wounded shall groan, "I will do judgment upon her graven images," ver. 47; and again, ver. 52. All must needs perish, if their gods perish from whom they expect protection. Though the invaders are themselves idolaters, yet they shall destroy the images and temples of the gods of Babylon, as an earnest of the abolishing of all counterfeit deities. Bel was the principal idol that the Babylonians worshipped, and therefore that is by name here marked for destruction; ver. 44, "I will punish Bel," that great devourer, that image to which such abundance of sacrifices are offered, and such rich spoils dedicated, and to whose temple there is such vast resort, he shall disgorge what he has so greedily regaled himself with; God will bring forth out of his temple all the wealth laid up there, Job xx. 15. His altars shall be forsaken, none shall regard him any more, and so that idol, which was thought to be a wall to Babylon, shall fall, and fail them.

8. It shall be a final destruction. You may "take balm for her pain," but in vain; she that would not be healed by the word of God shall not be healed by his providence, ver. 8, 9. Babylon shall become heaps, ver. 37; and, to complete its infamy, no use shall be made even of the ruins of Babylon, so execrable shall they be, and attended with ill omens; ver. 26, "They shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations." People shall not care for having any thing to do with Babylon, or whatever belonged to it. Or it notes, that there shall be nothing left in Babylon on which to ground any hopes or attempts of raising it into a kingdom again; for, as it follows here, it shall be desolate for ever. St. Jerome saith, that in his time, though the ruins of Babylon's wall were to be seen, yet the ground inclosed by them was a forest of wild beasts.

Ninthly. Here is a call to God's people to go out of Babylon. It is their wisdom when the ruin is approaching to quit the city, and retire into the country; ver. 6, "Flee out of the midst of Babylon," and get into some remote corner, that you may save your lives, and may not be cut off in her iniquity. When God's judgments are abroad it is good to get as far as we can from those against whom they are levelled, as Israel from the tents of Korah. This agrees with the advice Christ gave his disciples, with reference to the destruction of Jerusalem: "Let them which be in Judæa flee to the mountains," Mat. xxiv. 16. It is their wisdom to get out of the midst of Babylon, lest they be involved, if not in her ruins, yet in her fears; ver. 45, 46, "Lest your heart faint, and ye fear for the rumour that shall be heard in the land." Though God told them that Cyrus should be their deliverer, and Babylon's destruction their deliverance, yet they had been told also that in the peace thereof they should have peace, and therefore the alarms given to Babylon would put them into a fright, and perhaps they might not have faith and consideration enough to suppress those fears, for which reason they are here advised to get out of the hearing of the alarms. Note, Those who have not grace enough to keep their temper in temptation should have wisdom enough to keep out of the way of temptation. But this is not all: it is not only their wisdom to quit the city when the ruin is approaching, but it is their duty to quit the country too when the ruin is accomplished, and they are set at liberty by the pulling down of the prison over their heads. This they are told, ver. 50, 51: Ye Israelites that have escaped the sword of the Chaldeans your oppressors, and of the Persians their destroyers, now the year of release is come, "go away, stand not still," hasten to your own country again, however you may be comfortably seated in Babylon; for this is not your rest, but Canaan is.

1. He puts them in mind of the inducements they had to return. "Remember the Lord afar off," his presence with you now, though you are here afar off from your native soil; his presence with your fathers formerly in the temple, though you are now afar off from the ruins of it. Note, Wherever we are, in the greatest depths, at the greatest distances, we may and must remember the Lord our God; and in the time of the greatest fears and hopes it is seasonable to remember the Lord. And "let Jerusalem come into your mind;" though it be now in ruins, yet favour its dust, Ps. cii. 14; though few of you ever saw it, yet believe the report you have had concerning it from those that wept when they remembered Zion; and think of Jerusalem until you come to a resolution to make the best of your way thither. Note, When the city of our solemnities is out of sight, yet it must not be out of mind; and it will be of great use to us, in our journey through this world, to let the heavenly Jerusalem come often into our mind.

2. He takes notice of the discouragement which the returning captives labour under, ver. 51. Being minded of Jerusalem, they cry out, "We are confounded," we cannot bear the thought of it, shame covers our faces at the mention of it, for we have heard of the reproach of the sanctuary, that it is profaned and ruined by strangers; how can we think of it with any pleasure? To which he answers, ver. 52, that the God of Israel will now triumph over the gods of Babylon, and so that reproach will be for ever rolled away. Note, The believing prospect of Jerusalem's recovery will keep us from being ashamed of Jerusalem's ruins.

Tenthly. Here is the different resentment of Babylon's fall, and it is the same we have of the New Testament Babylon, Rev. xviii. 9, 19. 1. Some shall lament the destruction of Babylon. There is the "sound of a cry," a great outcry coming from Babylon, ver. 54, lamenting this great destruction, the voice of mourning, because the Lord hath destroyed the voice of the multitude, that great voice of mirth which used to be heard in Babylon, ver. 55. We are told what they shall say in their lamentation, ver. 41. "How is Sheshach taken!" and how are we mistaken concerning her! How is that city surprised and become an astonishment among the nations, that was the praise, and glory, and admiration of the whole earth! See how that may fall into a general contempt which has been universally cried up. 2. Yet some shall rejoice in Babylon's fall, not as it is the misery of their fellow creatures, but as it is the manifestation of the righteous judgments of God, and as it opens the way for the release of God's captives; upon these accounts the heaven and earth, and all that is in both, "shall sing for Babylon," ver. 48; the church in heaven, and the church on earth, shall give to God the glory of his righteousness, and take notice of it with thankfulness to his praise. Babylon's ruin is Zion's praise.

59 The word which Jeremiah the prophet commanded Seraiah the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, when he went with Zedekiah the king of Judah into Babylon in the fourth year of his reign. And this Seraiah was a quiet prince. 60 So Jeremiah wrote in a book all the evil that should come upon Babylon, even all these words that are written against Babylon. 61 And Jeremiah said to Seraiah, When thou comest to Babylon, and shalt see, and shalt read all these words; 62 Then shalt thou say, O LORD, thou hast spoken against this place, to cut it off, that none shall remain in it, neither man nor beast, but that it shall be desolate for ever. 63 And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates: 64 And thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her: and they shall be weary. Thus far are the words of Jeremiah.

We have been long attending the judgment of Babylon in this and the foregoing chapter, now here we have the conclusion of the whole matter.

1. A copy is taken of this prophecy, it should seem by Jeremiah himself, for Baruch his scribe is not mentioned here; ver. 60, Jeremiah wrote in a book all these words that are here written against Babylon. He received this notice that he might give it to all whom it might concern. It is of great advantage both to the propagating and to the perpetuating of the word of God to have it written, and to have copies taken of the law, prophets, and epistles.

2. It is sent to Babylon, to the captives there, by the hand of Seraiah, who went thither attendant on, or ambassador for, king Zedekiah, in the fourth year of his reign; ver. 59, He went with Zedekiah, or, as the margin reads it, on the behalf of Zedekiah, into Babylon. The character given of him is observable, that this Seraiah was a quiet prince, a prince of rest; he was in honour and power, but not as most of the princes then were, hot and heady, making parties and heading factions, and driving things furiously, but was of a calm temper, studied the things that made for peace, endeavoured to preserve a good understanding between the king his master and the king of Babylon, and to keep his master from rebelling. He was no persecutor of God's prophets, but a moderate man. Zedekiah was happy in the choice of such a man to be his envoy to the king of Babylon, and Jeremiah might safely intrust such a man with his errand too. Note, It is the real honour of great men to be quiet men; it is the wisdom of princes to put such men into places of trust.

3. Seraiah is desired to read it to his countrymen that were already gone into captivity. When thou shalt come to Babylon, and shalt see what a magnificent place it is, how large a city, how strong, how rich, and how well fortified, and shalt therefore be tempted to think, Sure it will stand for ever, as the disciples, when they observed the buildings of the temple, concluded nothing would throw them down but the end of the world, Mat. xxiv. 23, then thou shalt read all these words, to thyself, and thy particular friends, for their encouragement in their captivity; let them with an eye of faith see to the end of these threatening powers, and comfort themselves and one another herewith.

4. He is directed to make a solemn protestation of the Divine authority and unquestionable certainty of that which he had read; ver. 62, Then shalt thou look up to God and say, O Lord, it is thou that hast spoken against this place to cut it off. This is like the angel's protestation (Rev. xix. 9) concerning the destruction of the New Testament Babylon: "These are the true sayings of God." And, Rev. xxi. 6, "These words are true and faithful." Though Seraiah sees Babylon flourishing, having read this prophecy, he must foresee Babylon falling; and by virtue of it must curse its habitation, though it be taking root, Job v. 3. "O Lord, thou hast spoken against this place," and I believe what thou hast spoken, that as thou knowest every thing, so thou canst do every thing. Thou hast passed sentence upon Babylon, and it shall be executed. Thou hast spoken against this place to cut it off, and therefore we will neither envy its pomp nor fear its power. When we see what this world is, how glittering its shows are, and how flattering its proposals, let us read in the book of the Lord that its fashion passeth away, and it shall shortly be cut off, and be desolate for ever, and we shall learn to look upon it with a holy contempt. Observe here, When we have been reading the word of God, it becomes us to direct to him, whose word it is, an humble believing acknowledgment of the truth, equity, and goodness of what we have read.

5. He must then tie a stone to the book, and throw it into the midst of the river Euphrates, as a confirming sign of the things contained in it, saying, "Thus shall Babylon sink, and not rise, for they shall be weary;" they shall perfectly succumb, as men tired with a burthen, under the load of the evil that I will bring upon them, which they shall never shake off, or get from under, ver. 63, 64. In the sign, it was the stone that sank the book, which otherwise would have swam, but in the thing signified, it was rather the book that sank the stone; it was the Divine sentence passed upon Babylon in this prophecy that sank that city, which seemed as firm as a stone. The fall of the New Testament Babylon is represented by something like this, but much more magnificent; Rev. xviii. 21, A mighty angel cast a great millstone into the sea, saying, Thus shall Babylon fall. Those that sink under the weight of God's wrath and curse sink irrecoverably. The last words of the chapter seal up the vision and prophecy of this book, "Thus far are the words of Jeremiah;" not that this prophecy against Babylon was the last of his prophecies, for it was dated in the fourth year of Zedekiah, ver. 59, long before he finished his testimony, but this is recorded last of his prophecies, because it was to be the last accomplished of all his prophecies against the Gentiles, ch. xlvi. 1; and the chapter which remains is purely historical, and, as some think, was added by some other hand.

CHAPTER LII.

History is the best expositor of prophecy; and therefore, for the better understanding of the prophecies of this book, which relate to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the kingdom of Judah, we are here furnished with an account of that sad event. It is much the same with the history we had, 2 Kin. xxiv. and xxv., and many of the particulars we had before in that book; but the matter is here repeated and put together to give light to the book of the Lamentations, which follows next, and to serve as a key to it. That article in the close concerning the advancement of Jehoiachin in his captivity, which happened after Jeremiah's time, gives colour to their conjecture who suppose that this chapter was not written by Jeremiah himself, but by some men Divinely inspired among those in captivity, for a constant memorandum to those who in Babylon preferred Jerusalem above their chief joy. In this chapter we have, I. The ill reign of Zedekiah, very ill in regard both of sin and punishment, ver. 1—3. II. The besieging and taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, ver. 4—7. III. The severe usage which Zedekiah and the princes met with, ver. 8—11. IV. The destruction of the temple and the city, ver. 12—14. V. The captivity of the people, ver. 15, 16; and the numbers of those that were carried away into captivity, ver. 28—30. VI. The carrying off of the plunder of the temple, ver. 17—23. VII. The slaughter of the priests, and some other great men in cold blood, ver. 24—27. VIII. The better days which king Jehoiachin lived to see in the latter end of his time, after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 31—34.

ZEDEKIAH was one and twenty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Hamutal the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah. 2 And he did that which was evil in the eyes of the LORD, according to all that Jehoiakim had done. 3 For through the anger of the LORD it came to pass in Jerusalem and Judah, till he had cast them out from his presence, that Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon. 4 And it came to pass in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came, he and all his army, against Jerusalem, and pitched against it, and built forts against it round about. 5 So the city was besieged unto the eleventh year of king Zedekiah. 6 And in the fourth month, in the ninth day of the month, the famine was sore in the city, so that there was no bread for the people of the land. 7 Then the city was broken up, and all the men of war fled, and went forth out of the city by night by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden; (now the Chaldeans were by the city round about:) and they went by the way of the plain. 8 But the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho; and all his army were scattered from him. 9 Then they took the king, and carried him up unto the king of Babylon to Riblah in the land of Hamath; where he gave judgment upon him. 10 And the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes: he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah. 11 Then he put out the eyes of Zedekiah; and the king of Babylon bound him in chains, and carried him to Babylon, and put him in prison till the day of his death.

This narrative begins no higher than the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, though there were two captivities before, one in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the other in the first of Jeconiah; but probably it was drawn up by some of those that were carried away with Zedekiah, as a reproach to themselves for imagining that they should not go into captivity after their brethren, with which hopes they had long flattered themselves. We have here,

First. God's just displeasure against Judah and Jerusalem for their sin, ver. 3. His anger was against them to that degree that he determined to cast them out from his presence, his favourable, gracious presence, as a father when he is extremely angry with an undutiful son, bids him get out of his presence. He expelled them from that good land that had such tokens of his presence in providential bounty, and that holy city and temple that had such tokens of his presence in covenant grace and love. Note, Those that are banished from God's ordinances have reason to complain that they are in some degree cast out of his presence; yet none are cast out from God's gracious presence but those that by sin have first thrown themselves out of it. This fruit of sin we should therefore deprecate above any thing, as David, Ps. li. 11, "Cast me not away from thy presence."

Secondly. Zedekiah's ill conduct and management, to which God left him in displeasure against the people, and for which God punished him in displeasure against him. Zedekiah was arrived to years of discretion; when he came to the throne he was twenty-one years old, ver. 1. He was none of the worst of the kings; we never read of his idolatries, yet his character is, that he "did evil in the eyes of the Lord," for he did not do the good he should have done. But that ill deed of his which did in a special manner hasten this destruction was his rebelling against the king of Babylon, which was both his sin and his folly, and brought ruin upon his people, not only meritoriously, but efficiently. God was greatly displeased with him for his perfidious dealing with the king of Babylon, as we find, Eze. xvii. 15, &c.; and, because he was angry at Judah and Jerusalem, he put him into the hand of his own counsels to do that foolish thing which proved fatal to him and to his kingdom.

Thirdly. The possession which the Chaldeans at length gained of Jerusalem after eighteen months' siege. They sat down before it and blocked it up in the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, in the tenth month, ver. 4, and made themselves masters of it in the eleventh year, in the fourth month, ver. 6. In remembrance of these two steps toward their ruin, while they were in captivity, they kept a fast in the fourth month, and a fast in the tenth, Zec. viii. 19. That in the fifth month was in remembrance of the burning of the temple, and that in the seventh of the murder of Gedaliah. We may easily imagine, or rather cannot imagine, what a sad time it was with Jerusalem, during this year and half that it was besieged, when all provisions were cut off from coming to them, and they were ever and anon alarmed by the attacks of the enemy; and being obstinately resolved to hold out to the last extremity, nothing remained but a certain fearful looking for of judgment. That which disabled them to hold out, and yet could not prevail with them to capitulate, was the famine in the city; ver. 6, "there was no bread for the people of the land," so that the soldiers could not make good their posts, but were rendered wholly unserviceable. And then no wonder that the city was broken up, ver. 7. Walls in such a case will not hold out long without men, no more than men without walls; nor will both together stand people in any stead without God and his protection.

Fourthly. The inglorious retreat of the king and his mighty men. They got out of the city by night, ver. 7, and made the best of their way, I know not whither, nor perhaps they themselves. But the king was overtaken by the pursuers in the plains of Jericho, and his guards dispersed, and all his army scattered from him, ver. 8. His fright was not causeless, for where there is guilt there will be fear in time of danger. But his flight was fruitless, for there is no escaping the judgments of God; they will come upon the sinner, and will overtake him, let him flee where he will, Deu. xxviii. 15; and these judgments particularly that are here executed were there threatened, ver. 52, 53, &c.

Fifthly. The sad doom passed upon Zedekiah by the king of Babylon, and immediately put in execution. He treated him as a rebel, "gave judgment upon him," ver. 9. One cannot think of it without the utmost vexation and regret, that a king, a king of Judah, a king of the house of David, should be arraigned as a criminal at the bar of this heathen king. But he "humbled not himself before Jeremiah the prophet," therefore God thus humbled him. Pursuant to the sentence passed upon him by the haughty conqueror, his sons were slain before his eyes, and all the princes of Judah, ver. 10; then his eyes were put out, and he was bound in chains, carried in triumph to Babylon. Perhaps they made sport with him, as they did with Samson, when his eyes were put out; however, he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, wearing out the remainder of his life (I cannot say his days, for he saw day no more,) in darkness and misery; he was kept in prison until the day of his death, but had some honour done him at his funeral, ch. xxxiv. 5. Jeremiah had often told him what it would come to, but he would not take warning when he might have prevented it.

12 Now in the fifth month, in the tenth day of the month, which was the nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, which served the king of Babylon, into Jerusalem, 13 And burned the house of the LORD, and the king's house; and all the houses of Jerusalem, and all the houses of the great men, burned he with fire: 14 And all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of the guard, brake down all the walls of Jerusalem round about. 15 Then Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive certain of the poor of the people, and the residue of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to the king of Babylon, and the rest of the multitude. 16 But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left certain of the poor of the land for vinedressers and for husbandmen. 17 Also the pillars of brass that were in the house of the LORD, and the bases, and the brasen sea that was in the house of the LORD, the Chaldeans brake, and carried all the brass of them to Babylon. 18 The caldrons also, and the shovels, and the snuffers, and the bowls, and the spoons, and all the vessels of brass wherewith they ministered, took they away. 19 And the basons, and the fire-pans, and the bowls, and the caldrons, and the candlesticks, and the spoons, and the cups; that which was of gold in gold, and that which was of silver in silver, took the captain of the guard away. 20 The two pillars, one sea, and twelve brasen bulls that were under the bases, which king Solomon had made in the house of the LORD: the brass of all these vessels was without weight. 21 And concerning the pillars, the height of one pillar was eighteen cubits; and a fillet of twelve cubits did compass it; and the thickness thereof was four fingers: it was hollow. 22 And a chapiter of brass was upon it; and the height of one chapiter was five cubits, with network and pomegranates upon the chapiters round about, all of brass. The second pillar also and the pomegranates were like unto these. 23 And there were ninety and six pomegranates on a side; and all the pomegranates upon the network were an hundred round about.

We have here an account of the woful havoc that was made by the Chaldean army, a month after the city was taken, under the command of Nebuzar-adan, who was "captain of the guard," or general of the army in this action. In the margin he is called the 'chief of the slaughtermen,' or executioners; for soldiers are but slaughtermen, and God employs them as executioners of his sentence against a sinful people. Nebuzar-adan was chief of those soldiers; but in the execution he did we have reason to fear he had no eye to God, but he served the king of Babylon and his own designs. Now he came into Jerusalem, into the very bowels of it, as captain of the slaughtermen there. And, 1. He laid the temple in ashes, having first plundered it of every thing that was valuable; he "burnt the house of the Lord," that holy and beautiful house, where their fathers praised him, Isa. lxiv. 10. 2. He burnt the royal palace, probably that which Solomon built, after he had built the temple, which was ever since the king's house. 3. He burnt "all the houses of Jerusalem," that is, all the houses of the great men, or, those particularly; if any escaped, it was only some sorry cottages, for the poor of the land. 4. "He brake down all the walls of Jerusalem," to be revenged upon them for standing in the way of his army so long; thus of a defenced city was made a ruin, Isa. xxv. 2. 5. He carried away many into captivity, ver. 15. He took away "certain of the poor of the people," that is, of the people in the city; for the poor of the land, that is, the poor of the country, he left for vinedressers and husbandmen. He also carried off "the residue of the people that remained in the city," that had escaped the sword and famine; and the deserters, such as he thought fit, or rather such as God thought fit, for he had already determined some for the pestilence, some for the sword, some for the famine, and some for captivity, ch. xv. 2.

But nothing is more particularly and largely related here, than the carrying away of the appurtenances of the temple. All that were of great value were carried away before, the vessels of silver and gold; yet some of that sort remained, which were now carried away, ver. 19. But most of the temple prey that was now seized was of brass, which, being of less value, was carried off last. When the gold was gone, the brass soon went after, because the people repented not, according to Jeremiah's prediction, ch. xxvii. 19, &c. When the walls of the city were demolished, the pillars of the temple were pulled down too, and both in token that God, who was the strength and stay both of their civil and their ecclesiastical government, was departed from them. No walls can protect those, nor pillars sustain those from whom God withdraws. These pillars of the temple were not for support, (for there was nothing built upon them,) but for ornament and significancy. They were called Jachin, 'he will establish;' and Boaz, 'in him is strength;' so that the breaking of these signified that God would no longer establish his house, nor be the strength of it. These pillars are here very particularly described, ver. 21—23, from 1 Kin. vii. 15, that the extraordinary beauty and stateliness of them may affect us the more with the demolishing of them. All the vessels that belonged to the brazen altar were carried away; for the iniquity of Jerusalem, like that of Eli's house, was not to be purged by sacrifice or offering, 1 Sam. iii. 14. It is said, ver. 20, "The brass of all these vessels was without weight;" so it was in the making of them, 1 Kin. vii. 47; the weight of the brass was not then found out, 2 Chr. iv. 18. And so it was in the destroying of them; those that made spoil of them did not stand to weigh them as purchasers do, for, whatever they weighed, it was all their own.

24 And the captain of the guard took Seraiah the chief priest, and Zephaniah the second priest, and the three keepers of the door: 25 He took also out of the city an eunuch, which had the charge of the men of war; and seven men of them that were near the king's person, which were found in the city; and the principal scribe of the host, who mustered the people of the land; and threescore men of the people of the land, that were found in the midst of the city. 26 So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard took them, and brought them to the king of Babylon to Riblah. 27 And the king of Babylon smote them, and put them to death in Riblah in the land of Hamath. Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his own land. 28 This is the people whom Nebuchadrezzar carried away captive: in the seventh year three thousand Jews and three and twenty: 29 In the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar he carried away captive from Jerusalem eight hundred thirty and two persons: 30 In the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive of the Jews seven hundred forty and five persons: all the persons were four thousand and six hundred.

We have here a very melancholy account,

First. Of the slaughter of some great men in cold blood at Riblah, seventy-two in number, according to the number of the elders of Israel, Num. xi. 26, 27, so they are computed, 2 Kin. xxv. 18, 19, five out of the temple, two out of the city, five out of the court, and sixty out of the country. The account here agrees with that, except in one article: there it is said there were five, here there were seven, of those that were near the king; which Dr. Lightfoot reconciles thus, that he took away seven of those that were near the king, but two of them were Jeremiah himself and Ebed-melech, but they were both discharged, as we have read before; so that there were only five of them put to death, and so the number was reduced to seventy-two; some of all ranks, for they had all corrupted their way. And it is probable such were made examples of as had been most forward to excite and promote the rebellion against the king of Babylon. Seraiah the chief priest is put first, whose sacred character could not exempt him from this stroke; how should it, when he himself had profaned it by sin? Seraiah the prince was a quiet prince, ch. li. 59, but perhaps Seraiah the priest was not so, but unquiet and turbulent, by which he had made himself obnoxious to the king of Babylon. The leaders of this people had caused them to err, and now they are in a particular manner made monuments of Divine justice.

Secondly. Of the captivity of the rest. Come and see how "Judah was carried away captive out of his own land;" ver. 27, and how it spewed them out, as it spewed out the Canaanites that went before them, which God had told them it would certainly do, if they trod in their steps, and copied out their abominations, Lev. xviii. 28. Now here is an account,

1. Of two captivities, which we had an account of before, one in the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, the same with that which is said to be in his eighth year, 2 Kin. xxiv. 12, another in his eighteenth year, the same with that which is said, ver. 12, to be in his nineteenth year. But the sums here are very small, in comparison with what we find expressed concerning the former, 2 Kin. xxiv. 14, 16, when there were eighteen thousand carried captive, whereas here they are said to be three thousand and twenty-three; and with what we may reasonably suppose concerning the latter: for when all the residue of the people were carried away, ver. 15, one would think there should be more than eight hundred and thirty-two souls. Therefore Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that, these accounts being joined to the story of the putting to death of the great men at Riblah, all that were here said to be carried away were put to death as rebels.

2. Of a third captivity not mentioned before, which was in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, four years after the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 30. Then Nebuzar-adan came and carried away seven hundred and forty-five Jews. It is probable this was done in revenge of the murder of Gedaliah, which was another rebellion against the king of Babylon, and that these who were now taken were aiders and abetters of Ishmael in that murder, and were not only carried away, but put to death for it; yet this is uncertain. If this be the sum total of the captives which we have, ver. 30, "All the persons were four thousand and six hundred," we may see how strangely they were reduced from what they had been, and may wonder as much how they came to be so numerous again as afterwards we find them; for, it should seem that, as at first in Egypt, so again in Babylon, the Lord made them fruitful in the land of their affliction; and the more they were oppressed the more they multiplied. And the truth is, these people were often miracles both of judgment and mercy.

31 And it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, in the five and twentieth day of the month, that Evil-merodach king of Babylon in the first year of his reign lifted up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah, and brought him forth out of prison, 32 And spake kindly unto him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon, 33 And changed his prison garments: and he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life. 34 And for his diet, there was a continual diet given him of the king of Babylon, every day a portion until the day of his death, all the days of his life.

This passage of story concerning the reviving which king Jehoiachin had in his bondage, we had likewise before, 2 Kin. xxv. 27—30, only there it is said to be done on the twenty-fifth day of the twelfth month, here on the twenty-seventh; but in a thing of this nature two days breaks no squares in the account. It is probable the orders were given for his release on the twenty-fifth day, but he was not presented to the king till the twenty-seventh. We may observe in this story,

First. That new lords make new laws. Nebuchadnezzar had long kept this unhappy prince in prison; and his son, though well affected to the prisoner, could not procure him any favour, nor one smile from his father, any more than Jonathan could for David from his father; but when the old peevish man was dead his son countenanced Jehoiachin, and made him a favourite. It is common for children to undo what their fathers have done; it were well if it were always as much for the better as this here.

Secondly. That the world we live in is a changing world. Jehoiachin in his beginning fell from a throne to a prison; but here he is advanced again to a throne of state, ver. 32, though not to a throne of power. As before the robes were changed into prison garments, so now they were converted into robes again. Such chequer-work is this world; prosperity and adversity are set the one over against the other, that we may learn to rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

Thirdly. That though the night of affliction be very long, yet we must not despair but that the day may dawn at last. Jehoiachin was thirty-seven years a prisoner, in confinement, in contempt, ever since he was eighteen years old; in which time we may suppose him so inured to captivity that he had forgotten the sweets of liberty; or, rather, that after so long an imprisonment it would be doubly welcome to him. Let those whose afflictions have been lengthened out encourage themselves with this instance; the vision will at the end speak comfortably, and therefore wait for it. Dum spiro spero,—'while there is life there is hope;' non si male nunc, et olim sic erit,—'though now we suffer, we shall not always suffer.'

Fourthly. That God can make his people to find favour in the eyes of those that are their oppressors, and unaccountably turn their hearts to pity them, according to that word; Ps. cvi. 46, "He made them to be pitied of all those that carried them captives." He can bring those that have spoken roughly to speak kindly, and those to feed his people that have fed upon them. Those, therefore, that are under oppression will find that it is not in vain to hope, and quietly to wait, for the salvation of the Lord. Therefore our times are in God's hand, because the hearts of all we deal with are so.

And now upon the whole matter, comparing the prophecy and the history of this book together, we may learn in general, 1. That it is no new thing for churches and persons highly dignified to degenerate and become very corrupt. 2. That iniquity tends to the ruin of those that harbour it; and if it be not repented of and forsaken, will certainly end in their ruin. 3. That external professions and privileges will not only not amount to an excuse for sin, and an exemption from ruin, but will be a very great aggravation of both. 4. That no word of God shall fall to the ground, but the event will fully answer the prediction; and the unbelief of man shall not make God's threatenings, any more than his promises, of none effect. The justice and truth of God are here written in bloody characters, for the conviction or the confusion of all those that make a jest of his threatenings. Let them not be deceived, God is not mocked.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF JEREMIAH.

CHAP. I.—4. The word of the Lord came. This seems to have been a visible appearance of the Divine majesty,—by the Son of God or the second person of the blessed Trinity, Gen. viii. 2; Jos. v. 13; Eze. i. 26; Dan. viii. 15, 18; x. 6, 10. —Lowth.

CHAP. II.—22. Nitre. See Supplementary Note on Pr. xxv. 20.

CHAP. III.—12. Mine anger to fall. 'I will not look down upon you with a lowering brow.' Literally, 'I will not let my countenance fall upon you.' So when Cain was wroth, it is said, that "his countenance fell," Gen. iv. 5. On the contrary, the lifting up of the countenance upon any person denotes favour and goodwill towards him, Num. vi. 26.—Blaney.

CHAP. IV.—17. As keepers of a field. Returning in the evening through the fields of melons, we disturbed 'the keepers of a field,' the same as those mentioned by the prophet. A rude shed made of four upright poles, that supported a covering of twined branches, protected from the weather an old decrepid Arab, who sat watching against any intrusion that might be made by man or beast upon his field.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative. (See wood engraving, Job xxvii. 18.)

CHAP. VI.—6. Cast a mount, rendered in the margin, engine of shot, and probably resembling those spoken of 2 Kin. xxv. and 2 Chr. xxvi., (where see wood engravings,) as the balistæ and catapultæ of the Romans. 20. Sweet cane. The sweet cane, or calamus aromaticus, is a reed of a very fragrant smell, which, when dried and powdered, is mixed in the richest perfumes. 27. A tower—a fortress. 'I have appointed thee to make an essay among my people as to the gold thereof.'—Blayney. This agrees with the context, and he considers that the images of a tower and fortress are wrongly introduced by the translators.—Religious Tract Society's Bible. 28. Grievous revolters. 'They are all of them the dross of revolters, passing with a fraudulent currency. Brass and iron all of them; instruments of adulteration are they.'—Blayney.

CHAP. VII.—12. Shiloh—see what I did to it. The words of the prophet are still full of meaning. It was visited by Dr. Wilson in 1843, who describes it as a heap of ruins.—Lands of the Bible, vol. ii. 294. 18. Queen of heaven. See Supplementary Note on ch. xliv. 19.

CHAP. IX.—17. Mourning women. Near sunset, we had the opportunity of witnessing the funeral of an old Jewess at Lemberg.—Arriving at a small portico or covered walk in the grave-yard, they set down the bier, and uncovered the face of the dead. All the relations gathered round, and bending over the corpse till their lips almost touched the lips of the deceased, entreated her to forgive them, if they had injured her in any way. After this they proceeded to the grave, and the body alone was lowered down into it with the face uncovered. Several of the women now joined in a loud and bitter wail, but their tears and lamentations were only feigned, for at one time they appeared very lugubrious, then, all of a sudden, they stopped and began to scold, or appeared utterly careless. They were specimens of "the mourning women" mentioned in the Scriptures: see Jer. ix. 17; Mat. xi. 17.—Bonar and M'Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. X.—9, 10. But the Lord is the true God. The contrast is very expressive and instructive between the most expensive and most richly ornamented dead images and "the living and true God, the everlasting King, or King of eternity; at whose wrath the earth doth tremble, and the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation." They (the idols) are 'indebted to the art and labour of man for all their costly ornaments, their splendid outward show. Upon what ground, then, could the thing formed pretend to a nature more excellent than its former!'—Blayney. Where, but in the Scriptures, do we meet with such sublime and rational thoughts concerning the great Creator and Lord of all? The very circumstance that the Bible, and the Bible alone, has established the doctrine of one God of infinite perfection, to the exclusion of all others, who have been or are called God, or have been or are worshipped, is a very convincing argument to a considerate mind, that it is the word of the one living and true God himself.—T. Scott.

CHAP. XIII.—22. Thy skirts discovered, and thy heels made bare. 'I have often been struck with the manner in which a great man sits; for example, when I visited the bashaw, I never saw his feet: they were entirely drawn up under him and covered by his dress. This was dignified. To see his feet his skirts must have been discovered: still more so in order to see the heels, which often serve as the actual seat of an oriental.'—Jowett's Christian Researches.

CHAP. XVI.—7. Neither shall men tear themselves. Commentators prefer the marginal reading, 'break bread for them,' which may refer to the practice of carrying provisions to the house of mourning, probably because the survivors might neglect to prepare food for themselves: see Job xlii. 11; Eze. xxiv. 17. The cup of consolation. Sir J. Chardin says, the custom is still preserved among the oriental Christians, who drink the health of the survivors.—Domestic Bible, by the Rev. Ingram Cobbin. (See wood engraving.) 19, 21. The Gentiles. The prophet, hearing intimations of mercy, addressed the Lord as his Strength, and Fortress, and Refuge. He had revealed to his other prophets, and to him, that he would assuredly call the Gentiles from all the ends of the earth; when they would renounce the idolatry of their fathers, as unprofitable lies and vanity, to worship the God of Israel. The fact now undeniable, that the Gentiles, through so large a part of the world, have actually renounced their idols, to worship, in profession at least, the God of Israel, (that despised nation,) is most wonderful, when compared with the state of things at the time when Jeremiah wrote this remarkable prediction.—T. Scott.

CHAP. XVII.—13-27. O Lord, the hope of Israel—sabbath day. God is the hope of Israel, the hope of believers, and called in Rom. xv. 13, the "God of hope." The fountain of living waters is an expression peculiar to Jeremiah, who is fertile both in terms and sayings of most important significancy. The Lord was the object of his praise; but he was held in great discredit and disrepute by his countrymen. He pleads the matter with God: he had not hasted beyond the pace of a mere follower; he had not outrun God's message. It was not any desire of mine that these tidings of evil should take effect. Be not thou therefore a terror to me, as the offended Jews are. Be thou my refuge from them, and let them be confounded. He utters against them the maledictions of a prophet, but still even then they were not conclusively given over. They are bidden to observe the sabbath, or perhaps were bidden some time before, and with the encouragement of a promise would they but obey. But they did not, and the promise was made void by themselves, and thus they brought on their own destruction. What testimonies for the sabbath from both Isaiah and Jeremiah—and that by prophets who spake of the comparative worthlessness of rites!—Dr. Chalmers' posthumous work, Horæ Biblicæ.

CHAP. XXII.—20. From the passages; in the original, from Abarim. The sight of this mountain scene (a view from the summit of mount Olivet) reminded us of a passage in Jeremiah, the force of which is lost in our version, but which had peculiar meaning when uttered in Jerusalem. It is in reference to the death of Jehoiakim, the son of pious Josiah, and the desolation that followed, "Go up to Lebanon and cry; and lift up thy voice in Bashan, and cry from Abarim; for all thy lovers are destroyed." The cry of woe is first uttered from the heights of Lebanon, the northern boundary of the land; it is echoed back from Bashan the eastern range; and then it resounds from Abarim, the mountains of Moab, seen so distinctly from Jerusalem. In this way the tidings of distress are carried from Lebanon to Bashan, from Bashan to Abarim, and from the Abarim hills to the capital itself.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. XXIII.—8. They shall dwell in their own land. This and many passages in the prophecies of Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and in other parts of Scripture, have been considered by not a few authors as pointing out the national restoration of the Jews from their present dispersion to their own land. Mr. Scott, the commentator, thus summed up his own views on the subject, in his work on the Restoration of Israel. He says,—'It is now becoming more and more the opinion of serious Christians, that when Israel shall be converted to their long-rejected Messiah, they will be gathered from their dispersions, and reinstated in their own land; which being rendered as fertile as in times past, (perhaps much more so,) and extended to the utmost limits of the grants made to the patriarchs, will yield them in rich abundance all things needful and comfortable for this present life. It is also thought that they will live in this land under rulers of their own nation, as the vicegerents of the Messiah, of David, or the Son of David, in entire peace and security, free from invader or oppressor, and from the fear of any; and that, along with all spiritual blessings in rich abundance, they will be voluntarily regarded by all other nations, then truly converted, with peculiar love, and gratitude, and honour, as the source of all their spiritual blessings, and especially as most nearly related to their common Messiah and Saviour, who is the light of the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel.'

'A general idea,' says the Rev. E. Bickersteth, in his Practical Guide to the Prophecies, 'of the expectations of many students of prophecy which have been entertained for a lengthened period, may be gathered from a collection of promises concerning the calling of the Jews and the glory which shall be in the latter days, taken from Powel's Concordance, published in 1673. It is referred to by Doddridge in his Lectures on Divinity.'

I. The Jews shall be gathered from all parts of the earth where they are now scattered, and brought into their own land.

For this see Isa. xi. 11; xxvii. 12, 13; xliii. 5, 6; xlix. 11, 12; lx. 4. Compare Jer. iii. 18; xvi. 14, 15; xxiii. 3; xxx. 10; xxxi. 7, 8, 10; xxxii. 37. So Hos. xi. 10, 11; Zeph. iii. 10; Zec. viii. 7, 8; x. 8, 9, 10.

II. They shall be carried by the Gentiles to their place, who shall join themselves with the Jews, and become the Lord's people.

Isa. xlix. 22; xiv. 2; lx. 9; lxvi. 18, 20; and ii. 2, 3, 4. Compare Jer. iii. 17; xvi. 19; Eze. xlvii. 22, 23; Mic. v. 3; Zec. ii. 11; viii. 20.

III. Great miracles shall be wrought when Israel is restored, as formerly when they were brought out of Egypt, viz.

1. Drying up the river Euphrates. Isa. xi. 15, 16; Zec. x. 11; Rev. xvi. 12; Hos. xi. 15; Mic. vii. 15.

2. Causing rivers to flow in desert places. Isa. xli. 17, 18, 19; xliii. 19, 20; xlviii. 20, 21.

3. Giving them prophets. Isa. lxvi. 18, 19, 20, 21; Hos. xii. 9, 10.

4. The Lord Christ himself shall appear at the head of them. Isa. xxxv. 8; lii. 12; lviii. 8; Hos. i. 10, 11; Mic. ii. 12, 13.

IV. The Jews, being restored, and converted to the faith of Christ, shall be formed into a state, and have judges and counsellors over them as formerly; the Lord Christ himself being their king, who shall then also be acknowledged King over all the earth.

Isa. i. 26; lx. 17. Compare Jer. xxiii. 4; xxx. 8, 9, 21; Hos. iii. 5; Eze. xxxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 24, 25; Isa. liv. 5; Oba. 21; Zec. xiv. 5, 9; Ps. xxii. 27, 28.

V. They shall have the victory over all their enemies, and all kings and nations of the earth shall submit unto them.

For which see Isa. xi. 13, 14; xiv. 1, 2; xli. 14, 15, 16; xlix. 23; lx. 12; xxv. 10, 11, 12; Joel iii. 7, 8, 19, 20; Oba. 17, 18; Mic. iv. 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13; v. 5, 6, 7; vii. 16, 17; Zec. ii. 13; ix. 13, 14, 15, 16; ix. 5, 6; xii. 6; Num. xxiv. 17; Isa. xlix. 23; lx. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16; lxvi. 19, 20.

VI. The Jews, restored, shall live peaceably, without being divided into two nations, or contending with one another any more.

Isa. xi. 13, 14; xiv. 1, 2; Jer. iii. 18; l. 4; Eze. xxxvii. 21, 22; Hos. i. 11.

1. They shall be very numerous, and multiply greatly. Isa. xxvii. 6; xliv. 3, 4; xlix. 18, 19, 20, 21; liv. 1, 2, 3; lxi. 9; Jer. xxiii. 3; xxx. 18, 19, 20; xxxi. 27; Eze. xxxiv. 11; xxxvi. 38, 39.

2. They shall have great peace, safety, and outward temporal prosperity. Isa. xxxii. 16, 17, 18; xxxiii. 24; liv. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17; lx. 18, 21; Jer. xxiii. 3, 4, 5, 6; xxx. 10; xxxii. 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40; xxxiii. 6, 7, 8, 9; l. 19, 20; Joel iii. 17, 18; Mic. vii. 18, 19, 20; Zeph. iii. 13; Zec. iii. 9, 10.

3. They shall be very glorious, and a blessing in the whole earth. Isa. xix. 24, 25; lxi. 9; Jer. xxxiii. 9; Ex. xxxiv. 26; Zeph. iii. 19; Zec. viii. 13.

VII. The land of Judæa shall be made eminently fruitful, like a paradise, or the garden of God.

Isa. xxix. 17; xxxv. 1, 2, 7, 9; li. 3, 16; liv. 11, 12, 13; lv. 12, 13; lx. 17; lxv. 17, 25; Eze. xxxiv. 26, 27; xxxvi. 36, 37; Joel iii. 18; Am. ix. 13, 14.

VIII. Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, and after the full restoration of the Jews shall never be destroyed, nor infested with enemies any more.

Isa. iii. 1; xxvi. 1; lx. 18; xxxiii. 6; Joel iii. 17; Oba. 17; Zec. xiv. 10, 11; Jer. xxxi. 38, 39, 40; Eze. xxxviii. 11.

IX. A little before the time of the Jews' call and conversion, there shall be great wars, confusion, and desolation throughout all the earth.

Isa. xxxiv. throughout; Joel iii. 1, 10; Zeph. iii. 8, 9; Eze. xxviii. 25, 26; Hag. ii. 21, 22, 23; Jer. xxx. 7, 8, 9, 10; 2 Chr. xv. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

So that we may say, as Balaam did, prophesying of that very time, "Alas, who shall live when God doth this!" Num. xxiv. 23.

Such an interpretation of these passages is disputed by other writers, and among them by Professor Alexander, who in his recent work on the Prophecies of Isaiah, (quoted so largely in our Supplementary Notes to that book,) says, 'As to the question in dispute, the ground which I have taken and endeavoured to maintain is the negative position, that the truth of these "exceeding great and precious promises" is not suspended on the future restoration of the Jews to Palestine, without denying such a revelation to be possible or promised elsewhere.' 9. Because of the prophets. Whilst we rejoice in our privileges, if we be zealous for the glory of God, and full of compassion for our fellow sinners, we cannot but be deeply concerned when we consider the present state of mankind, and even that of the visible church. It might well fill us with consternation and amazement, and prompt us to such earnestness in endeavouring to convince men of their guilt and misery, as would be despised by carnal men, and mistaken for inebriation or insanity, to compare the words of God's holiness in the sacred Scriptures with the doctrine and example of a very large majority of rulers and teachers in the church, and with the lives of most professed Christians. For it is evident, that they are awfully deceived, and deceiving each other into a false peace, when the heavy wrath of God is ready to fall upon them. Perhaps God more abhors those who profess to preach his truth, but pervert it by their lies, and disgrace it by their vices, than those who openly abet the cause of infidelity and irreligion. Yet, those who will hearken to such teachers as "speak from their own hearts, and not out of the mouth of the Lord," and whose doctrine tends to render them vain and ungodly, must be answerable for it; for it is easy to distinguish them from those who "stand in the counsel of the Lord" and hear his word; especially as he has promised to give wisdom to those who lack it and pray for it, Pr. ii. 1—6; Jas. i. 5—8.—T. Scott. See Supplementary Note on Pr. xix. 27.

CHAP. XXV.—10. The sound of the millstones. The Easterns bake every day. The millstones are in motion the first thing in the morning, and indicate that the family have survived the night. On going out in the morning its silence is broken by the noise of the mill, and the voices and song of the women grinding. The absence of these are strongly descriptive of a desolate condition. The light of the candle. The houses of Egypt at this time are never without lights. They burn lamps not only all the night long, but in all inhabited apartments in a house, and even the poor would rather retrench a part of their food than neglect it.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XXVI.—18. Zion shall be ploughed like a field. From this place, says Dr. Wilson, the steep ascent of mount Zion commences along the wall of the city. A great part of this hill has been long under culture, and Zion, according to prophecy, is thus literally ploughed like a field. How great are the changes which it has seen from the time when its sacred glory and imperial greatness were then the subjects of inspired song. "God is known in her palaces for a refuge. Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following," Ps. xlviii.

> 'Where now the pomp which kings with envy viewed?
> Where now the might which all those kings subdued?
> No martial myriads muster in thy gate;
> No suppliant nations in thy temple wait;
> No prophet bards, thy glittering courts among,
> Wake the full lyre, and swell the tide of song;
> But lawless Force and meagre Want are there,
> And the quick darting eye of restless Fear.
> While cold Oblivion 'mid thy ruins laid,
> Folds his dank wing beneath the ivy shade.'—Heber.

CHAP. XXIX.—22. Roasted. Chardin, in his Travels, after speaking of the most common mode of punishing with death, says, 'But there is still a particular way of putting to death such as have transgressed in civil affairs, either by causing a death, or by selling above the tax by a false weight, or who have committed themselves in any other manner. The cooks are put upon a spit and roasted over a slow fire, bakers are thrown into a hot oven. During the dearth in 1688, I saw such ovens heated on the royal square in Ispahan, to terrify the bakers, and deter them from deriving advantage from the general distress.'—Burder's Oriental Literature, vol. ii. 204.

CHAP. XXX.—1-11. The word that came to Jeremiah, &c. Now comes a most remarkable prophecy not adequately fulfilled by the restoration of Judah from Babylon, and pointing therefore to a future and more general restoration, comprehensive both of Judah and Israel,—a prophecy therefore which it is well to have been recorded in a book, that we, on whom the latter ends of the world have come, may be taught what the things are to which we should look forward. The day of trouble that is associated with this great consummation seems to be the period when there shall be shaking among the nations, prefigured by the overthrow of Nebuchadnezzar's image, at the time when the ten kingdoms shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour. The Jews will somehow be implicated in the universal commotion, as if to be assailed by the potentates of the world,—an event not obscurely intimated in other places of Scripture. But they shall be saved out of it, and the happiness of the millennium shall at length be ushered in, as if the fruit of a laborious and sore travail. Their return to the secure possession of their own land, and under David their king, as well as the full end of all the nations among whom they had been scattered, are events that still lie in the womb of futurity. 11. Yet will I not make a full end of thee. God hath made a full end of the Egyptians, Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Medes and Persians, and Macedonians, and of the pagan Roman empire, which successively scattered or oppressed Israel; so that each of them has been inseparably united with the conquering nations; yet the Jews, by an unprecedented interposition of Providence, after all their oppressions and dispersions, are preserved a distinct people to this present day! How wonderfully do undeniable facts demonstrate the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures! No doubt the future restoration of that people from their present dispersions, and their quiet settlement in Canaan, will, in a still more astonishing manner, attest the same most important truth, to the conviction and conversion of the nations of the earth.—T. Scott. 12—24. Thy bruise is incurable, &c. The bruise of Israel was incurable by man, but all things are possible to God. They had been delivered up by him to the power of their enemies, and from whom none but himself could rescue them. And he will at length interpose and vindicate before the whole earth his own special relationship with the people whom he had chosen. They should be healed of their wounds, and recalled from the outcast places among which they had been scattered. The goodly temple should be reared on its old foundations, which was typically fulfilled in the first restoration, and will be substantially fulfilled in the second, when the true religion is set up in Jerusalem as the ecclesiastical capital of the world. Among other blessings which are promised, it is said that their nobles shall be of themselves, or they shall have rulers from among their own people. May not the governor be Jesus Christ, a Jew according to the flesh, but who engaged his heart to approach for the people whom he redeemed as their surety and intercessor before God? It is through him that we became God's people, and that he became our God. But this blessed consummation is not unaccompanied with mighty calamities and commotions on the earth; and well, may we repeat, is all this written in a book, that we of the latter days might consider it.

CHAP. XXXI.—1-11. At the same time, saith the Lord, &c. The prophecy of the last chapter continues, and with a heightening evidence. It is the time of the general restoration which, I believe, is here referred to. The grace which Israel is to find in the wilderness is that by which they are recalled from the places of their dispersion, and conducted to their ultimate settlement in their own land. Israel may here be saying, through the prophet, that the love of God to her in old times was again to be manifested. Their prosperity after their restoration is illustrated by a variety of images, and, among others, that they should eat of the produce of their own industry with perfect security and freedom, and under no such restraint as was laid upon them by the distinction between the common and the clean. The return in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah forms no adequate counterpart to the foretellings of this magnificent chapter. They shall yet come from a more wide-spread and general captivity; and come with weeping, too, because they will then look to him whom they have pierced, and weep in bitterness as for a firstborn. 31—40. Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel. Surely the days are yet to come when this covenant shall be entered upon. It is not yet that all men know the Lord, from the least unto the greatest. Hasten this universal shower of grace, O thou most High! What a valuable passage is this, and how mightily to be prayed over! Put thy law, O God, into my inward parts, write it in my heart; and may I at once be one of thy regenerated and reconciled children. And what an assurance we here have for the restoration and perpetuity of Israel as a nation. Here we have one of those fine instances in which the constancy of nature is appealed to as a guarantee for the faithfulness of God's word. The nation of Israel, and as a nation, will last as long as the present economy. And it is as impossible for God to cast them off as for man to explore all the amplitudes and profundities of the universe. These noble declarations in regard to the antitypical are followed by a prophecy respecting the typical, and which had its literal fulfilment. An illustrious chapter.—These Notes on ch. xxx. and xxxi., with the exception marked, are from Dr. Chalmers' posthumous work, Horæ Biblicæ.

CHAP. XXXV.—2. Rechabites. The Rechabites, as may be collected from ver. 7, were not of the children of Israel, but strangers of another race, who dwelt among them. From 1 Chr. ii. 55, they appear to have been Kenites, a people originally settled in that part of Arabia Petræa which was called the land of Midian; and most probably the descendants of Jethro, who is called a Kenite, and said to have severed himself from the rest of his countrymen, and to have dwelt amongst the people of Israel: compare Num. x. 29—32, with Jud. i. 16; iv. 11. 4. Into the chamber of the sons of Hanan. Several chambers belonged to the temple for the residence of the priests and Levites during the time of their ministration, and for other sacred purposes. Chamber of the princes. Where the Sanhedrim assembled: see ch. xxvi. 10. The Sanhedrim always sat in some great room adjoining the temple. 6. Jonadab. The person to whom Jehu shewed so much respect, 2 Kin. x. 15. Ye shall drink no wine, &c. That the people may be the less liable to be corrupted, and lose their original patriarchal simplicity, the laws here enjoined were given. 7. Ye shall dwell in tents. A tribe of Arabs to this day live without fixed habitations, and far from cities, feeding their flocks, and living on their produce, and abstaining from wine. They have neither vineyard, field, nor seed, and are called the Beni-Kheiber.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XXXVII.—16. The dungeon. Dr. Blayney thinks that this dungeon was probably a deep pit, like a well, sunk in the court yard, and open to the sky at top; in the sides of which were niches, called in the text cabins, and in the margin cells, where the prisoners were placed, hence the allusion Isa. xiv. 15. 21. Court of the prison. In the king's house, mentioned ch. xxxii. 2. The bakers' street. Some understand by this, the place containing the king's provisions; it however more probably means, a street for bakers, according to the ancient Eastern custom of appropriating different streets for different businesses. Though the Easterns in general bake their own bread, yet small families find it cheaper to purchase of the baker than to have daily grinding and baking at home.

CHAP. XLVI.—19. Noph shall be waste. To the south-west of us, on the other side of the Nile, were the mounds near Metrahenny, indicating the site of Memphis,—the Moph of Hosea, (Hos. ix. 6,) and the Noph of Isaiah, (Isa. xix. 13,) Jeremiah, (Jer. ii. 16; xlvi. 19,) and Ezekiel, (Eze. xxx. 13, 16.) It is a city of the very highest antiquity. Its site, which is said by Diodorus to have formed a circuit of one hundred and fifty stadia, or about fifteen miles, has now nothing to mark it out but a few mounds, and a colossal statue of Rameses the Great, a small figure of red granite greatly mutilated, and a few foundations.—Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 115.

CHAP. XLVII.—5. Baldness is come upon Gaza. Each of us had found minute fragments of polished marble in the flat hollows between the sandhills, the remains no doubt of the palaces of Gaza; and also masses of fused stones, proving that God had "sent a fire on the wall of Gaza," Am. i. 7. We now saw, in a manner we had never done before, that God had fulfilled his own word, "Baldness is come upon Gaza." We saw that not merely mourning, such as 'baldness' indicated in ancient times, but literally and most remarkably the appearance of baldness has come upon Gaza. No spot of verdure, not a single blade of grass, did we see upon these sandhills. One solitary tree there was, which only served to make the bareness more remarkable. This barren, bare hill of sand is the bald head of Gaza. How awfully true and faithful are the words of God.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. XLVIII.—9. The cities thereof shall be desolate, without any to dwell therein. The most populous and fertile province in Europe (especially any situated in the interior of a country like Moab) is not covered so thickly with towns as Moab is plentiful in ruins, deserted and desolate though now it be. Burckhardt enumerates about fifty ruined sites within its boundaries, many of them extensive. In general they are a "broken down" (ver. 39) and undistinguishable mass of ruins; and many of them have not been closely inspected. But in some instances there are the remains of temples, sepulchral monuments, the ruins of edifices constructed of very large stones, and many cisterns cut out of the rock. Not one of the ancient cities of Moab now exists, as tenanted by man. 28. O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock. In a general description of the condition of the inhabitants of that extensive desert which now occupies the place of these ancient flourishing states, Volney, in plain but unmeant illustration of this prediction, remarks, that 'the wretched peasants live in perpetual dread of losing the fruits of their labours; and no sooner have they gathered in their harvest than they hasten to secrete it in private places, and retire among the rocks which border on the Dead Sea.' Towards the opposite extremity of the land of Moab, and at a little distance from its borders, Seetzen relates that there are many families living in caverns; and he actually designates them 'the inhabitants of the rocks.' And, at the distance of a few miles from the ruined site of Heshbon, 'there are artificial caves in a large range of perpendicular cliffs, in some of which are chambers and small sleeping apartments.' While the cities are desolate without any to dwell therein, the rocks are tenanted.—Keith on the Prophecies, which the reader may consult for additional proofs of the accomplishment of the predictions respecting Moab. See also Supplementary Note on Isa. xvi. 14.

CHAP. XLIX.—2. Ammon shall be a desolate heap. See Supplementary Note on Eze. xxv. 5. 13. All the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes. Referring to the ruins of Petræa, the metropolis of Edom, Dr. Wilson says, (Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 309,) Both in the interior of the palace, and in what must have been its adjoining enclosures, there are many bushes and shrubs growing, such as we should expect to find in any similar body of ruins, (Isa. xxxiv. 13.) Though they are formed in connexion with a fabric which appears to have been erected either by the Greeks or Romans, they are not to be overlooked as the indices of the continued desolations of Idumæa which are set forth in the several places of holy writ, in which it is said that all its cities shall be perpetual wastes. Of the remains of ancient cities still exposed to view in different places throughout Idumæa, Burckhardt (Travels, 418—441) describes 'the ruins of a large town, of which nothing remains but broken walls and heaps of stones; the ruins of several villages in its vicinity; the ruins of an ancient city, consisting of large heaps of hewn blocks of silicious stone; the extensive ruins of Gherandel Arindela, an ancient town of Palæstina Tertia.' 'The following ruined places are situated in Djebal Shera (mount Seir) to the south and south-west of Wady Mousa, Kalaat, Djerba, Basta, Eyl, Ferdakh, Anyk, Bir el Beytar, Shemakh, and Syk. Of the towns laid down in D'Anville's map, Thoana excepted, no traces remain.' Laborde passed the ruins of Elana, a town in Wady (valley) Pambouchebe, of another in Wady Sabra, where there are the ruins of a theatre and several temples—and of Ameime, where there are the ruins of numerous cisterns excavated from the rock, into which the water flowed by an aqueduct nine miles in length.—Keith.

CHAP. LI.—1. Babylon. See Supplementary Note on Isaiah. 37. Shall become heaps. Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, is now the greatest of ruins. 'Immense tumuli of temples, palaces, and human habitations of every description,' are everywhere seen, and form 'long and varied lines of ruins,' which, in some places, 'rather resemble natural hills than mounds which cover the remains of great and splendid edifices.' Those buildings which were once the labour of slaves and the pride of kings, are now misshapen heaps of rubbish. 'The whole face of the country is covered with vestiges of building, in some places consisting of brick walls surprisingly fresh, in others, merely a vast succession of mounds of rubbish, of such indeterminate figures, variety, and extent, as to involve the person who should have formed any theory in inextricable confusion.' 'Long mounds running from north to south are crossed by others from east to west,' and are only distinguished by their form, direction, and number, from the decayed banks of canals. 'The greater part of the mounds are certainly the remains of buildings, originally disposed in streets, and crossing each other at right angles.' The more distinct and prominent of these heaps are double, or lie in parallel lines, each exceeding twenty feet, and 'are intersected by cross passages, in such a manner as to place beyond a doubt the fact of their being rows of houses or streets fallen to decay.' Such was the form of the streets of Babylon, leading towards the gates; and such are now the lines of its heaps. Such is the multiplicity of prophecies and the accumulation of facts, that the very abundance of evidence increases the difficulty of arranging, in a condensed form, and thus appropriating its specific fulfilment to each precise and separate prediction, and many of them may be viewed connectedly. All who have visited Babylon concur in acknowledging or testifying that the desolation is exactly such as was foretold. They, in general, apply the more prominent predictions; and, in minute details, they sometimes unconsciously adopt, without any allusion or reference, the very words of inspiration. Babylon is wholly desolate. It has become heaps—it is cut down to the ground—brought down to the grave—trodden on—uninhabited—its foundations fallen—its walls thrown down, and utterly broken—its loftiest edifices rolled down from the rocks—the golden city has ceased—the worms are spread under it, and the worms cover it, &c. There the Arabian pitches not his tent; there the shepherds make not their folds; but wild beasts of the desert lie there, and their houses are full of doleful creatures, and owls dwell there, &c. It is a possession for the bittern, and a dwelling-place for dragons—a wilderness, a dry land and a desert—a burnt mountain—pools of water—spoiled—empty—nothing left—utterly destroyed—every one that goeth by it is astonished, &c.—Keith on Prophecy, where see the authors quoted. (See also wood engraving, Ps. cxxxvii.) 58. The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken. A chapter of sixty pages in length, of Mr. Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. ii. p. 206—307, is entitled, 'Search after the walls of Babylon.' After a long and fruitless search, he discovered on the eastern boundary of the ruins, on the summit of an oval mound from seventy to eighty feet in height, and from three to four hundred feet in circumference, 'a mass of solid wall, about thirty feet in length, by twelve or fifteen in thickness, yet evidently once of much greater dimensions each way, the work being, in its present state, broken and incomplete in every part;' and this heap of ruin and fragment of wall he conjectured to be a part,—the only part, if such it be, that can be discovered,—of the walls of Babylon, so utterly are they broken. Beyond this there is not even a pretension to the discovery of any part of them. It is impossible to think on what Babylon was, and to be an eye-witness of what it is, without astonishment. (ver. 41. "How is Babylon become an astonishment among the nations!") On first entering its ruins, Sir Robert Ker Porter, (Travels, vol. ii. 294,) thus expresses his feelings; 'I could not but feel an indescribable awe in thus passing, as it were, into the gates of fallen Babylon.' 'I cannot pourtray,' says Captain Mignan, (Travels, p. 11,) 'the overpowering sensation of reverential awe that possessed my mind while contemplating the extent and magnitude of ruin and devastation on every side.' How is the hammer of the whole earth cut asunder! How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations! The following interesting description has lately been given from the spot. After speaking of the ruined embankment, divided and subdivided again and again, like a sort of tangled network, over the apparently interminable ground—of large and wide-spreading morasses—of ancient foundations—and of chains of undulating heaps,—Sir R. K. Porter emphatically adds,—'The whole view was particularly solemn. The majestic stream of the Euphrates, wandering in solitude, like a pilgrim monarch through the silent ruins of his devastated kingdom, still appeared a noble river under all the disadvantages of its desert-tracked course. Its banks were hoary with reeds; and the grey osier willows were yet there on which the captives of Israel hung up their harps, and, while Jerusalem was not, refused to be comforted. But how has the rest of the scene changed since then! At that time those broken hills were palaces—those long undulating mounds streets—this vast solitude filled with the busy subjects of the proud daughter of the East. Now wasted with misery, her habitations are not to be found, and for herself, the worm is spread over her.—Keith. So Jeremiah wrote in a book all the evil that should come upon Babylon. It would exceed the limit assigned to these Notes were we to attempt more fully to shew how all the evil here and elsewhere in Scripture denounced against Babylon has come to pass. For farther details we must refer to Supplementary Notes on Isa. xiii. and xiv., and to Dr. Keith's work on the Prophecies, to which we have been so largely indebted. In the words of that excellent author, we may conclude by asking, Has not every purpose of the Lord been performed against Babylon? And having so clear illustrations of the facts before us, what mortal shall give a negative answer to the question subjoined by their omniscient Author to these very prophecies? "Who hath declared this from ancient time? Who hath told it from that time? Have not I the Lord? and there is no God beside me;—declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Is it possible that there can be any attestation of the truth of prophecy, if it be not witnessed here? Is there any spot on earth which has undergone a more complete transformation? 'The records of the human race,' it has been said with truth, 'do not present a contrast more striking than that between the primeval magnificence of Babylon and its long desolation.'—Edin. Review, No. 1, p. 439. Its ruins have of late been carefully and scrupulously examined by different natives of Britain, of unimpeached veracity, and the result of every research is a more striking demonstration of the literal accomplishment of every prediction. How few spots are there on earth of which we have so clear and faithful a picture as prophecy gave of fallen Babylon at a time when no spot on earth resembled it less than its present desolate solitary site! Or could any prophecies respecting any single place have been more precise and wonderful, or numerous, or true,—or more gradually accomplished throughout many generations? And when they look at what Babylon was, and what it is, and perceive the minute realization of them all—may not nations learn wisdom—may not tyrants tremble—and may not sceptics think?

EMBLEMS OF DESOLATION.

OF THE

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

SINCE it is certainly true what Solomon saith, contrary to the common opinion of the world, that "sorrow is better than laughter, and it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting," we should come to the reading and consideration of the melancholy chapters of this book, not only willingly, but with an expectation to edify ourselves by them; which that we may do, we must compose ourselves to a holy sadness, and resolve to weep with the weeping Prophet. Let us consider, I. The title of this book. In the Hebrew it has none, but is called (as the books of Moses are) from the first word, Ecah, 'how;' but the Jewish commentators call it as the Greeks do, and we from them, Kinoth, 'Lamentations.' As we have sacred odes, or songs of joy, so we have sacred elegies, or songs of lamentation; such variety of methods has Infinite Wisdom taken to work upon us, and move our affections, and so soften our hearts, and make them susceptible of the impressions of Divine truths, as the wax of the seal. We have not only piped unto you, but have mourned likewise, Mat. xi. 17. II. The penman of this book. It was Jeremiah the prophet, who is here Jeremiah the poet, and vates signifies both; therefore this book is fitly adjoined to the book of his prophecy, and is as an appendix to it. We had there at large the predictions of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, and then the history of them, to shew how punctually the predictions were accomplished for the confirming of our faith. Now here we have the expressions of his sorrow upon occasion of them, to shew that he was very sincere in the protestations he had often made, that he did not desire the woful day; but, on the contrary, the prospect of it filled him with bitterness; when he saw these calamities at a distance, he wished his head waters, and his eyes fountains of tears; and when they came, he made it to appear he did not dissemble in that wish, and that he was far from being disaffected to his country, which was the crime his enemies charged him with. Though his country had been very unkind to him, and the ruin of it was both a proof that he was a true prophet and a punishment of them for prosecuting him as a false prophet, which would have tempted him to rejoice in it, yet he sadly lamented it, and herein shewed a better temper than that which Jonah was of with respect to Nineveh. III. The occasion of these lamentations was the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, and the dissolution of the Jewish state, both civil and ecclesiastical, thereby. Some of the rabbins will have these to be the lamentations which Jeremiah penned upon occasion of the death of Josiah, which are mentioned 2 Chr. xxxv. 25. But though it is true, that that opened the door to all the following calamities, yet these lamentations seemed to be penned in the sight, not in the foresight, of those calamities,—when they were already come, not when they were at a distance; and there is nothing of Josiah in them, and his praise, as was, no question, in the lamentations for him. No, it is Jerusalem's funeral that this is an elegy upon. Others of them will have these lamentations to be contained in the roll which Baruch wrote from Jeremiah's mouth, and which Jehoiakim burnt; and they suggest, that at first there were in it only the 1st, 2nd, and 4th chapters; but the 3rd and 5th were the many like words that were afterwards added. But this is a groundless fancy; that roll is expressly said to be a repetition and summary of the Prophet's sermons, Jer. xxxvi. 2. IV. The composure of it. It is not only poetical, but alphabetical, all except the 5th chapter, as some of David's psalms are; each verse beginning with a several letter in the order of the Hebrew alphabet, the first aleph, the second beth, &c.; but the 3rd chapter is a triple alphabet, the three first beginning with aleph, the three next with beth, &c., which was a help to the memory, it being designed that these mournful ditties should be got by heart, and was an elegance of writing then valued, and therefore not now to be despised. They observe, that in the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th chapters the letter pe is put before ajin, which in all the Hebrew alphabets follows it; for a reason of which Dr. Lightfoot offers this conjecture, that the letter ajin, which is the numeral letter for seventy, was thus, by being displaced, made remarkable, to put them in mind of the seventy years, at the end of which God would turn again their captivity. V. The use of it. Of great use, no doubt, it was to the pious Jews in their sufferings, furnishing them with spiritual language to express their natural grief by; helping to preserve the lively remembrance of Zion among them and their children that never saw it, when they were in Babylon; directing their tears into the right channel; for they are here taught to mourn for sin, and mourn to God, and withal encouraging their hopes that God would yet return, and have mercy upon them. And it is of use to us, to affect us with godly sorrow for the calamities of the church of God, as becomes those that are living members of it, and are resolved to take our lot with it.

A.M. 3416. B.C. 588.

CHAPTER I.

We have here the first alphabet of this lamentation; twenty-two stanzas, in which the miseries of Jerusalem are bitterly bewailed, and her present deplorable condition aggravated, by comparing it with her former prosperous state: and all along sin is acknowledged and complained of as the procuring cause of all these miseries, and God is appealed to for justice against their enemies, and applied to for compassion towards them. The chapter is all of a piece, and the several remonstrances are interwoven: but here is, I. A complaint made to God, of their calamities, and his compassionate consideration desired, ver. 1—11. II. The same complaint made to their friends, and their compassionate consideration desired, ver. 12—17. III. An appeal to God, and his righteousness concerning it, ver. 18—22; in which he is justified in their affliction, and is humbly solicited to justify himself in their deliverance.

HOW doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people!
How is she become as a widow!
she that was great among the nations,
And princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary!
2 She weepeth sore in the night,
and her tears are on her cheeks:
Among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her:
All her friends have dwelt treacherously with her, they are become her enemies.
3 Judah is gone into captivity because of affliction, and because of great servitude:
She dwelleth among the heathen, she findeth no rest:
All her persecutors overtook her between the straits.
4 The ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to the solemn feasts:
All her gates are desolate: her priests sigh,
Her virgins are afflicted, and she is in bitterness.
5 Her adversaries are the chief, her enemies prosper;
For the LORD hath afflicted her for the multitude of her transgressions:
Her children are gone into captivity before the enemy.
6 And from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed:
Her princes are become like harts that find no pasture,
And they are gone without strength before the pursuer.
7 Jerusalem remembered in the days of her affliction and of her miseries
All her pleasant things that she had in the days of old,

When her people fell into the hand of the enemy, and none did help her:
The adversaries saw her, and did mock at her sabbaths.
8 Jerusalem hath grievously sinned; therefore she is removed:
All that honoured her despise her, because they have seen her nakedness:
Yea, she sigheth, and turneth backward.
9 Her filthiness is in her skirts; she remembereth not her last end; [forter.
Therefore she came down wonderfully: she had no com-
O LORD, behold my affliction: for the enemy hath magnified himself.
10 The adversary hath spread out his hand upon all her pleasant things: [sanctuary,
For she hath seen that the heathen entered into her
Whom thou didst command that they should not enter into thy congregation.
11 All her people sigh, they seek bread; [the soul:
They have given their pleasant things for meat to relieve
See, O LORD, and consider; for I am become vile.

Those that have any disposition to weep with them that weep, one would think, should scarce be able to refrain from tears at the reading of these verses, so very pathetical are the lamentations here.

First. The miseries of Jerusalem are here complained of as very pressing, and by many circumstances very much aggravated. Let us take a view of these miseries.

1. As to their civil state.

1st. A city that was populous is now depopulated, ver. 1. It is spoken of by way of admiration, Who would have thought that ever it should come to this? Or, by way of inquiry, What is it that hath brought it to this? Or, by way of lamentation, "Alas, alas," (as Rev. xviii. 10, 16, 19,) "how doth the city sit solitary that was full of people!" She was full of her own people, that replenished her, and full of the people of other nations, that resorted to her; with whom she had both profitable commerce and pleasant converse. But now her own people are carried into captivity, and strangers make no court to her; she sits solitary. The chief places of the city are not now as they used to be, places of concourse, where wisdom cried, Pr. i. 20, 21; and justly are they left unfrequented, because wisdom's cry there was not heard. Note, Those that are never so much increased God can soon diminish. "How is she become as a widow?" Her king that was, or should have been, as a husband to her, is cut off and gone; her God is departed from her, and hath given her a bill of divorce; she is emptied of her children; is solitary and sorrowful as a widow. Let no family, no state, not Jerusalem, no, nor Babylon herself, be secure, and say, "I sit as a queen," and shall never sit as a widow, Isa. xlvii. 8; Rev. xviii. 7.

2nd. A city that had dominion is now in subjection. She had been great among the nations, greatly loved by some, and greatly feared by others, and greatly observed and obeyed by both; some made her presents, and others paid her taxes; so that she was really princess among the provinces, and every sheaf bowed to hers, even the princes of the people intreated her favour: but now the tables are turned; she has not only lost her friends and sits solitary, but has lost her freedom too, and sits tributary; she paid tribute to Egypt first, and then to Babylon. Note, Sin brings a people not only into solitude, but into slavery.

3rd. A city that used to be full of mirth is now become melancholy, and upon all accounts full of grief. Jerusalem had been a joyous city, whither the tribes went up on purpose to rejoice before the Lord; she was the joy of the whole earth, but now she weepeth sore, her laughter is turned into mourning, her solemn feasts are all gone. She weeps in the night as true mourners do that weep in secret, in silence, and solitude; in the night, when others compose themselves to rest, her thoughts are most intent upon her troubles, and grief then plays the tyrant. What the prophet's head was for her, when she regarded it not, now her head is—as waters, and her eyes fountains of tears; so that she weeps day and night, Jer. ix. 1; her tears are continually on her cheeks. Though nothing dries away sooner than a tear, yet fresh griefs extort fresh tears, so that her cheeks are never free from them. Note, There is nothing more commonly seen under the sun than the tears of the oppressed, with whom the clouds return after the rain, Eccl. iv. 1.

4th. Those that were separated from the heathen now dwell among the heathen, that were a peculiar people are now a mingled people; ver. 3, "Judah is gone into captivity," out of their own land into the land of their enemies, and there she abides, and is likely to abide among those that are aliens to God, and the covenants of promise, with whom "she findeth no rest," no satisfaction of mind, nor any settlement of abode, but is continually hurried from place to place at the will of the victorious, imperious tyrants. And again, ver. 5, "Her children are gone into captivity before the enemy;" they that were to have been the seed of the next generation are carried off, so that the land that is now desolate is likely to be still desolate, and lost for want of heirs. Those that dwell among their own people, and that a free people, and in their own land, would be more thankful for the mercies they thereby enjoy if they would but consider the miseries of those that are forced into strange countries.

5th. Those that used in their wars to conquer are now conquered and triumphed over. "All her persecutors overtook her between the straits," ver. 3; they gained all possible advantages against her, so that her people unavoidably fall into the hand of the enemy; for there was no way to escape, ver. 7, they were hemmed in on every side, and, which way soever they attempted to flee they found themselves embarrassed, and when they made the best of their way they could make nothing of it, but were overtaken and overcome; so that every where "her adversaries are the chief, and her enemies prosper," ver. 5; which way soever their sword turns, they get the better. Such straits do men bring themselves into by sin. If we allow that which is our greatest adversary and enemy to have dominion over us, and to be chief in us, justly will our other enemies be suffered to have dominion over us.

6th. Those that had been not only a distinguished but a dignified people, on whom God had put honour, and to whom all their neighbours had paid respect, are now brought into contempt; ver. 8, "all that honoured her" before "despise her;" those that courted an alliance with her now value it not; that caressed her when she was in pomp and prosperity, slight her now she is in distress, "because they have seen her nakedness." By the prevalency of the enemies against her they perceive her weakness; and that she is not so strong a people as they thought she had been; and by the prevalency of God's judgments against her they perceive her wickedness, which now comes to light, and is everywhere talked of. Now it appears how they have vilified themselves by their sins, the enemies magnify themselves against them, ver. 9; they trample upon them, and insult over them, and in their eyes they are become vile, the tail of the nations that were the head. Note, Sin is the reproach of any people.

7th. Those that lived in a fruitful land were ready to perish, and many of them did perish, for want of necessary food, ver. 11. All her people sigh in despondency and despair, they are ready to faint away, their spirits fail, and therefore they sigh, for they seek bread, and seek it in vain. They were brought at last to that extremity that there was no bread for the people of the land, Jer. lii. 6; and in their captivity they had much ado to get bread; ch. v. 6, "They have given their pleasant things," their jewels and pictures, and all the furniture of their closets and cabinets, which they used to please themselves with looking upon, they have sold these to buy bread for themselves and their families, have parted with them "for meat to relieve the soul," or, as the margin is, 'to make the soul come again" when they were ready to faint away. They desired no other cordial but meat. All that a man hath will he give for life, and for bread which is the staff of life. Let those that abound in pleasant things not be proud of them, or fond of them, for the time may come when they may be glad to let them go for necessary things. And let those who have competent food to relieve their soul, be content with it, and thankful for it, though they have not pleasant things.

2. We have here an account of their miseries in their ecclesiastical state; the ruin of their sacred interest, which was much more to be lamented than that of their secular concerns.

1st. Their religious feasts were no more observed, no more frequented; ver. 4, "The ways of Zion do mourn," they look melancholy, overgrown with grass and weeds. It used to be a pleasant diversion to see people continually passing and repassing in the highway that led to the temple; but now you may stand there long enough and see nobody stir, for "none come to the solemn feasts," a full end is put to them by the destruction of that which was the city of our solemnities, Isa. xxxiii. 20. The solemn feasts had been neglected and profaned, Isa. i. 11, 12; and therefore justly is an end now put to them. But when thus the ways of Zion are made to mourn, all the sons of Zion cannot but mourn with them. It is very grievous to good men to see religious assemblies broken up and scattered, and those restrained from them that would gladly attend them. And, as the ways of Zion mourned, so the gates of Zion, in which the faithful worshippers used to meet, are desolate, for there is none to meet in them. Time was when "the Lord loved the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob;" but now he hath forsaken them, and is provoked to withdraw from them, and therefore it cannot but fare with him as it did with the temple when Christ quitted it; "Behold your house is left unto you desolate," Mat. xxiii. 38.

2nd. Their religious persons were quite disabled to perform their wonted services, were quite dispirited; "Her priests sigh," for the desolations of the temple, their songs are turned into sighs. They sigh, for they have nothing to do, and therefore there is nothing to be had; they sigh as the people, ver. 11, "for want of bread," because the offerings of the Lord, which were their livelihood, failed. It is time to sigh when the priests, the Lord's ministers, sigh. Her virgins also, that used with their music and dancing to grace the solemnities of their feasts, are afflicted, and in heaviness. Notice is taken of their service in the day of Zion's prosperity, Ps. lxviii. 25, "among them were the damsels playing with timbrels," and therefore notice is taken of the failing of it now. "Her virgins are afflicted," and therefore "she is in bitterness," that is, all the inhabitants of Zion are so, whose character it is that they are sorrowful for the solemn assembly, and that to them the reproach of it is a burthen, Zeph. iii. 18.

3rd. Their religious places were profaned; ver. 10, "The heathen entered into her sanctuary," into the temple itself, into which no Israelite was permitted to enter, though never so reverently and devoutly, but the priests only; "The stranger that comes nigh," even to worship there, "shall be put to death," thither the heathen now crowd rudely in, not to worship, but to plunder. God had commanded that the heathen should not so much as enter into the congregation, nor be incorporated with the people of the Jews, Deu. xxiii. 3; yet now they enter into the sanctuary without control. Note, Nothing is more grievous to those who have a true concern for the glory of God, nor is more lamented, than the violation of God's laws, and the contempt they see put upon sacred things. What the enemy did wickedly in the sanctuary was complained of, Ps. lxxiv. 3, 4.

4th. Their religious utensils, and all the rich things with which the temple was adorned and beautified, and which were made use of in the worship of God, were made a prey to the enemy, ver. 10, "The adversary hath spread out his hand upon all her pleasant things," hath grasped them all, seized them all for himself. What these pleasant things are we may learn from Isa. lxiv. 11, where, to the complaint of the burning of the temple, it is added, "all our pleasant things are laid waste;" the ark and the altar, and all the other tokens of God's presence with them, these were their pleasant things above any other things, and these were now broken to pieces and carried away. Thus "from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed," ver. 6. The beauty of holiness was the beauty of the daughter of Zion. The temple, that holy and beautiful house, when that was destroyed, her beauty was gone; that was the breaking of the staff of beauty, the taking away of the pledges and seals of the covenant, Zec. xi. 10.

5th. Their religious days were made a jest of; ver. 7, "The adversaries saw her, and did mock at her sabbaths." They laughed at them for their observing of one day in seven as a day of rest from worldly business. Juvenal, a heathen poet, ridicules the Jews in his time for it,—

Cui septima quæque fuit lux,
Ignava et vitæ partem non attigit ullam,—
'They keep their sabbaths to their cost,
And thus one day in seven is lost.'

Whereas sabbaths, if they be sanctified as they ought to be, will turn to a better account than all the days of the week beside. And whereas the Jews professed they did it in obedience to their God, and to his honour, they asked them what they got by it now, what profit had they in keeping the ordinances of their God, who now deserted them in their distress? Note, It is a very great trouble to all that love God to hear his ordinances mocked at, and particularly his sabbaths. Zion calls them her sabbaths, for the sabbath was made for men; they are his institutions, but they are her privileges; and the contempt put upon sabbaths all the sons of Zion take to themselves, and lay to heart accordingly; and will not look upon sabbaths, or any other Divine ordinances, as less honourable, nor value them less, for being mocked at.

6th. That which greatly aggravated all these grievances was, that her present state was just the reverse of what it had been when time was; ver. 7, now "in the days of affliction and misery," when every thing was black and dismal, "she remembers all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old," and now knows how to value them better than formerly, when she had the full enjoyment of them. God often makes us know the worth of mercies by the want of them; and adversity is most hardly borne by those that are fallen into it from the height of prosperity. This cut David to the heart when he was banished from God's ordinances, that he could remember when he "went with the multitude to the house of God," Ps. xlii. 4.

Secondly. The sins of Jerusalem are here complained of as the procuring, provoking cause of all these calamities. Whoever are the instruments, God is the author of all these troubles; it is the Lord that has afflicted her, ver. 5, and he has done it as a righteous judge, for she has sinned.

1. Her sins are for number numberless. Are her troubles many? her sins are many more; it is for the multitude of her transgressions that the Lord has afflicted her: see Jer. xxx. 14. When the transgressions of a people are multiplied, we cannot say, as Job doth, it is without cause that their wounds are multiplied, Job ix. 17.

2. They are for nature exceeding heinous; ver. 8, "Jerusalem hath grievously sinned;" hath sinned sin, so the word is; sinned wilfully, deliberately, hath sinned that sin which of all others is the abominable thing that the Lord hates, the sin of idolatry. The sins of Jerusalem, that makes such a profession, and enjoys such privileges, are of all other the most grievous sins. She hath sinned grievously, ver. 8, and therefore, ver. 9, she came down wonderfully. Note, Grievous sins bring wondrous ruin; there are some workers of iniquity to whom there is a strange punishment, Job xxxi. 3.

3. They are such sins as may plainly be read in the punishment. 1st. They have been very oppressive, and therefore are justly oppressed; ver. 3, "Judah is gone into captivity," and it is "because of affliction and great servitude," that is, because the rich among them afflicted the poor, and made them serve with rigour, and particularly (as the Chaldee paraphraseth it) because they had oppressed their Hebrew servants, which is charged upon them, Jer. xxxiv. 11. Oppression was one of their crying sins, Jer. vi. 6, 7; and it is a sin that cries loud. 2nd. They have made themselves vile, and therefore are justly vilified. They all despise her, ver. 8, for her filthiness is in her skirts; it appears upon her garments that she hath rolled them in the mire of sin. None can stain our glory if we did not stain it ourselves. 3rd. They have been very secure, and therefore are justly surprised with the ruin; ver. 9, "She remembereth not her last end," she did not take the warning that was given her to consider her latter end, to consider what would be the end of such wicked courses as she took, and therefore she came down wonderfully, in an astonishing manner, that she might be made to feel what she would not fear; therefore God shall make their plagues wonderful.

Thirdly. Jerusalem's friends are here complained of as false and faint-hearted, and very unkind; they "have all dealt treacherously with her," ver. 2; so that in effect "they are become her enemies." Her deceivers have created her as much vexation as her destroyers. The staff that breaks under us may do us as great a mischief as the staff that beats us, Eze. xxix. 6, 7. Her princes, that should have protected her, have not courage enough to make head against the enemy for their own preservation; they are like harts, that upon the first alarm betake themselves to flight, and make no resistance; nay, they are like harts that are famished for want of pasture, and therefore are gone without strength before the pursuer, and, having no strength for flight, are soon run down and made a prey of. Her neighbours are unneighbourly; for, 1. There is none to help her, ver. 7; either they could not or would not; nay, 2. She has no comforter, none to sympathize with her, or suggest any thing to alleviate her griefs, ver. 7, 9; like Job's friends, they saw it was to no purpose, her grief was so great, and miserable comforters were they all in such a case.

Fourthly. Jerusalem's God is here complained to concerning all these things, and all is referred to his compassionate consideration; ver. 9, "O Lord, behold my affliction," and take cognizance of it; and ver. 11, "See, O Lord, and consider," take order about it. Note, The only way to make ourselves easy under our burthens is to cast them upon God first, and leave it to him to do with us as seemeth him good.

He hath spread a net for my feet, he hath turned me
He hath made me desolate and faint all the day.
14 The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand:
they are wreathed, [to fall,
And come up upon my neck: he hath made my strength
The Lord hath delivered me into their hands, from whom
I am not able to rise up.
15 The Lord hath trodden under foot all my mighty men in the midst of me: [young men:
He hath called an assembly against me to crush my
The Lord hath trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a winepress.
16 For these things I weep; mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water, [from me:
Because the comforter that should relieve my soul is far
My children are desolate, because the enemy prevailed.
17 Zion spreadeth forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her:
The LORD hath commanded concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him:
Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them.
18 The LORD is righteous; for I have rebelled against his commandment:
Hear, I pray you, all people, and behold my sorrow:
My virgins and my young men are gone into captivity.
19 I called for my lovers, but they deceived me:
My priests and mine elders gave up the ghost in the city,
While they sought their meat to relieve their souls.
20 Behold, O LORD; for I am in distress: my bowels are troubled;
Mine heart is turned within me; for I have grievously rebelled:
Abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death.
21 They have heard that I sigh: there is none to comfort me:
All mine enemies have heard of my trouble; they are glad that thou hast done it:
Thou wilt bring the day that thou hast called, and they shall be like unto me.
22 Let all their wickedness come before thee;
And do unto them, as thou hast done unto me for all my transgressions:
For my sighs are many, and my heart is faint.

The complaints here are, for substance, the same with those in the foregoing part of the chapter; but in these verses the prophet, in the name of the lamenting church, doth more particularly acknowledge the hand of God in these calamities, and the righteousness of his hand.

First. The church in distress doth here magnify her affliction; and yet no more than there was cause for. Her groaning was not heavier than her strokes. She appeals to all spectators, "See if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow," ver. 12. This might perhaps be truly said of Jerusalem's griefs; but we are apt to apply it too sensibly to ourselves when we are in trouble, and more than there is cause for. Because we feel most from our own burthen, and cannot be persuaded to reconcile ourselves to it, we are ready to cry out, Surely, never was sorrow like unto our sorrow; whereas, if our troubles were to be thrown into a common stock with those of others, and then an equal dividend made, share and share alike, rather than stand to that, we would each of us say, 'Pray, give me my own again.'

Secondly. She doth here look beyond the instruments to the Author of her troubles, and own them all to be directed, determined, and disposed of by him. It is the Lord that has afflicted me, and he has afflicted me because he is angry with me; the greatness of his displeasure may be measured by the greatness of my distress, it is "in the day of his fierce anger," ver. 12. Afflictions cannot but be very much our griefs, when we see them arising from God's wrath; so the church doth here. 1. She is as one in a fever, and the fever is of God's sending. He hath sent fire into my bones, ver. 13; a preternatural heat, which prevails against them, so that they are burnt like a hearth, Ps. cii. 3, pained, and wasted, and dried away. 2. She is as one in a net, which the more he struggles to get out of, the more he is entangled in; and this net is of God's spreading. The enemies could not have succeeded in their stratagems but that God hath "spread a net for my feet." 3. She is as one in a wilderness, whose way is embarrassed, solitary, and tiresome; He hath turned me back, that I cannot go on; hath made me desolate, that I have nothing to support me with, but am faint all the day. 4. She is as one in a yoke, not yoked for service, but for penance, tied neck and heels together; ver. 14, "The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand." Observe, We never are entangled in any yoke but it is framed out of our own transgressions; "The sinner is holden with the cords of his own sins," Pr. v. 22. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke, Mat. xi. 30; but that of our own transgressions is a heavy one. God is said to bind this yoke when he chargeth guilt upon us, and brings us into those inward and outward troubles which our sins have deserved; when conscience, as his deputy, binds us over to his judgment, then the yoke is bound and wreathed by the hand of his justice, and nothing but the hand of his pardoning mercy will unbind it. 5. She is as one in the dirt, and he it is that has "trodden under foot all her mighty men," that has disabled them to stand, and overthrown them by one judgment after another, and so left them to be trampled upon by their proud conquerors, ver. 15. Nay, she is as one in a winepress, not only trodden down, but trodden to pieces, crushed as grapes in the winepress of God's wrath, and her blood pressed out as wine; and it is God that has thus trodden "the virgin, the daughter of Judah." 6. She is in "the hand of her enemies," and it is the Lord that has delivered her into their hands; ver. 14, "He has made my strength to fall," so that I am not able to make head against them; nay, not only not able to rise up against them, but not able to rise up from them. And then he hath delivered me into their hands; nay, ver. 15, he hath called "an assembly against me to crush my young men," and such an assembly as it is in vain to think of opposing. And again, ver. 17, "The Lord has commanded concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him." He that had many a time commanded deliverance for Jacob, Ps. xliv. 4, now commands an invasion against Jacob, because Jacob had disobeyed the commands of his law.

Thirdly. She justly demands a share in the pity and compassion of those that were the spectators of her misery; ver. 12, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" Can you look upon me without concern! What, are your hearts as adamants, and your eyes as marbles, that you cannot bestow upon me one compassionate thought, or look, or tear? Are not you also in the body? Is it nothing to you that your neighbour's house is on fire? There are those to whom Zion's sorrows and ruins are nothing; they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph. How pathetically doth she beg their compassion; ver. 18, "Hear, I pray you, all people, and behold my sorrow;" hear my complaints, and see what cause I had for them. This is a request like that of Job, Job xix. 21,

"Have pity, have pity upon me, O ye my friends." It helps to make a burthen sit lighter if our friends sympathize with us, and mingle their tears with ours; for that is an evidence that though we are in affliction we are not in contempt, which is commonly as much dreaded in an affliction as any thing.

Fourthly. She justifies her own grief, though it was very extreme, for these calamities; ver. 16, "For these things I weep," I weep in the night, ver. 2, when none sees; "mine eye, mine eye runs down with water." Note, This world is a vale of tears to the people of God; Zion's sons are often Zion's mourners. "Zion spreads forth her hands," ver. 17; which is here an expression rather of despair than of desire; she flings out her hands as giving all for gone. Let us see how she accounts for this passionate grief. 1. Her God is withdrawn from her; and Micah, that had but gods of gold, when they were stolen from him, cried out, "What have I more? And what is this that ye say unto me, What aileth thee?" The church here grieves excessively: For, saith she, "the Comforter that should relieve my soul is far from me." God is the comforter, he used to be so to her; he only can administer effectual comforts, it is his word that speaks them, it is his Spirit that speaks them to us. His are strong consolations, able to relieve the soul, to bring it back when it is gone, and we cannot of ourselves fetch it again. But now he is departed in displeasure, he is far from me, and beholds me afar off. Note, It is no marvel that the souls of the saints faint away, when God, who is the only comforter that can relieve them, keeps at a distance. 2. Her children are removed from her, and are in no capacity to help her. It is for them she weeps, as Rachel for hers, because they were not, and therefore she refuseth to be comforted. "Her children were desolate, because the enemy prevailed" against them; there is "none of all her sons to take her by the hand," Isa. li. 18. They cannot help themselves, and how should they help her? Both the damsels and the youths, that were her joy and hope, are gone into captivity, ver. 18. It is said of the Chaldeans that they had no compassion upon young men or maidens; not on the fair sex, not on the blooming age, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 17. 3. Her friends failed her; some would not, and others could not, give her any relief. She spread forth her hands, as begging relief, but there is none to comfort her, ver. 17; none that can do it, none that cares to do it. She called for her lovers, and, to engage them to help her, called them her lovers; but they deceived her, ver. 19; they proved like the brooks in summer to the thirsty traveller, Job vi. 15. Note, Those creatures that we set our hearts upon, and raise our expectations from, we are commonly deceived and disappointed in. Her idols were her lovers, Egypt and Assyria were her confidants, but they deceived her. Those that made court to her in her prosperity were shy of her, and strange to her in her adversity. Happy they that have made God their friend, and keep themselves in his love; for he will not deceive them. 4. Those whose office it was to guide her were disabled to do her any service. The priests and the elders, that should have appeared at the head of affairs, die for hunger; ver. 19, they "gave up the ghost," or were ready to expire, "while they sought their meat," went a begging for bread to keep them alive. The famine is sore indeed in the land when there is no bread to the wise, when priests and elders are starved. The priests and elders should have been her comforters, but how should they comfort others when they themselves were comfortless? "They have heard that I sigh," which should have summoned them to mine assistance, but "there is none to comfort me." Lover and friend hast thou put far from me. 5. Her enemies were too hard for her, and then insulted over her. They have prevailed; ver. 16, "Abroad the sword bereaveth," and slays all that come in its way; and "at home" all provisions are cut off by the besiegers, so that "there is as death," that is, famine, which is as bad as the pestilence, or worse. The sword without, and terror within, Deu. xxxii. 35. And as the enemies were very barbarous that were the instrument of the calamity, so were they that were the standers by, the Edomites and Ammonites, that bore ill-will to Israel. They "have heard of my trouble, and are glad that thou hast done it," ver. 21; they rejoice in the trouble itself, they rejoice that it is God's doing, it pleaseth them to find that God and his Israel are fallen out; and they carry it accordingly with a great deal of strangeness towards them. "Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them," that they are afraid of touching, and are shy of, ver. 17. Upon all these accounts it cannot be wondered at, nor can she be blamed that her sighs are many, in grieving for what is; and her heart is faint, ver. 22, in fear of what is yet farther likely to be.

Fifthly. She justifies God in all that is brought upon her, acknowledging that her sins had deserved these severe chastenings. The yoke that lies so heavy and binds so hard is the yoke of her transgressions, ver. 14. The fetters we are held in are of our own making, and it is with our own rod that we are beaten. When the church had spoken here as if she thought the Lord severe, she doth well to correct herself, at least to explain herself, by acknowledging, ver. 18, "The Lord is righteous." He doth us no wrong in dealing thus with us, nor can we charge him with any injustice in it; how unrighteous soever men are, we are sure the Lord is righteous, and manifests his justice, though they contradict all the laws of theirs. Note, Whatever our troubles are which God is pleased to inflict upon us, we must own that therein he is righteous; we understand neither him nor ourselves if we do not own it, 2 Chr. xii. 6. She owns the equity of God's actions by owning the iniquity of her own: "I have rebelled against his commandments," ver. 18; and again, ver. 20, "I have grievously rebelled." We cannot speak bad enough of sin, and we must always speak worst of our own sin, must call it rebellion, grievous rebellion; and very grievous sin is to all true penitents. It is this that lies heavier upon her than the afflictions she was under; "My bowels are troubled," they work within me as the troubled sea; "My heart is turned within me," is restless, is turned upside down, "for I have grievously rebelled." Note, Sorrow for sin must be great sorrow, and must affect the soul.

Sixthly. She appeals both to the mercy and to the justice of God in her present case. 1. She appeals to the mercy of God concerning her own sorrows, which had made her the proper object of his compassion; ver. 20, "Behold, O Lord, for I am in distress," take cognizance of my case, and take such order for my relief as thou pleasest. Note, It is matter of comfort to us that the troubles that oppress the spirits are open before God's eye. 2. She appeals to the justice of God concerning the injuries that her enemies had done her, ver. 21, 22, "Thou wilt bring the day that thou hast called," the day that is fixed in the counsels of God and published in the prophecies, when mine enemies that now prosecute me shall be like unto me, when the cup of trembling now put into my hands shall be put into theirs. It may be read as a prayer, Let the day appointed come; and so it goes on, "Let their wickedness come before thee," let it come to be remembered, let it come to be reckoned for, take vengeance on them for all the wrong they have done to me, Ps. cix. 14, 15; hasten the time when thou wilt do to them for their transgressions as thou hast done to me for mine. This prayer amounts to a protestation against all thoughts of a coalition with them, and to a prediction of their ruin, subscribing to that which God had in his word spoken of it. Note, Our prayers may and must agree with God's word, and what day God has there called we are to call for, and no other. And though we are bound in charity to forgive our enemies, and to pray for them, yet we may in faith pray for the accomplishment of that which God has spoken against his and his church's enemies, that will not repent to give him glory.

CHAPTER II.

This second alphabetical elegy is set to the same mournful tune with the former, and the substance of it is much the same: it begins with Ecah, as that did, How sad is our case! alas for us. I. Here is the anger of Zion's God taken notice of as the cause of her calamities, ver. 1—9. II. Here is the sorrow of Zion's children taken notice as the effect of her calamities, ver. 10—19. III. The complaint is made to God, and the matter referred to his compassionate consideration, ver. 20—22; the hand that wounded must make whole.

HOW hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, [Israel,
And cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of
And remembered not his footstool in the day of his anger!

2 The Lord hath swallowed up all the habitations of Jacob, and hath not pitied:
He hath thrown down in his wrath the strong holds of the daughter of Judah;
He hath brought them down to the ground: he hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof.

3 He hath cut off in his fierce anger all the horn of Israel:
He hath drawn back his right hand from before the enemy,
And he burned against Jacob like a flaming fire, which devoureth round about.

4 He hath bent his bow like an enemy: he stood with his right hand as an adversary,
And slew all that were pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion:
He poured out his fury like fire.

5 The Lord was as an enemy: he hath swallowed up Israel,
He hath swallowed up all her palaces: he hath destroyed his strong holds,
And hath increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation.

6 And he hath violently taken away his tabernacle, as if it were of a garden: he hath destroyed his places of the assembly:
The LORD hath caused the solemn feasts and sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion,
And hath despised in the indignation of his anger the king and the priest. [sanctuary,

7 The Lord hath cast off his altar, he hath abhorred his
He hath given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces;
They have made a noise in the house of the LORD, as in the day of a solemn feast.

8 The LORD hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion:
He hath stretched out a line, he hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying:
Therefore he made the rampart and the wall to lament; they languished together.

9 Her gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars:
Her king and her princes are among the Gentiles:
The law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the LORD.

It is a very sad representation which is here made of the state of God's church, of Jacob and Israel, of Zion and Jerusalem; but the emphasis in these verses seems to be laid all along upon the hand of God in the calamities which they were groaning under. The grief is not so much that such and such things are done, as that God has done them; that he appears angry with them. It is he that chastens them, and chastens them in wrath, and in his hot displeasure; he is become their enemy, and fights against them; and this, this is the wormwood and the gall in their affliction and their misery.

First. Time was when God's delight was in his church, and he appeared to her and appeared for her as a friend; but now his displeasure is against her; he is angry with her, and appears and acts against her as an enemy. This is frequently repeated here, and sadly lamented. What he has done he has done in his anger; this makes the present day a melancholy day indeed with us, that it is the day of his anger, ver. 1. And again, ver. 2, it is in his wrath; and ver. 3, it is in his fierce anger that he has thrown down and cut off; and ver. 6, "in the indignation of his anger." Note, To those who know how to value God's favour nothing appears more dreadful than his anger. Corrections in love are easily borne, but rebukes in wrath wound deep. It is God's wrath that burns against Jacob as a flaming fire, ver. 3; and it is a consuming fire; it devours round about, devours all her honours, all her comforts. This is the fury that is poured out like fire, ver. 4; like fire and brimstone which was rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah. But it was their sin that kindled this fire. God is such a tender Father to his children, that we may be sure he is never angry with them but when they provoke him and give him cause to be angry; nor is he ever angry more than there is cause for. God's covenant with them was, that if they would obey his voice he would be an enemy to their enemies, Ex. xxiii. 22; and he had been so as long as they had kept close to him; but now he is an enemy to them, at least he is as an enemy, ver. 5; "He hath bent his bow like an enemy," ver. 4. "He stood with his right hand" stretched out against them, and a sword drawn in it "as an adversary." God is not really an enemy to his people; no, not when he is angry with them, and corrects them in anger. We may be sorely displeased against our dearest friends and relations, whom yet we are far from having an enmity to; but sometimes he is an enemy to them, when all his providences concerning them seem, in outward appearance, to have a tendency to their ruin; when every thing makes against them, and nothing for them. But, blessed be God, Christ is our peace, is our peace-maker, who hath slain the enmity, and in him we may agree with our adversary, which it is our wisdom to do, since it is in vain to contend with him, and he offers us advantageous conditions of peace.

Secondly. Time was when God's church appeared very bright and illustrious and considerable among the nations; but now "the Lord has covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud," ver. 1; a dark cloud, which is very terrible to herself, and through which she cannot see his face; a thick cloud, (so the word signifies;) a black cloud, which eclipses all her glory, and conceals her excellency. Not such a cloud as that under which God conducted them through the wilderness, or that in which God took possession of the temple, and filled it with his glory; no, that side of the cloud is now turned towards them which was turned towards the Egyptians in the Red sea. The beauty of Israel is now cast down from heaven to the earth; their princes, 2 Sam. i. 19, their religious worship, their beauty of holiness, all that which recommended them to the affection and esteem of their neighbours, and rendered them amiable, which had lifted them up to heaven, was now withered and gone, because God had covered it with a cloud. "He hath cut off all the horn of Israel," ver. 3; all her beauty and majesty, Ps. cxxxii. 17; all her plenty and fulness, and all her power and authority. They had in their pride lifted up their horn against God, and therefore justly will God cut off their horn. He disabled them to resist and oppose their enemies, he turned back their right hand, so that they were not able to follow the blow which they gave, nor to ward off the blow which was given them. What can their right hand do against the enemy when God draws it back and withers it, as he did Jeroboam's? Thus was the beauty of Israel cast down, when a people famed for courage were not able to stand their ground, or make good their post.

Thirdly. Time was when Jerusalem and the cities of Judah were strong and well fortified, were trusted to by the inhabitants, and let alone by the enemy as impregnable; but now the Lord has in anger swallowed them up, they are quite gone, the forts and barriers are taken away, and the invaders meet with no opposition. The stately structures that were their strength and beauty are pulled down and laid waste. 1. "The Lord hath," in anger, "swallowed up all the habitations of Jacob," ver. 2, both the cities and the country houses; they are burnt or otherwise destroyed, so totally ruined that they seem to have been swallowed up, and no remains left of them. "He hath swallowed up and has not pitied;" one would have thought it pity that such sumptuous houses, so well built, so well furnished, should be quite destroyed, and that some pity should have been had for the poor inhabitants that were thus dislodged and driven to wander; but God's wonted compassions seemed to fail; "He hath swallowed up Israel" as a lion swallows his prey, ver. 5. 2. He hath swallowed up not only her common habitations, but her palaces, all her palaces, the habitations of her princes and great men, ver. 5, though those were most stately and strong, and rich and well guarded. God's judgments, when they come with commission, level palaces with cottages, and as easily swallow them up. If palaces be polluted with sin, as theirs were, let them expect to be visited with a curse, which shall consume them, with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof, Zec. v. 4. 3. He hath destroyed not only their dwelling-places, but their strongholds, their castles, citadels, and places of defence; these "he hath thrown down in his wrath, and brought them to the ground," for shall they stand in the way of his judgments, and give check to the progress of them? No, let them droop like leaves in autumn; let them be razed to the foundations, and made to touch the ground, ver. 2. And again, ver. 5, "He hath destroyed his strongholds;" for what strength could they have against God? And thus "he hath increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation," for they could not but be in a mighty consternation when they saw all their defence departed from them. This is again insisted upon, ver. 7—9. In order to the swallowing up of her palaces, "he hath given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces," which were their security, and when they are broken down the palaces themselves are soon broken into. The walls of palaces cannot protect them, unless God himself be a wall of fire round about them. This God did in his anger, and yet he hath done it deliberately; it is the result of a previous purpose, and is done by a wise and steady providence; for "the Lord hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion:" he brought the Chaldean army in on purpose to do this execution. Note, Whatever desolations God makes in his church they are all according to his counsels; "He performeth the thing that is appointed for us," even that which makes most against us. But when it is done, "he hath stretched out a line," a measuring line, to do it exactly and by measure: hitherto the destruction shall go and no farther; no more shall be cut off than what is marked to be so. Or, it is meant of the line of confusion, Isa. xxxiv. 11, a levelling line; for he will go on with his work: "he hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying," that right hand which he stretched out against his people as an adversary, ver. 4. As far as the purpose went the performance shall go, and his hand shall accomplish his counsel to the utmost, and not be withdrawn. "Therefore he made the rampart and the wall," which the people had rejoiced in, and upon which, perhaps, they had made merry, "to lament, and they languished together." The walls and the ramparts or bulwarks upon them fell together, and were left to condole one another's fall. "Her gates are" gone in an instant, so that one would think they were "sunk into the ground" with their own weight, and "he hath destroyed and broken her bars," those bars of Jerusalem's gates which formerly he had strengthened, Ps. cxlvii. 13. Gates and bars will stand us in no stead when God hath withdrawn his protection.

Thirdly. Time was when their government flourished, their princes made a figure, and their kingdom was great among the nations, and the balance of power was on their side, but now it is quite otherwise; "He hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof," ver. 2. They had first polluted themselves with their idolatries, and then God dealt with them as with polluted things; he threw them to the dunghill, the fittest place for them. He hath given up their glory, which was looked upon as sacred, (that is a character we give to majesty,) to be trampled upon and profaned; and no marvel that the king and the priest, whose characters were always deemed venerable and inviolable, are despised by everybody, when God has "in the indignation of his anger despised the king and the priest," ver. 6. He hath abandoned them, looked upon them as no longer worthy of the honours conveyed to them by the covenants of royalty and priesthood, but as having forfeited both; and then Zedekiah the king was used despitefully, and Seraiah the chief priest put to death as a malefactor. The crown is fallen from their head; "her king and her princes are among the Gentiles," prisoners among them, insulted over by them, ver. 9, and treated not only as common persons, but as the basest, without any regard had to their character. Note, It is but just with God to debase those by his judgments who have by sin debased themselves.

Fifthly. Time was when the ordinances of God were administered among them in their power and purity, and they had those tokens of God's presence with them; but, now those were taken from them, that part of the beauty of Israel was gone which was indeed their greatest beauty.

1. The ark was God's footstool, under the mercy seat, between the cherubims. This was of all other the most sacred symbol of God's presence; it is called his footstool, 1 Chr. xxviii. 2; Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7. There the Shechinah rested, and with an eye to this Israel was protected and saved many a time; but now he "remembered not his footstool." The ark itself was suffered, as it should seem, to fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. God, being angry, threw that away, for it shall be no longer his footstool; the earth shall be so, as it had been before the ark was, Isa. lxvi. 1. Of what little value are the tokens of his presence when his presence is gone; nor was this the first time God gave his ark into captivity, Ps. lxxviii. 61. God and his kingdom can stand without that footstool.

2. They that ministered in holy things had been "pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion," ver. 4. They had been "purer than snow, whiter than milk," ch. iv. 7; none more pleasant in the eyes of all good people than those that did the service of the tabernacle; but now these are slain, and their blood mingled with their sacrifices. Thus is the priest despised as well as the king. Note, When those that were pleasant to the eye in Zion's tabernacle are slain, God must be acknowledged in it; he has done it; and the "burning which the Lord hath kindled must be bewailed" by the whole house of Israel, as in the case of Nadab and Abihu, Lev. x. 6.

3. The temple was God's tabernacle, as the tabernacle, while that was in being, is called his temple, Ps. xxvii. 4; and this "he has violently taken away," ver. 6. He has plucked up the stakes of it, and cut the cords, it shall be no more a tabernacle, much less his; he has taken it away, as the keeper of a garden takes away his hovel or shade when he has done with it, and has no more occasion for it; he takes it down as easily, as speedily, and with as little regret and reluctancy, as if it were but a "cottage in a vineyard and a lodge in a garden of cucumbers," Isa. i. 8, but a "booth which the keeper makes," Job xxvii. 18. When men profane God's tabernacle, it is just with him to take it from them. God had justly refused to smell in their solemn assemblies, Am. v. 21; they had provoked him to withdraw from them, and then no marvel that he has "destroyed his places of the assembly;" what should they do with the places when the services were become an abomination? "He hath" now "abhorred his sanctuary," ver. 7. It has been defiled with sin, that only thing which he hates; and for the sake of that he abhors even his sanctuary, which he had delighted in, and called his rest for ever, Ps. cxxxii. 14. Thus he had done to Shiloh. Now the enemies have made as great a noise of revelling and blaspheming in the house of the Lord as ever had been made with the temple songs and music in the day of a solemn feast, Ps. lxxiv. 4. Some, by the places of the assembly, ver. 6, understand not only the temple, but the synagogues and the schools of the prophets, which the enemy had burnt up, Ps. lxxiv. 8.

4. The solemn feasts and the sabbaths had been carefully remembered, and the people carefully put in mind of them; but now "the Lord hath caused those to be forgotten," not only in the country among those that lived at a distance, but even in Zion itself; for there were none left to remember them, nor were there the places left where they used to be observed. Now Zion was in ruins, no difference was made between sabbath time and other times, every day was a day of mourning, so that all the solemn feasts were forgotten. Note, It is just with God to deprive those of the benefit and comfort of sabbaths and solemn feasts who have not duly valued them, nor conscientiously observed them; but have profaned them, which was one of the sins that the Jews were often charged with. They that have seen the days of the Son of man, and slighted them, may desire to see one of those days, and not have them, Lu. xvii. 22.

5. The altar that had sanctified their gifts is now cast off; for God will no more accept their gifts, nor be honoured by their sacrifices, ver. 7. The altar was the table of the Lord; but God will no longer keep house among them, neither feast them nor feast with them.

6. They had been blessed with prophets and teachers of the law; but now "the law is no more," ver. 9. It is no more read by the people, no more expounded by the scribes; the tables of the law are gone with the ark, the book of the law is taken from them, and the people are forbidden to have it. What should they do with Bibles that had made no better improvement of them when they had them? "Her prophets also find no vision from the Lord;" God answers them no more by prophets and dreams, which was the melancholy case of Saul, 1 Sam. xxviii. 15. They had persecuted God's prophets, and despised the visions they had from the Lord; and, therefore, it is just with God to say they shall have no more prophets, no more visions. Let them go to the prophets that had flattered and deceived them with visions of their own hearts, for they shall have none from God to comfort them, or tell them how long. They that misuse God's prophets justly lose them.

CASTING DUST ON THE HEAD.—ver. 10.

Justly are these called Lamentations, and they are very pathetical ones; the expressions of grief in perfection, mourning and woe, and nothing else, like the contents of Ezekiel's roll, Eze. ii. 10.

First. Copies of lamentation are here presented, and they are painted to the life. 1. The judges and magistrates that used to appear in robes of state have laid them aside, or rather, are stripped of them, and put on the habit of mourners, ver. 10. The elders now sit no longer in the judgment-seats, "the thrones of the house of David;" but they sit upon the ground, having no seat to repose themselves in, or in token of great grief, as Job's friends sat with him upon the ground, Job ii. 13. They open not their mouth in the gate, as usual, to give their opinion, but they keep silence; overwhelmed with grief, and not knowing what to say. They have "cast dust upon their heads, and girded themselves with sackcloth," as deep mourners used to do. They had lost their power and wealth, and that made them take on thus. Ploratur lachrymis amissa pecunia veris,—'Genuine are the tears which we shed over lost property.' 2. The young ladies, that used to dress themselves so richly, and walk with stretched forth necks, Isa. iii. 16, now are humbled; "The virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground," they are made to know sorrow that seemed to bid defiance to it, and were always disposed to be merry. 3. The prophet himself is a pattern to the mourners, ver. 11, "His eyes do fail with tears," that is, he hath wept till he can weep no more; hath almost wept his eyes out, wept himself blind. Nor are the inward impressions of grief short of the outward expressions; his bowels are troubled, as they were when he saw these calamities coming, Jer. iv. 19, 20, which one would think might have excused him now; but even he, to whom they were no surprise, yet felt them an insupportable grief, to that degree, that his liver is poured out on the earth; that is, he felt himself a perfect colliquation. All his entrails were melted and dissolved, as Ps. xxii. 14; Jeremiah himself had better treatment than his neighbours, better than he had had before from his own countrymen; nay, their destruction was his deliverance, their captivity his enlargement, the same that made them prisoners made him a favourite, and yet his private interests are swallowed up in a concern for the public, and he bewails the destruction of the daughter of his people as sensibly as if he himself had been the greatest sufferer in that common calamity. Note, The judgments of God upon the land and nation are to be lamented by us, though we for our parts may escape pretty well.

Secondly. Calls to lamentation are here given. "The heart of the people cried unto the Lord," ver. 18. Some fear it was not a cry of true repentance, but of bitter complaint; their heart was as full of grief as it could hold, and they gave vent to it in doleful shrieks and outcries, in which they made use of God's name; yet we will charitably suppose that many of them did in sincerity cry unto God for mercy in their distress; and the prophet bids them go on to do so. "O wall of the daughter of Zion," either ye that stand upon the wall, ye watchmen on the walls, (Isa. lxii. 6,) when ye see the enemies encamped about the walls, and making their approaches towards them, or "because of the wall," (that is the subject of the lamentation,) because of the "breaking down of the wall," which was not done till about a month after the city was taken; because of this farther calamity let the daughter of Zion lament still. This was a thing which Nehemiah lamented long after, Neh. i. 3, 4, "Let tears run down like a river, day and night;" weep without intermission, "give thyself no rest" from weeping, "let not the apple of thine eyes cease." This intimates, 1. That the calamities would be continuing, and the causes of grief would frequently recur, and fresh occasion would be given them every day and every night to bemoan themselves. 2. That they would be apt by degrees to grow insensible and stupid under the hand of God, and would need to be still called upon to afflict their souls yet more and more, till their proud and hard hearts were thoroughly humbled and softened.

Thirdly. Causes for lamentation are here assigned, and the calamities that are to be bewailed are very particularly and pathetically described.

1. Multitudes perish by famine, a very sore judgment; and piteous is the case of those that fall under it God had corrected them by scarcity of provisions through want of rain some time before, Jer. xiv. 1, and they were not brought to repentance by that lower degree of this judgment; and therefore now, by the straitness of the siege, God brought it upon them in extremity; for, 1st. The children died for hunger in their mothers' arms; "The children and sucklings" whose innocent and helpless state entitle them to relief as soon as any, yet they "swoon in the streets," ver. 11; "as the wounded," ver. 12. There being no food to be had for them, they that are starved die as surely as they that are stabbed. They lie a great while crying to their poor mothers for corn to feed them, and wine to refresh them; for they are such as had been bred up to the use of wine, and wanted it now, but there is none for them; so that at length "their souls are poured out into their mothers' bosom," and there they breathe their last. This is mentioned again, ver. 19, they "faint for hunger in the top of every street." Yet this is not the worst. 2nd. There were some little children that were slain by their mothers' hands, and eaten, ver. 20. Such was the scarcity of provision, that the women ate the fruit of their own bodies, even their children, when they were but of five span long, according to the threatening, Deu. xxviii. 53. The like was done in the siege of Samaria, 2 Kin. vi. 29; such extremities, nay, such barbarities, were they brought to by the famine. Let us in our abundance thank God that we have food convenient not only for ourselves, but for our children.

2. Multitudes fall by the sword, which devours one as well as another, especially when it is in the hand of such cruel enemies as the Chaldeans were. 1st. They spared no character, no, not the most distinguished; even the priest and the prophet, who of all men, one would think, might expect protection from Heaven, and veneration on earth, yet are slain, not abroad in the field of battle where they are out of their place, as Hophni and Phinehas, but in the sanctuary of the Lord, the place of their business, and which they hoped would have been a refuge to them. 2nd. They spared no age, not those that by reason of their tender or their decrepit age were exempted from taking up the sword, for even they perished by the sword; the young that were not yet come to bear arms, and the old that had their quietus, yet lie on the ground slain in the streets, till some kind hand is found that will bury them. 3rd. They spared no sex; "My virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword." In the most barbarous military executions that ever we read of, the virgins are spared and made part of the spoil, Num. xxxi. 28; Jud. v. 30; but here the virgins were put to the sword, as well as the young men. 4th. This was the Lord's doing, he suffered the sword of the Chaldeans to devour thus without distinction; "Thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger," for it is God that kills and makes them alive, and saves alive as he pleaseth. But that which follows is very harsh; "Thou hast killed and not pitied," for his soul is grieved for the misery of Israel. The enemies that used them thus cruelly were such as he had both mustered and summoned; ver. 22, "Thou hast called as in a solemn day my terrors round about;" that is, the Chaldeans, that are such a terror to me. Enemies crowded into Jerusalem now as thick as ever worshippers used to do on a solemn festival, so that we were quite overpowered with numbers, and "none escaped nor remained;" Jerusalem was made a perfect slaughter-house. Mothers are cut to the heart to see those whom they have taken such care of, and pains with, and whom they have been so tender of, thus inhumanly used; suddenly cut off that were not so soon reared. "Those that I have swaddled and brought up hath mine enemy consumed," as if they were brought forth for the murderer, like lambs for the butcher, Hos. ix. 13. Zion, that was a mother to them all, lamented to see those who were brought up in her courts, and under the tuition of her oracles, thus made a prey.

3. Their false prophets cheated them, ver. 14. This was a thing which Jeremiah had lamented long before, and had observed with a great concern,

Jer. xiv. 13, "Ah, Lord God, the prophets say unto them, Ye shall not see the sword." And here he inserts it among his lamentations, "Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee;" they pretended to discover for thee, and then to discover to thee, the mind and will of God, to see the visions of the Almighty, and then to speak his words: but they were all vain and foolish things, their visions were all their own fancies, and if they thought they had any it was only the product of a crazed head, or a heated imagination, as appeared by what they delivered, which was all idle and impertinent. Nay, it is most likely they themselves knew the visions they pretended were counterfeit, and all a sham, and made use of only to colour that which they designedly imposed upon the people with, that they might make an interest in them for themselves. They are thy prophets, not God's prophets; he never sent them, nor were they pastors after his heart, but the people set them up, told them what they should say, so that they were prophets after their hearts. 1st. Prophets should tell people of their faults; should shew them their sins, that they may bring them to repentance, and so prevent their ruin. But these prophets knew that would lose them the people's affections and contributions, and knew they could not reprove their hearers without reproaching themselves at the same time; and therefore, "They have not discovered thine iniquity;" they saw it not themselves, or, if they did, saw so little evil in it or danger by it, that they would not tell them of it, though that might have been a means by taking away their iniquity to turn away their captivity. 2nd. Prophets should warn people of the judgments of God coming upon them; but these saw for them false burthens. The messages they pretended to deliver to them from God they knew to be false and falsely ascribed to God, so that by soothing them up in carnal security they caused that banishment which by plain dealing they might have prevented.

4. Their neighbours laughed at them; ver. 15, "All that pass by thee clap their hands at thee." Jerusalem had made a great figure, got a great name, and borne a great sway among the nations; it was the envy and terror of all about, and when that city was thus reduced they all (as men are apt to do in such a case) triumphed in its fall; "They hissed and wagged the head," pleasing themselves to see how much it was fallen from its former pretension. "Is this the city," said they, "that men called The perfection of beauty?" Ps. l. 2. How is it now the perfection of deformity! Where is all its beauty now? "Is this the city that was" called "the joy of the whole earth," Ps. xlviii. 2; which rejoiced in the gifts of God's bounty and grace more than any other place, and which all the earth rejoiced in? where is all its joy now, and all its glorying? It is a great sin thus to make a jest of others' miseries, and adds very much affliction to the afflicted.

5. Their enemies triumphed over them, ver. 16. Those that wished ill to Jerusalem and her peace now vent their spite and malice, which before they concealed; they now open their mouths, nay, they widen them, they hiss and gnash their teeth in scorn and indignation; they triumph in their own success against her, and the rich prey they have got in making themselves masters of Jerusalem. We have swallowed her up, it is our doing, and it is our gain, it is all our own now; Jerusalem shall never be either courted or feared as she has been; certainly "this is the day that we have long looked for, we have found it, we have seen it; aha! so would we have it." Note, The enemies of the church are apt to take its shocks for its ruins, and to triumph in them accordingly. But they will find themselves deceived, for "the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church."

6. Their God in all this appeared against them; ver. 17, "The Lord hath done that which he had devised." The destroyers of Jerusalem could have no power against her unless it were given them from above. They are but the sword in God's hand, it is he that has thrown down, and has not pitied; that is, in this controversy of his with us we have not had the usual instances of his compassion towards us; "He hath caused the enemy to rejoice over thee:" see Job xxx. 11. "He hath set up the horn of thine adversaries;" hath given them power, and matter for pride. This is indeed the highest aggravation of the trouble, that God is become their enemy, and yet it is the strongest argument for patience under it. We are bound to submit to what God doth, for, 1st. It is the performance of his purpose; "The Lord has done that which he had devised." It is done with counsel and deliberation, not rashly or upon a sudden resolve; it is the evil that he has framed, Jer. xviii. 11; and we may be sure it is framed so as exactly to answer the intention. What God deviseth against his people is designed for them, and so it will be found in the issue. 2nd. It is the accomplishment of his predictions; it is the fulfilling of the Scripture. He has now put in execution "his word that he had commanded in the days of old." When he gave them his law by Moses, he told them what judgments he would certainly inflict upon them if they transgressed that law; and now they had been guilty of the transgression of this law he had executed the sentence of it, according to Lev. xxvi. 16, &c.; Deu. xxviii. 15. Note, In all the providences of God concerning his church, it is good to take notice of the fulfilling of his word; for there is an exact agreement between the judgments of God's hand and the judgments of his mouth, and when they are compared they will mutually explain and illustrate each other.

Fourthly. Comforts for the cure of these lamentations are here sought for and prescribed. 1. They are sought for and inquired after, ver. 13. The prophet seeks to find out some suitable, acceptable words to say to her in this case; Wherewith shall I "comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion?" Note, We should endeavour to comfort those whose calamities we lament; and when our passions have made the worst of them, our wisdom should correct them, and labour to make the best of them. We should study to make our sympathies with our afflicted friends turn to their consolation. Now the two most common topics of comfort in case of affliction are here tried, but are laid by because they would not hold. We commonly endeavour to comfort our friends by telling them, 1st. That their case is not singular, nor without precedent; there are many whose trouble is greater, and lies heavier upon them than theirs doth. But Jerusalem's will not admit this argument; "What thing shall I liken to thee, or what shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee?" What city, what country is there whose case is parallel to thine? What witness shall I produce to prove an example that will reach thy present calamitous event? Alas, there is none; no sorrow like thine, because there is none whose honour was like thine. 2nd. We tell them that their case is not desperate, but it may easily be remedied; but neither will that be admitted here upon a view of human probabilities, for "thy breach is great like the sea," like the breach which the sea sometimes makes upon the land, which cannot be repaired, but still grows wider and wider. Thou art wounded, and "who shall heal thee?" No wisdom or power of man can repair the desolations of such a broken, shattered state; it is to no purpose, therefore, to administer any of these common cordials; therefore, 2. The method of cure prescribed is, to address themselves to God, and by a penitent prayer to commit their case to him, and to be instant and constant in such prayers; ver. 19, "Arise," out of thy dust, out of thy despondency, "cry out in the night," watch unto prayer; when others are asleep, be thou upon thy knees, importunate with God for mercy; "in the beginning of the watches," of each of the four watches of the night, let thine eyes prevent them, (Ps. cxix. 148,) then "pour out thine heart like water before the Lord:" be free and full in prayer, be sincere and serious in prayer, open thy mind, spread thy case before the Lord: "Lift up thine hands towards him" in holy desire and expectation; beg "for the life of thy young children," these poor lambs, what have they done? 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. Take with you words, take with you these words, ver. 20, "Behold, O Lord, and consider to whom thou hast done this;" with whom thou hast dealt thus. Are they not thine own; the seed of Abraham thy friend, and of Jacob thy chosen? Lord, take their case into thy compassionate consideration. Note, Prayer is a salve for every sore, even the sorest, a remedy for every malady, even the most grievous. And our business in prayer is not to prescribe, but to subscribe to the wisdom and will of God; to refer our case to him, and then leave it with him. "Lord," behold and consider," and "thy will be done."

CHAPTER III.

The scope of this chapter is the same with that of the two foregoing chapters, but the composure is somewhat different; that was in long verse, this in short, another kind of metre; that was in single alphabets, this in a treble one. Here is, I. A sad complaint of God's displeasure, and the fruits of it, ver. 1—20. II. Words of comfort to God's people when they are in trouble and distress, ver. 21—36. III. Duty prescribed in this afflicted state, ver. 37—41. IV. The complaint renewed, ver. 42—54. V. Encouragement taken to hope in God, and continue waiting for his salvation; with an appeal to his justice against the persecutors of the church, ver. 55—63. Some make all this to be spoken by the prophet himself when he was imprisoned and persecuted, but it seems rather to be spoken in the person of the church now in captivity, and in a manner desolate; and in the desolations of which the prophet did in a particular manner interest himself. But the complaints here are somewhat more general than those in the foregoing chapter, being accommodated to the case as well of particular persons as of the public; and intended for the use of the closet rather than of the solemn assembly. Some think Jeremiah makes these complaints not only as an intercessor for Israel, but as a type of Christ, who was thought by some to be Jeremias the weeping prophet, because he was much in tears, Mat. xvi. 14, and to him many of the passages here may be applied.

I AM the man that hath seen affliction by the rod of his wrath. [into light.

20 My soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humbled

The title of the 102nd psalm might very fitly be prefixed to this chapter, "The prayer of the afflicted when he is overwhelmed, and pours out his complaint before the Lord;" for it is very feelingly and fluently that the complaint is here poured out. Let us observe the particulars of it.

First. The prophet complains that God is angry. This gives both birth and bitterness to the affliction; ver. 1, "I am the man," the remarkable man, "that hath seen affliction," and has felt it sensibly "by the rod of his wrath." Note, God is sometimes angry with his own people; yet it is to be complained of, not as a sword to cut off, but only as a rod to correct; it is to them the rod of his wrath, a chastening which, though grievous for the present, will in the issue be advantageous. By this rod we must expect to see affliction; and, if we be made to see more than ordinary affliction by that rod, we must not quarrel, for we are sure the anger is just, and the affliction mild, and mixed with mercy.

Secondly. That he is at a loss, and altogether in the dark. Darkness is put for great trouble and perplexity; that want both of comfort and of direction. This was the case of the complainant; ver. 2, "He hath led me" by his providence, and an unaccountable chain of events, "into darkness but not into light," the darkness I feared, and not into the light I hoped for. And, ver. 6, "He hath set me in dark places," dark as the grave, "like those that be dead of old," that are quite forgotten, nobody knows who or what they were. Note, The Israel of God, though children of light, sometimes walk in darkness.

Thirdly. That God appears against him as an enemy, as a professed enemy. God had been for him, but now "sorely against me is he turned," ver. 3, as far as I can discern, for "his hand is turned against me all the day, I am chastened every morning," Ps. lxxiii. 14. And when God's hand is continually turned against us we are tempted to think that his heart is turned against us too. God had said once, Hos. v. 14, "I will be as a lion to the house of Judah," and now he has made his word good; ver. 10, "He was unto me as a bear lying in wait," surprising me with his judgments, "and as a lion in secret places," so that which way soever I went, I was in continual fear of being set upon, and could never think myself safe. Do men shoot at those they are enemies to? "He hath bent his bow," the bow that was ordained against the church's persecutors, that is bent against her sons; ver. 12, "He hath set me as a mark for his arrow," which he aims at, and will be sure to hit, and then "the arrows of his quiver enter into my reins," give me a mortal wound, an inward wound, ver. 13. Note, God has many arrows in his quiver, and they fly swift, and pierce deep.

Fourthly. That he is as one sorely afflicted both in body and mind. The Jewish state may now be fitly compared to a man wrinkled with age, for which there is no remedy; ver. 4, "My flesh and my skin has he made old," they are wasted and withered, and I look like one that is ready to drop into the grave. Nay, he has broken my bones, and so disabled me to help myself; ver. 15, "He has filled me with bitterness," a bitter sense of these calamities. God has access to the spirit, and can so embitter that, as thereby to embitter all the enjoyments, as, when the stomach is foul, whatever is eaten sours in it. "He hath made me drunk with wormwood;" that is, so intoxicated me with the sense of my afflictions, that I know not what to say or do. He hath mingled gravel with my bread, so that my teeth are broken with it, ver. 16, and what I eat is neither pleasant nor nourishing. "He hath covered me with ashes," as mourners used to be; or, as some read it, He hath fed me with ashes; "I have eaten ashes like bread," Ps. cii. 9.

Fifthly. That he is not able to discern any way of escape or deliverance; ver. 5, "He hath builded against me," as forts and batteries are built against a besieged city,—where there was a way open it is now quite made up; "he hath compassed me" on every side "with gall and travel;" that is, I vex, and fret, and tire myself, to find a way of escape, but can find none; ver. 7, "He hath hedged me about that I cannot get out." When Jerusalem was besieged, it is said to be compassed in on every side, Lu. xix. 43. I am chained, and, as some notorious malefactors are double fettered and loaded with irons, so "he hath made my chain heavy." And so, ver. 9, "He hath inclosed my ways with hewn stone;" not only hedged up my way with thorns, Hos. ii. 6, but stopped it up with a stone wall, which cannot be broken through, so that "my paths are made crooked;" that is, I traverse to and fro, to the right hand, to the left, to try to get forward, but am still turned back. Those that walk in the crooked paths of sin, crossing God's laws, it is just with God to make them walk in the crooked paths of affliction, crossing their designs, and breaking their measures. So ver. 11, "He hath turned aside my ways;" that is, hath blasted all my counsels, ruined my projects, so that I am necessitated to yield to my own ruin; he hath "pulled me in pieces," he hath torn and gone away, Hos. v. 14, "and hath made me desolate," has deprived me of all society and all comfort in my own soul.

Sixthly. That God turns a deaf ear to his prayers; ver. 8, "When I cry and shout," as one in earnest, as one that would make him hear, yet "he shuts out my prayer," and will not suffer it to have access to him. God's ear useth to be open to the prayers of his people, and his door of mercy to them that knock at it; but now both are shut, even to one that cries and shouts. Thus sometimes God seems to be angry, even against the prayers of his people, Ps. lxxx. 4, and their case is deplorable indeed, when they are denied not only the benefit of an answer, but the comfort of acceptance.

Seventhly. That his neighbours make a laughing matter of his troubles; ver. 14, "I was a derision to all my people," to all the wicked among them, that made themselves and one another merry with the public judgments; and particularly the prophet Jeremiah's griefs. "I am their song," their neginoth, or hand instrument of music, their tabret, Job xvii. 6, that they play upon, as Nero on his harp when Rome was on fire.

Eighthly. That he was ready to despair of relief and deliverance. Thou hast not only taken peace from me, but hast "removed my soul far off from peace," ver. 17, so that it is not only not within reach, but not within ken. "I forgat prosperity;" it is so long since I had it, and so unlikely that I should ever recover it, that I have lost the idea of it; have been so inured to sorrow and servitude, that I know not what joy and liberty mean. I have even given up all for gone, concluding, "My strength and my hope is perished from the Lord," ver. 18; that is, I can no longer stay myself upon God as my support, for I do not find he gives me encouragement to do so; nor can I look for his appearing in my behalf, so as to put an end to my troubles, for the case seems remediless, and even my God inexorable. Without doubt it was his infirmity to say thus, Ps. lxxvii. 10; for with God there is everlasting strength, and he is his people's never-failing hope, whatever they may think.

Ninthly. That grief returned upon every remembrance of his troubles; and his reflections were as melancholy as his prospects, ver. 19, 20. Did he endeavour, as Job did, to forget his complaint, Job ix. 27, alas, it was to no purpose; he remembers upon all occasions "the affliction and the misery, the wormwood and the gall." Thus emphatically doth he speak of his affliction, for thus did he think of it, thus heavy did it lie when he reviewed it. It was an affliction that was misery itself; 'My affliction and my transgression,' so some read it, my trouble, and my sin that brought it upon me; that was the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery; it is sin that makes the cup of affliction a bitter cup. "My soul hath them still in remembrance." The captives in Babylon had all the miseries of the siege in their mind continually, and the flames and ruins of Jerusalem still before their eyes, and wept when they remembered Zion; nay, they could never forget Jerusalem, Ps. cxxxvii. 1, 5. My soul having them in remembrance, is humbled in me; not only oppressed with a sense of the trouble, but in bitterness for sin. Note, It becomes us to have humble hearts under humbling providences, and to renew our penitent humiliations for sin upon every remembrance of our afflictions and miseries. Thus we may get good by former corrections, and prevent farther.

21 This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope.
22 It is of the LORD's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not.
23 They are new every morning: great is thy faithfulness.
24 The LORD is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him.
25 The LORD is good unto them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him.
26 It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the LORD.
27 It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.
28 He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him.
29 He putteth his mouth in the dust; if so be there may be hope.
30 He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him; he is filled full with reproach.
31 For the Lord will not cast off for ever:
32 But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies.
33 For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men.
34 To crush under his feet all the prisoners of the earth,
35 To turn aside the right of a man before the face of the most High,
36 To subvert a man in his cause, the Lord approveth not.

Here the clouds begin to scatter, and the sky to clear up. The complaint was very melancholy in the former part of the chapter, and yet here the tune is altered, and the mourners in Zion begin to look a little pleasant. But for hope the heart would break. To save the heart from being quite broken, here is something called to mind, which gives ground for hope, ver. 21, which refers to what comes after, not to what goes before,—this that follows, 'I make to return to my heart,' so the margin words it. What we have had in our hearts, and have laid to our hearts, is sometimes as if it were quite lost and forgotten, till God by his grace make it return to our hearts, that it may be ready to us when we have occasion to use it. "I recall it to mind, therefore have I hope," and am kept from downright despair. Let us see what these things are which he calls to mind.

First. That, as bad as things are, it is owing to the mercy of God that they are not worse. We are afflicted by the rod of his wrath, but "it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed," ver. 22. When we are in distress, we should, for the encouragement of our faith and hope, observe what makes for us, as well as what makes against us. Things are bad, but they might have been worse, and therefore there is hope they may be better. Observe here, 1. The streams of mercy acknowledged: "We are not consumed." Note, The church of God is like Moses' bush, burning, yet not consumed; whatever hardships it has met with, or may meet with, it shall have a being in the world to the end of time. It is persecuted of men, but not forsaken of God; and therefore, though it is cast down, it is not destroyed, 2 Cor. iv. 9; corrected, yet not consumed; refined in the furnace as silver, yet not consumed as dross. 2. These streams followed up to the fountain: "It is of the Lord's mercies." Here are mercies in the plural number, noting the abundance and variety of those mercies God is an inexhaustible fountain of mercy, the Father of mercies. Note, We all owe it to the sparing mercy of God that we are not consumed. Others have been consumed round about us, and we ourselves have been in the consuming, and yet we are not consumed; we are out of the grave, we are out of hell. Had we been dealt with according to our sin, we had been consumed long ago; but we have been dealt with according to God's mercies, and we are bound to acknowledge it to his praise.

Secondly. That even in the depth of their affliction they still have experience of the tenderness of the Divine pity, and the truth of the Divine promise. They had several times complained that God had not pitied, ch. ii. 17, 21; but here they correct themselves, and own, 1. That God's "compassions fail not." They do not really fail, no, not then when in anger he seems to have shut up his tender mercies. These rivers of mercy run fully and constantly, but never run dry. No, "they are new every morning;" that is, every morning we have fresh instances of God's compassion towards us; he visits us with them every morning, Job vii. 18; "Every morning doth he bring his judgment to light," Zeph. iii. 5. When our comforts fail, yet God's compassions do not. 2. That great is his faithfulness. Though the covenant seemed to be broken, they own that it still continues in full force; and though Jerusalem be in ruins, "the truth of the Lord endures for ever." Note, Whatever hard things we suffer, we must never entertain any hard thoughts of God, but must still be ready to own that he is both kind and faithful.

Thirdly. That God is and ever will be the all-sufficient happiness of his people, and they have chosen him, and depend upon him to be so; ver. 24, "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul." That is, 1. When I have lost all I have in the world, liberty, and livelihood, and almost life itself, yet I have not lost my interest in God. Portions on earth are perishing things, but God is a portion for ever. 2. While I have an interest in God, therein I have enough. I have that which is sufficient to balance all my troubles, and make up all my losses. Whatever we are robbed of, our portion is safe. 3. This is that which I depend upon, and rest satisfied with; "therefore will I hope in him." I will stay myself upon him, and encourage myself in him, when all other supports and encouragements fail me. Note, It is our duty to make God the portion of our souls, and then to make use of him as our portion, and to take the comfort of it in the midst of our lamentations.

Fourthly. That those who deal with God will find it is not in vain to trust in him; for, 1. He is good to those that do so, ver. 25. He is good to all, his tender mercies are over all his works, all his creatures taste of his goodness; but he is in a particular manner "good to them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him." Note, While trouble is prolonged, and deliverance is deferred, we must patiently wait for God and his gracious returns to us; while we wait for him by faith we must seek him by prayer; our souls must seek him, else we do not seek so as to find. Our seeking will help to keep up our waiting; and to those who thus wait and seek God will be gracious; he will shew them his marvellous lovingkindness. 2. They that do so will find it good for them; ver. 26, "It is good," it is our duty, and will be our unspeakable comfort and satisfaction "to hope and quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord." To hope that it will come, though the difficulties that lie in the way of it seem insupportable; to wait till it doth come, though it be long delayed; and while we wait to be quiet and silent, not quarrelling with God, or making ourselves uneasy, but acquiescing in the Divine disposals; "Father, thy will be done." If we call this to mind, we may have hope that all will end well at last.

Fifthly. That afflictions are really good for us; and if we bear them aright will work very much for our good. It is not only good to hope and wait for the salvation, but it is good to be under the trouble in the mean time; ver. 27, "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth." Many of the young men were carried into captivity, and, to make them easy in it, he tells them it was good for them to bear the yoke of that captivity; and they would find it so if they would but accommodate themselves to their condition, and labour to answer God's ends in laying that heavy yoke upon them. It is very applicable to the yoke of God's commands; it is good for young people to take that yoke upon them in their youth. We cannot begin too soon to be religious; it will make our duty the more acceptable to God, and easy to ourselves, if we engage in it when we are young. But here it seems to be meant of the yoke of affliction; many have found it good to bear this in youth; it has made them humble and serious, and hath weaned them from this world, who otherwise would have been proud and unruly, and as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke. But when do we bear the yoke so as that it is really good for us to bear it in youth? He answers in the following verses:

1. When we are sedate and quiet under our afflictions; when we sit alone, and keep silence, do not run to and fro into all companies with our complaints, aggravating our calamities, and quarrelling with the disposals of Providence concerning us, but retire into privacy that we may in a day of adversity consider; sit alone that we may converse with God, and commune with our own hearts, silencing all discontented, distrustful thoughts, and laying our hand upon our mouth, as Aaron, who under a very severe trial held his peace. We must keep silence under the yoke, as those that have borne it upon us; not wilfully pulled it upon our own necks, but patiently submitted to it when God laid it upon us. When those that are afflicted in their youth accommodate themselves to their afflictions, fit their necks to the yoke, and study to answer God's end in afflicting them, then they will find it good for them to bear it, for "it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who are" thus "exercised thereby."

2. When we are humble and patient under our affliction. He gets good by the yoke that puts his mouth in the dust; not only lays his hand upon his mouth, in token of submission to the will of God in the affliction, but puts it in the dust, in token of sorrow, and shame, and self-loathing, at the remembrance of sin, and as one perfectly reduced and reclaimed, and brought as those that are vanquished to lick the dust, Ps. lxxii. 9. And we must thus humble ourselves, "if so be there may be hope," or, as it is in the original, 'peradventure there is hope.' If there be any way to acquire and secure a good hope under our afflictions, it is this way, and yet we must be very modest in our expectation of it, must look for it with an 'it may be,' as those that own ourselves utterly unworthy of it. Note, Those that are truly humbled for sin will be glad to obtain a good hope through grace upon any terms, though they put their mouth in the dust for it; and those that would have hope must do so, and ascribe it to free grace if they have any encouragements which may keep their hearts from sinking into the dust when they put their mouth there.

3. When we are meek and mild towards those that are the instruments of our trouble, and are of a forgiving spirit, ver. 30. He gets good by the yoke that giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him, and rather turns the other cheek (Mat. v. 39) than returns the second blow. Our Lord Jesus has left us an example of this, for "he gave his back to the smiters," Isa. l. 6. He that can bear contempt and reproach, and not render railing for railing, and bitterness for bitterness, that when he is filled full with reproach keeps it to himself, and doth not retort it, and empty it again upon those that filled him with it, but pours it out before the Lord, (as those did, Ps. cxxiii. 4, whose souls were exceedingly filled with the contempt of the proud,) he shall find it good to bear the yoke, and that it shall turn to his spiritual advantage. The sum is, If tribulation work patience, that patience will work experience, and that experience a hope that maketh not ashamed.

Sixthly. That God will graciously return to his people with seasonable comforts according to the time that he has afflicted them, ver. 31, 32. Therefore the sufferer is thus penitent, thus patient, because he believes that God is gracious and merciful, which is the great inducement both to evangelical repentance and to Christian patience. We may bear up ourselves with this, 1. That when we are cast down, yet we are not cast off. The father's correcting his son is not a disinheriting of him. 2. That though we may seem to be cast off for a time, while sensible comforts are suspended, and desired salvations deferred, yet we are not really cast off, because not cast off for ever; the controversy with us shall not be perpetual. 3. That, whatever sorrow we are in, it is what God has allotted us, and his hand is in it. It is he that causeth grief, and therefore we may be sure it is ordered wisely and graciously; and it is but for a season and when need is, that we are in heaviness, 1 Pet. i. 6. 4. That God hath compassions and comforts in store, even for those whom he hath himself grieved. We must be far from thinking that, though God cause grief, the world will relieve and help us; no, the very same that caused the grief must bring in the favour, or we are undone; una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit,—'the same hand inflicts the wound that heals it.' He hath torn, and he will heal us, Hos. vi. 1. 5. That when God returns to deal graciously with us it will not be according to our merits, but according to his mercies, according to the multitude, the abundance of his mercies. So unworthy we are, that nothing but an abundant mercy will relieve us, and from that what may we not expect? And God's causing our grief ought to be no discouragement at all to those expectations.

Seventhly. That when God doth cause grief it is for wise and holy ends; and he takes not delight in our calamities, ver. 33. He doth indeed afflict and grieve the children of men, all their grievances and afflictions are from him; but he doth not do it willingly, not from the heart, so the word is; that is, 1. He never afflicts us but when we give him cause to do it. He doth not dispense his frowns as he doth his favours, ex mero motu,—'from his mere good pleasure;' if he shew us kindness it is because so it seemeth good unto him; but if he write bitter things against us, it is because we both deserve it and need it. 2. He doth not afflict with pleasure. He delights not in the death of sinners, or the disquiet of saints, but punisheth with a kind of reluctancy; he comes out of his place to punish, for his place is the mercy seat. He delights not in the misery of any of his creatures; but for his own people he is so far from it, that in all their afflictions he is afflicted, and his soul is grieved for the misery of Israel. 3. He retains his kindness for his people even when he afflicts them. If he doth not willingly grieve the children of men, much less his own children. However it be, yet God is good to them, Ps. lxxiii. 1; and they may by faith see love in his heart, even then when they see frowns in his face, and a rod in his hand.

Eighthly. That though he makes use of men as his hand, or rather instruments in his hand, for the correcting of his people, yet he is far from being pleased with the injustice of their proceedings and the wrong they do them, ver. 34—36. Though God serve his own purposes by the violence of wicked and unreasonable men, yet it doth not therefore follow that he countenanceth that violence, as his oppressed people are sometimes tempted to think; Hab. i. 13, "Wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously?" Two ways the people of God are injured and oppressed by their enemies, and the prophet here assures us that God doth not approve of either of them. 1. If men injure them by force of arms, God doth not approve of that. He doth not himself crush under his feet the prisoners of the earth, but he regards the cry of the prisoners; nor doth he approve of men's doing it, nay, he is much displeased with it. It is barbarous to trample on them that are down, and to crush those that are bound, and cannot help themselves. 2. If men injure them under colour of law, and in the pretended administration of justice, if they turn aside the right of a man so that he cannot discover what his rights are, or cannot come at them, they are out of his reach—if they subvert a man in his cause, and bring in a wrong verdict, or give a false judgment—let them know, 1st. That God sees them. It is before the face of the Most High, ver. 53, it is in his sight, under his eye, and is very displeasing to him; they cannot but know it is so, and therefore it is in defiance of him that they do it. He is the Most High, whose authority over them they contemn, by abusing their authority over their subjects; not considering that He that is higher than the highest regardeth, Eccl. v. 8. 2nd. That God doth not approve of them. More is implied than is expressed. The perverting of justice, and the subverting of the just, is a great affront to God; and though he may make use of this for the correction of his people, yet he will sooner or later severely reckon with those that do thus. Note, However God may for a time suffer evil doers to prosper, and serve his own purposes by them, yet he doth not therefore approve of their evil doings. Far be it from God that he should do iniquity, or countenance those that do it.

37 Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the Lord commandeth it not? [and good?
38 Out of the mouth of the most High proceedeth not evil
39 Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? [LORD.
40 Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the 41 Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens.

That we may be entitled to the comforts administered to the afflicted in the foregoing verses, and may taste the sweetness of them, we have here the duties of an afflicted state prescribed to us, in the performance of which we may expect those comforts.

First. We must see and acknowledge the hand of God in all the calamities that befall us at any time, whether personal or public, ver. 37, 38. This is here laid down as a great truth, which will help to quiet our spirits under our afflictions, and to sanctify them to us. 1. That, whatever men's actions are, it is God that overrules them; "Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass," that is, that designs a thing, and brings his designs to effect, "if the Lord commandeth it not?" Men can do nothing but according to the counsel of God, nor have any power or success but what is given them from above. "A man's heart deviseth his way," he projects and purposeth, he saith he will do so and so, Jas. iv. 13; but the Lord directeth his steps far otherwise than he designed them, and what he contrived and expected doth not come to pass unless it be what God's hand and his counsel had determined before to be done, Pr. xvi. 9; Jer. x. 23. The Chaldeans said they would destroy Jerusalem, and it came to pass, not because they said it, but because God commanded it, and commissioned them to do it. Note, Men are but tools which the great God makes use of, and manageth as he pleaseth in the government of this lower world, and they cannot accomplish any of their designs without him. 2. That, whatever men's lot is, it is God that orders it; "Out of the mouth of the Most High doth not evil and good proceed?" Yes, certainly it doth; and it is more emphatically expressed in the original: 'Doth not this evil, and this good, proceed out of the mouth of the Most High?' Is it not what he has ordained and appointed for us? Yes, certainly it is; and for the reconciling of us to our own afflictions, whatever they be, this general truth must thus be particularly applied. This comfort I receive from the hand of God, and shall I not receive that evil also? as Job argues, ch. ii. 10. Are we healthful or sickly, rich or poor? do we succeed in our designs or are we crossed in them? It is all what God ordereth; "every man's judgment proceedeth from him." "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away;" he forms "the light and creates the darkness," as he did at first. Note, All the events of Divine providence are the products of a Divine counsel; whatever is done God has the directing of it, and the works of his hands agree with the words of his mouth,—he speaks and it is done; so easily, so effectually, are all his purposes fulfilled.

Secondly. We must not quarrel with God for any affliction that he lays upon us at any time; ver. 29, "Wherefore doth a living man complain?" The prophet here seems to check himself for the complaints he had made in the former part of the chapter, wherein he seemed to reflect upon God as unkind and severe. Do I well to be angry? Why do I fret thus? Those who in their haste have chidden with God must in the reflection chide themselves for it. From the doctrine of God's sovereign and universal providence which he had asserted in the verses before, he draws this inference, "Wherefore doth a living man complain?" What God doth we must not open our mouths against, Ps. xxxix. 9. They that blame their lot reproach him that allotted it to them. The sufferers in the captivity must submit to the will of God in all their sufferings. Note, Though we may pour out our complaints before God, we must never exhibit any complaints against God. What, "shall a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins!" The reasons here urged are very cogent. 1. We are men; let us herein shew ourselves men. Shall "a man complain?" and again, "a man!" We are men, and not brutes, reasonable creatures, that should act with reason, that should look upwards, and look forwards, and both ways may fetch considerations enough to silence our complaints. We are men, and not children that cry for every thing that hurts them; we are men, and not gods, subjects, not lords, are not our own masters, nor our own carvers, we are bound and must obey, must submit. We are men, and not angels, and therefore cannot expect to be free from troubles as they are; we are not inhabitants of that world where there is no sorrow, but this, where there is nothing but sorrow. We are men, and not devils, are not in that deplorable, helpless, hopeless state that they are in, but have something to comfort ourselves with which they have not. 2. We are living men; through the good hand of our God upon us we are alive yet, though dying daily; and shall "a living man complain?" No, he has more reason to be thankful for life than to complain of any of the burthens and calamities of life. Our lives are frail, and forfeited, and yet we are alive; now the living, the living they should praise, and not complain, Isa. xxxviii. 19. While there is life there is hope, and therefore, instead of complaining that things are bad, we should encourage ourselves with hopes that they will be better. 3. We are sinful men, and that which we complain of is the just punishment of our sins, nay, it is far less than our iniquities have deserved. We have little reason to complain of our trouble, for it is our own doing, we may thank ourselves, our own wickedness corrects us, Pr. xix. 3; no reason to quarrel with God, for he is righteous in it: he is the governor of the world, and it is necessary he should maintain the honour of his government by chastising the disobedient. Are we suffering for our sins, then let us not complain, for we have other work to do,—instead of repining, we must be repenting; and, as an evidence that God is reconciled to us, we must be endeavouring to reconcile ourselves to his holy will. Are we punished for our sins? It is our wisdom then to submit, and to kiss the rod; for, if we still walk contrary to God, he will punish us yet seven times more, for when he judgeth he will overcome; but if we accommodate ourselves to him, though we be chastened of the Lord, we shall not be condemned with the world.

Thirdly. We must set ourselves to answer God's intention in afflicting us, which is to bring sin to our remembrance, and to bring us home to himself, ver. 40. These are the two things which our afflictions should put us upon: 1. A serious consideration of ourselves, and a reflection upon our lives past. "Let us search and try our ways," search what they have been, and then try whether they have been right and good, or no. Search as for a malefactor in disguise that flies and hides himself, and then try whether guilty or not guilty. Let conscience be employed both to search and to try, and let it have leave to deal faithfully, to accomplish a diligent search, and to make an impartial trial. Let us try our ways, that by them we may try ourselves; for we are to judge of our state, not by our faint wishes, but by our steps; not by one particular step, but by our ways; the ends we aim at, the rules we go by, and the agreeableness of the temper of our minds, and the tenor of our lives to those ends and those rules. When we are in affliction it is seasonable to consider our ways, Hag. i. 5, that what is amiss may be repented of and amended for the future, and so we may answer the intention of the affliction. We are apt in times of public calamity to reflect upon other people's ways, and lay blame upon them, whereas our business is to search and try our own ways. We have work enough to do at home; we must each of us say, What have I done? What have I contributed to the public flames? that we may each of us mend one, and then we should all be mended. 2. A sincere conversion to God. Let us turn again to the Lord, to him who is turned against us, and whom we have turned from; to him let us turn by repentance and reformation, as to our owner and ruler. We have been with him, and it has never been well with us since we forsook him; let us therefore now turn again to him. This must accompany the former, and be the fruit of it; therefore we must search and try our ways, that we may turn from the evil of them to God. This was the method David took, Ps. cxix. 59, "I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies."

Fourthly. We must offer up ourselves to God, and our best affections and services in the flames of devotion, ver. 41. When we are in affliction, 1. We must look up to God as a God in the heavens, infinitely above us, and that has an incontestable dominion over us, for the heavens do rule, and are therefore not to be quarrelled with, but submitted to. 2. We must pray to him with a believing expectation to receive mercy from him; for that is implied in our lifting up our hands to him,—a gesture commonly used in prayer, and sometimes put for it, as Ps. cxli. 2, "Let the lifting up of my hands be acceptable in thy sight;" it signifies our requesting mercy from him, and our readiness to receive that mercy. 3. Our hearts must go along with our prayers. We must "lift up our hearts with our hands," as we must pour out our souls with our words. It is the heart that God looks at in that and every other service; for what will a sacrifice without a heart avail? If inward impressions be not in some measure answerable to outward expressions, we do but mock God and deceive ourselves. Praying is lifting up the soul to God, Ps. xxv. 1, as to our Father in heaven; and the soul that hopes to be with God in heaven for ever will thus, by frequent acts of devotion, be still learning the way thither, and pressing forward in that way.

42 We have transgressed and have rebelled: thou hast not pardoned.
43 Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us: thou hast slain, thou hast not pitied.
44 Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass through.
45 Thou hast made us as the offscouring and refuse in the midst of the people.
46 All our enemies have opened their mouths against us.
47 Fear and a snare is come upon us, desolation and destruction.
48 Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water for the destruction of the daughter of my people.
49 Mine eye trickleth down, and ceaseth not, without any intermission,
50 Till the LORD look down, and behold from heaven.
51 Mine eye affecteth mine heart because of all the daughters of my city.
52 Mine enemies chased me sore, like a bird, without cause.
53 They have cut off my life in the dungeon, and cast a stone upon me.
54 Waters flowed over mine head; then I said, I am cut off.

It is easier to chide ourselves for complaining than to chide ourselves out of it. The prophet had owned that a living man should not complain, as if he checked himself for his complaints in the former part of the chapter; and yet here "the clouds return after the rain," and the wound bleeds afresh; for great pains must be taken with a troubled spirit to bring it into temper.

First. They confess the righteousness of God in afflicting them; ver. 42, "We have transgressed and have rebelled." Note, It becomes us when we are in trouble, to justify God by owning our sins, and laying the load upon ourselves for them. Call sin a transgression, call it a rebellion, and we do not miscall it. This is the result of their searching and trying their ways; the more they inquired into them, the worse they found them.

Secondly. Yet they complain of the afflictions they are under, not without some reflections upon God, which we are not to imitate, but under the sharpest trials must always think and speak highly and kindly of him.

1. They complain of his frowns, and the tokens of his displeasure against them. Their sins were repented of, and yet, ver. 42, "Thou hast not pardoned;" they had not the assurance and comfort of the pardon. The judgments brought upon them for their sins were not removed, and therefore they thought they could not say the sin was pardoned, which was a mistake; but a common mistake with the people of God, when their souls are cast down and disquieted within them. Their case was really piteous, yet they complain, "Thou hast not pitied," ver. 43. Their enemies persecuted and slew them, but that was not the worst of it, they were but the instruments in God's hand; "Thou hast persecuted us, and thou hast slain us," though we expected thou shouldest have protected and delivered us. They complain, that there was a wall of partition between them and God, and, 1st. This hindered God's favours from coming down upon them. The reflected beams of God's kindness to them used to be the beauty of Israel, but now thou hast covered us with anger, so that our glory is concealed and gone; now God is angry with us, and we do not appear that illustrious people that we have formerly been thought to be. Or, thou hast covered us up as men that are buried, are covered up and forgotten. 2nd. It hindered their prayers from coming up unto God; ver. 44, "Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud," not like that bright cloud in which he took possession of the temple, which enabled the worshippers to draw near to him, but like that in which he came down upon mount Sinai, which obliged the people to stand at a distance. This cloud is so thick that our prayers seem as if they were lost in it; they cannot pass through, we cannot obtain an audience. Note, The prolonging of troubles is sometimes a temptation, even to praying people, to question whether God be what they have always believed him to be, a prayer-hearing God.

2. They complain of the contempt of their neighbours, and the reproach and ignominy they were under; ver. 45, "Thou hast made us as the offscouring," or scrapings of the first floor, which are thrown to the dunghill. This St. Paul refers to in his account of the sufferings of the apostles; 1 Cor. iv. 13, "We are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things." We are the refuse or dross in the midst of the people, trodden upon by everybody, and looked upon as the vilest of the nations, and good for nothing but to be cast out as salt which has lost its savour. And, ver. 46, "Our enemies have opened their mouths against us," have gaped upon us as roaring lions to swallow us up, or made mouths at us, or have taken liberty to say what they please of us. These complaints we had before, ch. ii. 15, 16. Note, It is common for base and ill-natured men to run upon, and run down, those that are fallen into the depths of distress, from the height of honour. But this they brought upon themselves by sin; if they had not made themselves vile, their enemies could not have made them so; but therefore "men call them reprobate silver because the Lord has rejected them," for rejecting him.

3. They complain of the lamentable destruction that their enemies made of them; ver. 47, "Fear and a snare is come upon us;" the enemies have not only terrified us with those alarms, but prevailed against us by their stratagems, and surprised us with the ambushes they laid for us. And then follows nothing but desolation and destruction; "the destruction of the daughter of my people," ver. 48, of all the daughters of my city, ver. 51. The enemies have taken some of them, like a bird in a snare; chased others, as a harmless bird is chased by a bird of prey; ver. 52, "Mine enemies chased me sore like a bird," which is chased from bush to bush, as Saul hunted David, like a partridge. Thus restless was the enmity of their persecutors, and yet causeless; they have done it without cause, without any provocation given them. Though God was righteous, they were unrighteous. David often complains of those that hated him without cause, and such are the enemies of Christ and his church, Jno. xv. 25. Their enemies chased them till they had quite prevailed over them; ver. 53, "They have cut off my life in the dungeon;" they have shut up their captives in close and dark prisons, where they are as it were cut off from the land of the living, ver. 6; or the state and kingdom is sunk and ruined, the life and being of it is gone, and it is as it were thrown into the dungeon or grave, and a stone cast upon it, such as used to be rolled to the door of the sepulchres. They look upon the Jewish nation as dead and buried, and that there is no possibility of its resurrection. Thus Ezekiel saw it in vision, a valley full of dead and dry bones. Their destruction is compared, not only to the burying of a dead man, but to the sinking of a living man into the water, who cannot long be a living man there; ver. 54, "Waters" of affliction "flowed over mine head;" the deluge prevailed, and quite overwhelmed them; the Chaldean forces broke in upon them, as the breaking forth of waters, which rose so high as to flow over their heads. They could not wade, they could not swim, and therefore must unavoidably sink. Note, The distresses of God's people sometimes prevail to that degree, that they cannot find any footing for their faith, nor keep their head above water, with any comfortable expectation.

4. They complain of their own excessive grief and fear upon this account. 1st. The afflicted church is drowned in tears, and the prophet for her; ver. 48, 49, "Mine eye runs down with rivers of water," so abundant was their weeping; "it trickleth down, and ceaseth not," so constant was their weeping; "without any intermission," there being no relaxation of their miseries. The distemper was in continual extremity, and they had no better day. It is added, ver. 51, "Mine eye affecteth mine heart," my seeing eye affects my heart; the more I look upon the desolations of the city and country, the more I am grieved; which way soever I cast mine eye I see that which renews my sorrow, even "because of all the daughters of my city;" that is, all the neighbouring towns which were as daughters to Jerusalem, the mother city. Or, my weeping eye affects my heart; the venting of the grief, instead of easing it, did but increase and exasperate it. Or, mine eye melteth my soul, that is, I have quite wept away my spirit; not only mine eye is consumed with grief, but my soul and my life is spent with it, Ps. xxxi. 9, 10. Great and long grief exhausts the spirits, and brings not only many a gray head, but many a green head too, to the grave. I weep, saith the prophet, 'more than all the daughters of my city,' so the margin reads it; he outdid even those of the tender sex in the expressions of grief. And it is no diminution to any to be much in tears for the sins of sinners, and the sufferings of saints. Our Lord Jesus was so; for when he came near he beheld this same city, and wept over it, which the daughters of Jerusalem did not. 2nd. She is overwhelmed with fears; not only grieves for what is, but fears worse, and gives up all for gone, ver. 54. Then I said, I am cut off, ruined, and see no hope of recovery; I am as one dead. Note, Those that are cast down are commonly tempted to think themselves cast off, Ps. xxxi. 22; Jonah ii. 4.

5. In the midst of these sad complaints here is one word of comfort, by which it appears that their case was not altogether so bad as they made it, ver. 50. We continue thus weeping "till the Lord look down and behold from heaven." This intimates, 1st. That they were satisfied God's gracious regard to them in their miseries would be an effectual redress of all their grievances. If God, who now covers himself with a cloud, as if he took no notice of our troubles, (Job xxii. 13,) would but shine forth, all would be well. If he look upon us we shall be saved, Ps. lxxx. 19; Dan. ix. 17. As bad as the case is, one favourable look from heaven will set all to rights. 2nd. That they had hopes he would at length look graciously upon them, and relieve them; nay, they take it for granted that he will. Though he contend long, he will not contend for ever, though we deserve he should. 3rd. That while they continued weeping, they continued waiting; and neither did nor would expect relief and succour from any hand but his. Nothing shall comfort them but his gracious returns, nor shall any thing wipe tears from their eyes till he look down. Their eyes, which now run down with water, shall still wait upon the Lord their God until that he have mercy upon them, Ps. cxxiii. 2.

55 I called upon thy name, O LORD, out of the low dungeon.
56 Thou hast heard my voice: hide not thine ear at my breathing, at my cry.
57 Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee: thou saidst, Fear not.
58 O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul; thou hast redeemed my life.
59 O LORD, thou hast seen my wrong: judge thou my cause.
60 Thou hast seen all their vengeance and all their imaginations against me.
61 Thou hast heard their reproach, O LORD, and all their imaginations against me;
62 The lips of those that rose up against me, and their device against me all the day. [their musick.
63 Behold their sitting down, and their rising up; I am
64 Render unto them a recompence, O LORD, according to the work of their hands.
65 Give them sorrow of heart, thy curse unto them.
66 Persecute and destroy them in anger from under the heavens of the LORD.

We may observe throughout this chapter a struggle in the prophet's breast between sense and faith, fear and hope. He complains, and then comforts himself, yet drops his comforts, and returns again to his complaints, as Ps. xlii. But as there, so here, faith gets the last word, and comes off a conqueror, for in these verses he concludes with some comfort; and here are two things with which he comforts himself:

First His experience of God's goodness, even in his affliction. This may refer to the prophet's personal experience, with which he encourageth himself in reference to the public troubles. He that has seasonably succoured particular saints will not fail the church in general. Or, it may include the remnant of good people that were among the Jews, who had found it was not in vain to wait upon God. In three things the prophet and his pious friends had found God good to them: 1. He had heard their prayers. Though they had been ready to fear that the cloud of wrath was such as their prayers could not pass through, ver. 44; yet upon second thoughts, or at least upon farther trial, they find it otherwise, and that God had not said unto them, Seek ye me in vain. When they were in the low dungeon, as free among the dead, they called upon God's name, ver. 55; their weeping did not hinder praying. Note, Though we are cast into never so low a dungeon, we may from thence find a way of access to God in the highest heavens; "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee," Ps. cxxx. 1; as Jonah out of the whale's belly. And could God hear them out of the low dungeon, and would he? Yes, he did. "Thou hast heard my voice;" and some read the following words as carrying on the same thankful acknowledgment, "Thou didst not hide thine ear at my breathing, at my cry;" and the original will bear that reading. We read it as a petition for farther audience; "Hide not thine ear." God's having heard our voice when we cried unto him, even out of the low dungeon, is an encouragement to us to hope that he will not at any time hide his ear. Observe how he calls prayer his breathing; for in prayer we breathe towards God,—we breathe after him. Though we be but weak in prayer, cannot cry aloud, but only breathe in "groanings that cannot be uttered," yet we shall not be neglected, if we be sincere. Prayer is the breath of the new man, sucking in the air of mercy in petitions, and returning it in praises; it is both the evidence and the maintenance of the spiritual life. Some read it, at my gasping; when I lay gasping for life, and ready to expire, and thought I was breathing my last, then thou tookest cognizance of my distressed case. 2nd. He had silenced their fears, and quieted their spirits; ver. 57, "Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee;" that is, thou didst graciously assure me of thy presence with me, and give me to see thee nigh unto me, whereas I had thought thee to be at a distance from me. Note, When we draw nigh to God in a way of duty, we may by faith see him drawing nigh to us in a way of mercy. But this was not all, "Thou saidst, Fear not." This was the language of God's prophets, preaching to them not to fear, Isa. xli. 10, 13. Of his providence preventing those things which they were afraid of, and of his grace quieting their minds, and making them easy, by the witness of his Spirit with their spirits, that they were his people still, though in distress, and therefore ought not to fear. 3rd. He had already begun to appear for them; ver. 58, "O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul;" that is, as it follows, "Thou hast redeemed my life," hast rescued that out of the hands of those which would have taken it away, hast saved that when it was ready to be swallowed up, hast given me that for a prey. And this is an encouragement to them to hope that he would yet farther appear for them; "Thou hast delivered my soul from death," and therefore wilt deliver my feet from falling; hast pleaded the causes of my life, and therefore wilt plead my other causes.

Secondly. He comforts himself with an appeal to God's justice, and, in order to the sentence of that, to his omniscience.

1. He appeals to God's knowledge of the matter of fact, how very spiteful and malicious his enemies were; ver. 59, "O Lord, thou hast seen my wrong," that I have done no wrong at all, but suffer a great deal. He that knows all things knew, 1st. The malice they had against him; "Thou hast seen all their vengeance;" how they desire to do me a mischief, as if it were by way of reprisal for some great injury I had done them. Note, We should consider to our terror and caution, that God knows all the revengeful thoughts we have in our minds against others, and therefore not allow of those thoughts, nor harbour them. And that he knows all the revengeful thoughts others have causelessly in their minds against us, and therefore not be afraid of them, but leave it to him to protect us from them. 2nd. The designs and projects they had laid to do him a mischief; "Thou hast seen all their imagination against me," ver. 60; and again, ver. 61, "Thou hast heard all their imaginations against me," both the desire and the device they have to ruin me: whether it shew itself in word or deed it is known to thee; nay, though the products of it are not to be seen or heard, yet their device against me all the day is perceived and understood by him to whom all things are naked and open. Note, The most secret contrivances of the church's enemies are perfectly known to the church's God, from whom they can hide nothing. 3rd. The contempt and calumny wherewith they loaded him; all that they spoke slightly of him, and all that they spoke reproachfully. "Thou hast heard their reproach," ver. 61; all the ill characters they give me, laying to my charge things that I know not, all the methods they use to make me odious and contemptible, even "the lips of those that rose up against me," ver. 62, the contumelious language they use whenever they speak of me; and that at "their sitting down and rising up," when they lie down at night and get up in the morning, when they sit down to their meat, and with their company, and when they rise from both, still "I am their music;" they make themselves and one another merry with my miseries, as the Philistines made sport with Samson; Jerusalem was the tabret they played upon. Perhaps they had some tune, or play, some opera or interlude, that was called, The destruction of Jerusalem, which, though in the nature of a tragedy, was very entertaining to those who wished ill to the holy city. Note, God will one day call sinners to an account for all the hard speeches which they have spoken against him and his people, Jude 15.

2. He appeals to God's judgment upon this fact; "Lord, thou hast seen my wrong;" there is no need of any evidence to prove it, or any prosecutor to enforce or aggravate it, thou seest it in its true colours, and now I leave it with thee, "Judge thou my cause," ver. 59. Let them be dealt with, 1st. As they deserve; ver. 64, "Render to them a recompence according to the work of their hands," that is, let them be dealt with as they have dealt with others; let thy hand be against them as their hand hath been against us. They have created us a great deal of vexation; now, Lord, "give them sorrow of heart," ver. 65. 'Perplexity of heart,' so some read it; let them be surrounded with threatening mischiefs on all sides, and not able to see their way out. 'Despondency of heart,' so others read it; let them be driven to despair, and give themselves up for gone. God can entangle the head that thinks itself clearest, and sink the heart that thinks itself stoutest. 2nd. Let them be dealt with according to the threatenings; "Thy curse unto them," that is, let thy curse come upon them, all the evils that are pronounced in thy word against the enemies of thy people. ver. 65. They have loaded us with curses; "As they loved cursing, so let it come unto them," thy curse, which will make them truly miserable. Theirs is causeless, and therefore fruitless, it shall not come; but thine is just, and shall take effect. Those whom thou cursest are cursed indeed. Let the curse be executed; ver. 66, "Persecute and destroy them in anger," as they persecute and destroy us in their anger. "Destroy them from under the heavens of the Lord;" let them have no benefit of the light and influence of the heavens. Destroy them in such a manner as that all that see it may say, It is a destruction from the Almighty, who sits in the heavens and laughs at them, Ps. ii. 4, and may own that the heavens do rule, Dan. iv. 26. What is said of the idols is here said of their worshippers, who in this also shall be like unto them; "They shall perish from under these heavens," Jer. x. 11. They shall not only be excluded from the happiness of the invisible heavens, but cut off from the comfort even of these visible ones, which are the heavens of the Lord, Ps. cxv. 16, and which they therefore are unworthy to be taken under the protection of that rebel against him.

CHAPTER IV.

This chapter is another single alphabet of lamentations for the destruction of Jerusalem, like those in the first two chapters. I. The prophet here laments the injuries and indignities done to those that respect used to be shewed to, ver. 1, 2. II. He laments the direful effects of the famine, which they were reduced to by the siege, ver. 8—10. III. He laments the taking and sacking of Jerusalem, and its amazing desolations, ver. 11, 12. IV. He acknowledgeth that the sins of their leaders were the cause of all these calamities, ver. 14—16. V. He gives up all as doomed to utter ruin, for their enemies were quite too hard for them, ver. 17—20. VI. He foretells the destruction of the Edomites, who triumphed in Jerusalem's fall, ver. 21. V. He foretells the return of the captivity of Zion at last, ver. 22.

HOW is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed!
The stones of the sanctuary are poured out in the top of every street.
2 The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold,
How are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter!
3 Even the sea monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones:
The daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness.
4 The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst:
The young children ask bread, and no man breaketh it unto them.
5 They that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets:
They that were brought up in scarlet embrace dunghills.
6 For the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom,
That was overthrown as in a moment, and no hands stayed on her. [than milk,
7 Her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter
They were more ruddy in body than rubies, their polishing was of sapphire:
8 Their visage is blacker than a coal; they are not known in the streets:
Their skin cleaveth to their bones; it is withered, it is become like a stick.

9 They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger:
For these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field. [children:
10 The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own
They were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people.
11 The LORD hath accomplished his fury; he hath poured out his fierce anger,
And hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devou ed the foundations thereof.
12 The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed
That the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem

FAQUIRS OF INDIA, OR NAZARITES.—ver. 7.

The elegy of this chapter begins with a lamentation of the very sad and doleful change which the judgments of God had made in Jerusalem. The city that had been as gold, as the most fine gold, so rich and splendid, the perfection of beauty, and joy of the whole earth, is become dim, and is changed; has lost its lustre, lost its value, is not what it was, it is become dross. Alas, what an alteration is here!

First. The temple is laid waste, which was the glory of Jerusalem, and its protection, that is given up into the hands of the enemy. And some understand that gold spoken of, ver. 1, to be the gold of the temple, the fine gold with which it was overlaid, 1 Kin. vi. 22. When the temple was burnt, the gold of it was smoked and sullied, as if it had been of little value; it was thrown among the rubbish, it was changed, that is, converted to common uses, and made nothing of. The stones of the sanctuary, which were curiously wrought, were thrown down by the Chaldeans when they demolished it, or were brought down by the force of the fire, and were poured out, and thrown about in the top of every street; they lay mingled, without distinction, among the common ruins. When the God of the sanctuary was by sin provoked to withdraw, no wonder that the stones of the sanctuary were thus profaned.

Secondly. The princes and priests, that were in a special manner "the precious sons of Zion," were trampled upon and abused, ver. 2. Both the house of God and the house of David were in Zion; the sons of both those houses were upon that account precious, that they were heirs to the privileges of those two covenants, of priesthood and royalty. They were "comparable to fine gold." Israel was more rich in them than in treasures of gold and silver; but now they are "esteemed as earthen pitchers," they are broken as earthen pitchers, thrown by as vessels in which there is no pleasure. They are grown poor, and brought into captivity, and thereby are rendered mean and despicable, and every one treads upon them, and insults over them. Note, The contempt put upon God's people ought to be matter of lamentation to us.

Thirdly. Little children were starved for want of bread and water, ver. 3, 4. The nursing mothers, having no meat for themselves, had no milk for the babes at their breast; so that, though in disposition they were really compassionate, yet in fact they seemed to be cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness, that leave their eggs in the dust, Job xxxix. 14, 15. Having no food for their children they were forced to neglect them, and do what they could to forget them, because it was a pain to them to think of them when they had nothing for them. In this they were worse than the seals or sea monsters, or whales, as some render it, for they "draw out the breast, and give suck to their young," which the daughter of my people will not do. Children cannot shift for themselves as grown people can, and therefore it was the more piteous to see "the tongue of the sucking child cleave to the roof of his mouth for thirst," because there was not a drop of water to moisten it, and to hear the young children, that could but just speak, ask bread of their parents who had none to give them, no, nor any friend that could supply them. As doleful as our thoughts are of this case, so thankful should our thoughts be of the great plenty we enjoy, and the food convenient we have for ourselves, and for our children, and for those of our own house.

Fourthly. Persons of good rank were reduced to extreme poverty, ver. 5. They that were well born, and well bred, and had been accustomed to the best, both for food and clothing, that had fed delicately, had every thing that was curious and nice, (they call it eating well, whereas those only eat well that eat to the glory of God,) and fared sumptuously every day; they had not only been advanced to the scarlet, but from their beginning were brought up in scarlet, and were never acquainted with anything mean or ordinary. They were 'brought up upon scarlet,' so the word is,—their foot-cloths and the carpets they walked on were scarlet; yet these, being stripped of all by the war, "are desolate in the street," have not a house to put their head in, not a bed to lie on, nor clothes to cover them, nor fire to warm them. They embrace dunghills, on them they are glad to lie to get a little rest, and, perhaps, raked in the dunghill for something to eat, as the prodigal son that would have filled his belly with the husks. Note, Those who live in the greatest pomp and plenty know not what straits they may be reduced to before they die; as sometimes the needy are raised out of the dunghill, Ps. cxiii. 7, so there are instances of the wealthy being brought to the dunghill. "They that were full have hired out themselves for bread," 1 Sam. ii. 5. It is therefore the wisdom of those that have abundance not to use themselves too nicely, for then hardships, when they come, will be doubly hard, Deu. xxviii. 56.

Fifthly. Persons that were eminent for dignity, nay, perhaps, for sanctity, shared with others in the common calamity, ver. 7, 8. "Her Nazarites" are extremely changed. Some understand it only of her honourable ones, the young gentlemen, that were very clean, and neat, and well dressed, washed and perfumed; but I see not why we may not understand it of those devout people among them that separated themselves to the Lord by the Nazarites' vow, Num. vi. 2. That there were such among them in the most degenerate times, appears, Am. ii. 11, "I raised up of your young men for Nazarites." These Nazarites, though they were not to cut their hair, yet by reason of their temperate diet, their frequent washings, and especially the pleasure they had in devoting themselves to God, and conversing with him, which made their faces to shine as Moses', "were purer than snow, and whiter than milk." Drinking no wine, nor strong drink, they had a more healthful complexion and cheerful countenance than those that regaled themselves daily with the blood of the grape, as Daniel and his fellows with pulse and water. Or, it may note the great respect and veneration which all good people had for them; though, perhaps, to the eye they had no form or comeliness, yet being separated to the Lord, they were valued as if they had been "more ruddy than rubies, and their polishing had been of sapphire." But now "their visage is" marred, (as is said of Christ, Isa. lii. 14,) it is "blacker than a coal;" they look miserably, partly through hunger, and partly through grief and perplexity. "They are not known in the streets;" they that respected them now take no notice of them, and they that had been intimately acquainted with them now scarce knew them, their countenance was so altered by the miseries that attended the long siege. "Their skin cleaves to their bones," their flesh being quite consumed and wasted away; "it is withered, it is become like a stick," as dry and hard as a piece of wood. Note, It is a thing to be much lamented, that even those who are separated to God, yet, when desolating judgments are abroad, are many times involved with others in the common calamity.

Sixthly. Jerusalem comes down slowly, and dies a lingering death, for the famine contributes more to her destruction than any other judgment whatsoever. Upon this account the destruction of Jerusalem was greater than that of Sodom, ver. 6, for that was overthrown in a moment; one shower of fire and brimstone despatched it, "no hand stayed on her," she did not endure any long siege as Jerusalem has done; she fell immediately into the hands of the Lord, who strikes home at a blow, and did not fall into the hands of man, who, being weak, is long in doing execution, Jud. viii. 21. Jerusalem is kept many months upon the rack in pain and misery, and dies by inches, dies so as to feel herself die. And when the iniquity of Jerusalem is more aggravated than that of Sodom, no wonder that the punishment of it is so. Sodom never had the means of grace that Jerusalem had, the oracles of God and his prophets, and therefore the condemnation of Jerusalem will be more intolerable than that of Sodom, Mat. xi. 23, 24.

The extremity of the famine is here set forth by two frightful instances of it. 1. The tedious death that it was the cause of, ver. 9. Many were slain with hunger, were famished to death, their stores being spent, and the public stores so near spent that they could not have any relief out of them. They were "stricken through for want of the fruits of the field;" they that were starved were as sure to die as if they had been stabbed and stricken through, only their case was much more miserable. "They that are slain with the sword" are soon rid out of their pain, "in a moment they go down to the grave," Job xxi. 13; they have not the terror of seeing death make its advances towards them, and scarce feel it when the blow is given, it is but one sharp struggle and the work is done; and if we be ready for another world we need not be afraid of a short passage to it, the quicker the better. But they that die by famine pine away; hunger preys upon their spirits, and wastes them gradually; nay, and it frets their spirits, and fills them with vexation, and is as great a torture to the mind as to the body. There are bands in their death, Ps. lxxiii. 4. 2. The barbarous murders that it was the occasion of, ver. 10, "The hands of the pitiful women have" first slain, and then "sodden their own children." This was lamented before, ch. ii. 20; and it was a thing to be greatly lamented, that any should be so wicked as to do it, and that they should be brought to such extremities as to be tempted to it. But this horrid effect of long sieges had been threatened in general, Lev. xxv. 24; Deu. xxviii. 13; and particularly against Jerusalem in the siege by the Chaldeans, Jer. xix. 9; Eze. v. 10. The case was sad enough, that they had not wherewithal to feed their children and make meat for them, ver. 4, but much worse, that they could find in their hearts to feed upon their children and make meat of them. I know not whether to make it an instance of the power of necessity, or of the power of iniquity; but, as the Gentile idolaters were justly given up to vile affections, Rom. i. 26, so these Jewish idolaters, and the women particularly, who had made cakes to the queen of heaven, and taught their children to do so too, were stript of natural affection, and that to their own children. Being thus left to dishonour their own nature was a righteous judgment upon them for the dishonour they had done to God.

Seventhly. Jerusalem comes down utterly and wonderfully. 1. The destruction of Jerusalem is a complete destruction; ver. 11, "The Lord has accomplished his fury," that is, he has made thorough work of it, has executed all that he purposed in wrath against Jerusalem, and hath remitted no part of the sentence. "He hath poured out" the full vials of "his fierce anger," poured them out to the bottom, even the dregs of them. He "hath kindled a fire in Zion," which has not only consumed the houses, and levelled them with the ground, but, beyond what other fires do, "hath devoured the foundations thereof," as if they were to be no more built upon. 2. It is an amazing destruction, ver. 12. It was a "surprise to the kings of the earth" who are acquainted with, and inquisitive about, the state of their neighbours; nay, it was so to "all the inhabitants of the world" that knew Jerusalem, or had ever heard or read of it. They could "not have believed that the adversary and enemy should ever have entered into the gates of Jerusalem;" for, 1st. They knew Jerusalem was strongly fortified, not only by walls and bulwarks, but by the numbers and strength of its inhabitants. "The stronghold of Zion" was thought to be impregnable. 2nd. They knew it was "the city of the great King," where the Lord of the whole earth had in a more peculiar manner his residence; it was the holy city, and therefore they thought it was so much under the Divine protection that it would be in vain for any of its enemies to make an attack upon it. 3rd. They knew that many an attempt made upon it had been baffled,—witness that of Sennacherib,—they were therefore amazed when they heard of the Chaldeans making themselves masters of it, and concluded it was certainly by an immediate hand of God that Jerusalem was given up to them; it was by a commission from him that the enemy broke through and entered the gates of Jerusalem.

13 For the sins of her prophets, and the iniquities of her priests,
That have shed the blood of the just in the midst of her,
14 They have wandered as blind men in the streets, they have polluted themselves with blood,
So that men could not touch their garments.
15 They cried unto them, Depart ye; it is unclean; depart, depart, touch not:
When they fled away and wandered, they said among the heathen, They shall no more sojourn there.
16 The anger of the LORD hath divided them; he will no more regard them:
They respected not the persons of the priests, they favoured not the elders.
17 As for us, our eyes as yet failed for our vain help:
In our watching we have watched for a nation that could not save us.
18 They hunt our steps, that we cannot go in our streets:
Our end is near, our days are fulfilled; for our end is come.
19 Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven:
They pursued us upon the mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness.
20 The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the LORD, was taken in their pits,
Of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen.

Here is, First. The sins they are charged with, for which God brought this destruction upon them, and which serve to justify God in it, ver. 13, 14. It is for "the sins of her prophets, and the iniquities of her priests;" not that the people were innocent, no, they loved to have it so, Jer. v. 31, and it was to please them that the prophets and priests did as they did; but the fault is chiefly laid upon them, who should have taught them better, should have reproved and admonished them, and told them what would be in the end hereof; of the hands of those watchmen who did not give them warning will their blood be required. Note, Nothing ripens a people more for ruin, nor fills the measure faster, than the sins of their priests and prophets. The particular sin charged upon them is persecution. The false prophets and corrupt priests joined their power and interest to "shed the blood of the just in the midst of her," that is, the blood of God's prophets, and of those that adhered to them. They not only shed the blood of their innocent children, whom they sacrificed to Moloch, but the blood of the righteous men that were among them, whom they sacrificed to that more cruel idol of enmity to the truth and true religion. This was that sin which "the Lord would not pardon," 2 Kin. xxiv. 4, and which brought the last destruction upon Jerusalem, Jas. v. 6, "Ye have condemned and killed the just." And the priests and prophets were the ringleaders in persecution, as, in Christ's time, the chief priests and scribes were the men that incensed the people against him, who otherwise would have persisted in their Hosannas. Now, these are they that "wandered as blind men in the streets," ver. 14; they strayed from the paths of justice, were blind to every thing that is good, but to do evil they were quicksighted. God saith of corrupt judges, that "they know not, neither do they understand, they walk in darkness," Ps. lxxxii. 5; and Christ saith of the corrupt teachers, that they are blind leaders of the blind, Mat. xv. 14. They have so polluted themselves with innocent blood, the blood of the saints, that men could not touch their garments; that is, they made themselves odious to all about them, so that good men were as shy of touching them as of touching a dead body, which contracted a ceremonial pollution, or of touching the bloody clothes of one slain, which tender spirits care not to do. There is nothing that will make prophets and priests to be abhorred so much as a spirit of persecution.

Secondly. The testimony of their neighbours produced in evidence against them, both to convict them of sin and to shew the equity of God's proceedings against them. Some that are grown very impudent in sin boast that they care not what people say of them, but God by the prophet would have the Jews to take notice what the people said of them, and what was the opinion of the standers by concerning them, ver. 15, 16; what they said, nay, what they cried unto them, especially to the corrupt priests and prophets, among the heathen. 1. They upbraided them with their pretended purity, while they lived in all manner of real iniquity. They cried to them, "Depart ye, it is unclean." You were so precise you would not touch a Gentile, but cried, "Depart, depart, stand by thyself, I am holier than thou," Isa. lxv. 5, (thus the prosecutors of Christ would not go "into the judgment hall lest they should be defiled,") but can you now keep the Gentiles from touching you, when God has delivered you into their hands? When you fly away and wander, you will bid them stand off, and not touch you, because you are unclean, but in vain; these serpents will not be charmed or enchanted thus, no, they will not respect the person of the priests, nor favour the elders; the most venerable persons will to them be despicable. 2. They upbraided them with their sins, and the anger of God against them for their sins, and the direful effects of that anger. "They cried to them, Depart ye, it is unclean;" they all cried out shame on them, and could easily foresee that God would not long suffer such a provoking people to continue in so good a land. They knew their statutes and judgments were righteous, and expected they should be a wise and understanding people, Deu. iv. 6; but when they saw them quite otherwise, they cried, Depart, depart. They soon read their doom, that the land would spew them out as it had done their predecessors, and when they saw the dispersed of Jacob fleeing and wandering, they told them of it. They said, Now "the anger of the Lord hath divided them," has dispersed them into all countries, because "they respected not the persons of the priests," the pious priests that were among them, such as Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, Jeremiah, and others; neither did they favour the elders, but despised them and their authority, when they went about to check them for their vicious courses. The very heathen foresaw this would ruin them. 3. They triumphed in their ruin as irrecoverable. They said, when they saw them expelled out of their own land, Now "they shall no more sojourn there;" they have bidden it a final farewell, never more to return to it, for "God will no more regard them," and how then can they help themselves? Herein they were mistaken, God had not cast them off for all this; yet thus much is intimated, that all about them observed them to be so very provoking to their God, that there was no reason to expect any other but that they should be quite abandoned.

Thirdly. The despair which they themselves were almost brought to under their calamities. Having heard what they said concerning them among the heathen, let us now hear what they say concerning themselves; ver. 17, "As for us," we look upon our case to be in a manner helpless. "Our end is near," ver. 18; the end both of our church and of our state, we are just at the brink of the ruin of both; nay, "our end is come;" we are utterly undone; a fatal, final period is put to all our comforts; the days of our prosperity are fulfilled, they are numbered and finished. Thus their fears concurred with the hopes of their enemies, that the Lord would no more regard them. For, 1. The refuges they fled to disappointed them. They looked for help from this and the other powerful ally, but to no purpose; it proved vain help. The succours they expected did not come in, or at least they had not the success they expected; and their eyes failed with looking for that which never came, ver. 17. They watched in watching; they watched long and with a great deal of earnestness and impatience for a nation that promised them assistance, but failed them, and frustrated their expectations. They could not save them; they were too weak to contend with the Chaldean army, and therefore retired. Help from creatures is vain help, Ps. lx. 11; and we may look for it till our eyes fail, till our hearts fail, and come short of it at last. 2. The persecutors they fled from overtook them, and overcame them; ver. 18, "They hunt our steps, that we cannot go in our streets." When the Chaldeans besieged the city, they raised the batteries so high above the walls that they could command the town, and shoot at people as they went along the streets; they hunted them with arrows from place to place. When the city was broken up, and all the men of war fled, their "persecutors were swifter than the eagles of heaven," when they fly upon their prey, ver. 19. There was no escaping them; they "pursued them upon the mountains," and when they thought they had got clear of them they fell into the hands of those that "laid wait for them in the wilderness," to cut off our retreat, and to pick up stragglers. Nay, the king himself, though he may be supposed to have had all the advantages the exigence of the case would admit to favour his flight, yet he cannot escape, for Divine vengeance pursues him with them, and then, ver. 20, "The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits." Some apply it to Josiah, who was killed in battle by the king of Egypt; but it is rather to be understood of Zedekiah, who was the last king of the house of David, and who was pursued by the Chaldeans, and seized in the plains of Jericho, Jer. xxxix. 5. He was the anointed of the Lord, heir of that family which God had appointed to the government; he was very much confided in by the Jewish state; "they said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen." They promised themselves that the remnant which were left after Jeconiah's captivity should, under the protection of his government, "yet again take root downward, and bear fruit upward." They thought, though they were so reduced that they could not think of reigning over the heathen as they had done, yet they might make a shift to live among them, and not be insulted and pulled in pieces by them. Thus apt are sinking interests not only to catch at every twig, but to think it will recover them. Jerusalem died of a consumption, a flattering distemper. Even when she was ready to expire, she formed some hopeful symptoms to herself, and on them grounded a hope that she should recover: but what came of it? The shadow under which they thought they should live proved like that of Jonah's gourd, which withered in a night. He that was "the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits," as if he had been but a beast of prey, so little account did they make of a person deemed sacred, and not to be violated. Note, When we make any creature the breath of our nostrils, and promise ourselves that we shall live by it, it is just with God to stop that breath, and deprive us of the life we expected by it; for God will have the honour of being himself alone our life, and the length of our days.

21 Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz;
The cup also shall pass through unto thee: thou shalt be drunken, and shalt make thyself naked.
22 The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion; he will no more carry thee away into captivity:
He will visit thine iniquity, O daughter of Edom; he will discover thy sins.

David's psalms of lamentation commonly conclude with some word of comfort, which is as life from the dead, and light shining out of darkness; so doth this lamentation here in this chapter. The people of God are now in great distress, their aspects all doleful, their prospects all frightful, and their ill-natured neighbours, the Edomites, insult over them, and do all they can to exasperate destroyers against them. Such was their violence against their brother Jacob, (Obad. 10,) such their spleen at Jerusalem, of which they cried, "Rase it, rase it," Ps. cxxxvii. 7. Now it is foretold, for the encouragement of God's people,

First. That an end shall be put to Zion's troubles; ver. 22, "The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion;" not the full of that punishment that it deserves, but of that which God has designed and determined to inflict, and which was necessary to answer the end, the glorifying of God's justice, and the taking away of their sin. The captivity, which is the punishment of thine iniquity, is accomplished, Isa. xl. 2. And he will 'no longer keep thee in captivity,' so it may be read, as well as "he will no more carry thee into captivity;" he will turn again thy captivity, and work a glorious release for thee. Note, The troubles of God's people shall be continued no longer than till they have done their work for which they were sent.

Secondly. That an end shall be put to Edom's triumphs. It is spoken ironically, ver. 21, "Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom." Go on to insult over Zion in distress, till thou hast filled up the measure of thine iniquity. Do so; rejoice in thy own present exemption from the common fate of thy neighbours. This is like Solomon's upbraiding the young man with his ungoverned mirth, Eccl. xi. 9, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth." Rejoice, if thou canst, when God comes to reckon with thee, and that he will do ere long. "The cup" of trembling which it is now Jerusalem's turn to drink deep of, "shall pass through unto thee;" it shall go round till it comes to be thy lot to pledge it. Note, This is a good reason why we should not insult over any that are in misery, because we ourselves also are in the body, and we know not how soon their case may be ours. But those who please themselves in the calamities of God's church must expect to have their doom, as aiders and abetters, with them that are instrumental in those calamities. The destruction of the Edomites was foretold by this prophet, Jer. xlix. 7, &c., and the people of God must encourage themselves against their present rudeness and insolence with the prospect of it. 1. It will be a shameful destruction. "The cup" that "shall pass unto thee" shall intoxicate thee, and that is shame enough to any man; "thou shalt be drunken," quite infatuated, and at thy wit's end; shalt stagger in all thy counsels, and stumble in all thy enterprises; and then, as Noah, when he was drunk, "thou shalt make thyself naked," and expose thyself to contempt. Note, Those who ridicule God's people will justly be left to themselves to do that some time or other by which they will be made ridiculous. 2. It will be a righteous destruction. God will herein "visit thine iniquity, and discover thy sins." He will punish them; and, to justify himself therein, he will discover them, and make it to appear he has just cause thus to proceed against them. Nay, the punishment of the sin shall so exactly answer the sin, that it shall itself plainly discover it. Sometimes God doth so visit the iniquity, as that he that runs may read the sin in the punishment. But sooner or later sin will be visited and discovered, and all the hidden works of darkness brought to light.

CHAPTER V.

This chapter, though it has the same number of verses with the first, second and fourth, yet is not alphabetical as they were; but the scope of it is the same with that of all the foregoing elegies. We have in it, I. A remonstrance of the present calamitous state of God's people in their captivity, ver. 1—16. II. A protestation of their concern for God's sanctuary, as that which lay nearer their heart than any secular interest of their own, ver. 17, 18. III. An humble supplication to God, and expostulation with him for the returns of mercy, ver. 19—22; for they that lament, and do not pray, sin in their lamentations. Some ancient versions call this chapter, 'The prayer of Jeremiah.'

REMEMBER, O LORD, what is come upon us:
Consider, and behold our reproach.
2 Our inheritance is turned to strangers,
Our houses to aliens.
3 We are orphans and fatherless,
Our mothers are as widows.
4 We have drunken our water for money;
Our wood is sold unto us.

EASTERN WATER CARRIERS.

5 Our necks are under persecution:
We labour, and have no rest.
6 We have given the hand to the Egyptians,
And to the Assyrians, to be satisfied with bread.
7 Our fathers have sinned, and are not;
And we have borne their iniquities.
8 Servants have ruled over us:
There is none that doth deliver us out of their hand.
9 We gat our bread with the peril of our lives
Because of the sword of the wilderness.
10 Our skin was black like an oven
Because of the terrible famine.
11 They ravished the women in Zion,
And the maids in the cities of Judah.
12 Princes are hanged up by their hand:
The faces of elders were not honoured.
13 They took the young men to grind,
And the children fell under the wood.
14 The elders have ceased from the gate,
The young men from their musick.
15 The joy of our heart is ceased;
Our dance is turned into mourning.
16 The crown is fallen from our head:
Woe unto us, that we have sinned!

"Is any afflicted? let him pray;" and let him in prayer pour out his complaint to God, and make known before him his trouble. The people of God do so here. Being overwhelmed with grief, they give vent to their sorrows at the footstool of the throne of grace, and so give themselves ease. They complain not of evils feared, but of evils felt. "Remember what is come upon us," ver. 1. What was of old threatened against us, and was long in the coming, is now at length come upon us, and we are ready to sink under it. Remember what is past, consider and behold what is present, and let not all the trouble we are in seem little to thee, and not worth taking notice of, Neh. ix. 32. Note, As it is a great comfort to us, so it ought to be a sufficient one in our troubles, that God sees, and considers, and remembers all that is come upon us; and in our prayers we need only to recommend our case to his gracious and compassionate consideration. The one word in which all their grievances are summed up is reproach. "Consider, and behold our reproach." The troubles they were in, compared with their former dignity and plenty, were a greater reproach to them than they would have been to any other people, especially considering their relation to God, and dependence upon him, and his former appearances for them; and therefore this they complain of very sensibly, because as it was a reproach, it reflected upon the name and honour of that God who had owned them for his people; "And what wilt thou do unto thy great name?"

First. They acknowledge the reproach of sin which they bear, the reproach of their youth, which Ephraim bemoans himself for, Jer. xxxi. 19, of the early days of their nation. This comes in in the midst of their complaints, ver. 7, but may well be put in the front of them, "Our fathers have sinned, and are not;" they are dead and gone, but "we have borne their iniquities." This is not here a peevish complaint, or an imputation of unrighteousness to God, like that which we have, Jer. xxxi. 29; Eze. xviii. 2, "The fathers did eat sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," and therefore, "the ways of the Lord are not equal;" but it is a penitent confession of the sin of their ancestors, which they themselves also had persisted in, for which they now justly suffered; that is, the judgments God brought upon them were so very great, that it appeared God had in them an eye to the sins of their ancestors (because they had not been remarkably punished in this world) as well as to their own sins; and thus God was justified both in his connivance at their ancestors, (he "laid up their iniquity for their children,") and in his severity with them, on whom he visited that iniquity, Mat. xxiii. 35, 36. Thus they do here, 1. Submit themselves to the Divine justice; Lord, thou art just in all that is brought upon us, for we are a seed of evildoers, children of wrath, and heirs to the curse; we are sinful, and we have it by kind. Note, The sins which God looks back upon in punishing we must look back upon in repenting, and must take notice of all that which will help to justify God in correcting us. 2. They refer themselves to the Divine pity. Lord, our fathers have sinned, and we justly smart for their sins; but they are not; they were taken away from the evil to come, they lived not to see and share in these miseries that are come upon us, and we are left to bear their iniquities; now, though herein God is righteous, yet it must be owned our case is piteous, and worthy of compassion. Note, If we be penitent and patient under what we suffer for the sins of our fathers, we may expect that he that punisheth will pity, and will soon return in mercy to us.

Secondly. They represent the reproach of trouble which they bear in divers particulars, which tend much to their disgrace.

1. They are disseized of that good land which God gave them, and their enemies have got possession of it, ver. 2. Canaan was their inheritance; it was theirs by promise; God gave it to them and their seed, and they held it by grant from his crown, Ps. cxxxvi. 21, 22. But now it is turned to strangers; they possess it that have no right to it, who are "strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and aliens to the covenants of promise," they dwell in the houses that we built; and this is our reproach. It is the happiness of all God's spiritual Israel, that the heavenly Canaan is an inheritance that they cannot be disseized of, that shall never be turned to strangers.

2. Their state and nation is brought into a condition like that of widows and orphans; ver. 3, "We are fatherless," that is, helpless; we have none to protect us, to provide for us, to take any care of us. Our king, who is the father of the country, is cut off; nay, God our Father seems to have forsaken us, and cast us off. "Our mothers," our cities that were as fruitful mothers in Israel, "are now as widows," are as wives whose husbands are dead, destitute of comfort, and exposed to wrong and injury, and this is our reproach; for we who made a figure are now looked on with contempt.

3. They are put hard to it to provide necessaries for themselves and their families, whereas when time was they lived in abundance, and had plenty of every thing. Water used to be free and easily come by, but now, ver. 4, "We have drunk our water for money," and the saying is no longer true, Usus communis aquarum,—'Water is free to all.' So hardly did their oppressors use them, that they could not have a draught of fair water but they must purchase it either with money or work. Formerly they had fuel too for the fetching, but now "our wood is sold to us," and we pay dear for every faggot. Now were they punished for employing their children to gather wood for fire with which to bake cakes for the queen of heaven, Jer. vii. 18. They were perfectly proscribed by their oppressors, were forbidden the use both of fire and water, according to the ancient form, Interdico tibi aqua et igni,—'I forbid thee the use of water and fire.' But what must they do for bread? Truly that was as hard to come by as any thing, for, 1st. Some of them sold their liberty for it; ver. 6, "We have given the hand to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians," have made the best bargain we could with them to serve them, that we might "be satisfied with bread." We were glad to submit to the meanest employment upon the hardest terms to get a sorry livelihood; we have yielded ourselves to be their vassals, have parted with all to them, as the Egyptians did to Pharaoh in the years of famine, that we might have something for ourselves and families to subsist on. The neighbour nations used to trade with Judah for wheat, Eze. xxvii. 17, for it was a fruitful land, but now it eats up the inhabitants, and they are glad to make court to the Egyptians and Assyrians. 2nd. Others of them ventured their lives for it; ver. 9, "We got our bread with the peril of our lives." When being straitened by the siege, and all provisions cut off, they either sallied or stole out of the city to fetch in some supply, they were in danger of falling into the hands of the besiegers, and being put to the sword; the sword of the wilderness it is called, or of the plain, for so the word signifies, the besiegers lying dispersed everywhere in the plains that were about the city. Let us take occasion from hence to bless God for the plenty we enjoy, that we get our bread so easily, scarce with the sweat of our face, much less with the peril of our lives; and for the peace we enjoy, that we can go out and enjoy, not only the necessary products, but the pleasures of the country, without any fear of the sword of the wilderness.

4. They are brought into slavery who were a free people, and not only their own masters, but masters of all about them, and this is, as much as any thing, their reproach; ver. 5, "Our necks are under" the grievous and intolerable yoke of "persecution," the iron yoke which Jeremiah foretold should be laid upon them, Jer. xxviii. 14; we are used like beasts in the yoke that wholly serve their owners, and are at the command of their drivers. That which aggravated the servitude was, 1st. That their labours were incessant, like those of Israel in Egypt, that were daily tasked, nay, overtasked; "We labour and have no rest," neither leave nor leisure to rest. The oxen in the yoke are unyoked at night and have rest, so they have by a particular provision on the sabbath day; but the poor captives in Babylon that were compelled to work for their living laboured and had no rest, no nights, no sabbath rest; they were quite tired out with continual toil. 2nd. That their masters were insufferable; ver. 8, "Servants have ruled over us," and nothing more vexatious than a servant when he reigneth, Pr. xxx. 22. They were not only the great men of the Chaldeans that commanded them, but even the meanest of their servants abused them at pleasure, and insulted over them; and they must be at their beck too. The curse of Canaan is now become the doom of Judah, a servant of servants shall he be. They would not be ruled by their God, and by his servants the prophets, whose rule was gentle and gracious, and therefore justly are they ruled with rigour by their enemies and their servants. 3rd. That they saw no probable way for the redress of their grievances. "There is none that doth deliver us out of their hand," not only none to rescue us out of our captivity, but none to check and restrain the insolence of the servants that abuse us and trample upon us, which one would think their masters should have done, because it was an usurpation of their authority; but it should seem they connived at it, and encouraged it; and, as if they were not worthy of the correction of gentlemen, they are turned over to the footmen to be kicked. Well might they pray, Lord, "consider, and behold our reproach."

5. They that used to be feasted are now famished; ver. 10, "Our skin was black like an oven," dried and parched too, "because of the terrible famine;" the 'storms of famine,' so the word is; for though famine comes gradually upon a people, yet it comes violently, and bears down all before it, and there is no resisting it. And this also is their disgrace; hence we read of the reproach of famine, which in captivity they received among the heathen, Eze. xxvi. 30.

6. All sorts of people, even they whose persons and characters were most inviolable, were abused and dishonoured. 1st. The women were ravished, even the women in Zion, that holy mountain, ver. 11. The committing of such abominable wickedness there is very sadly and justly complained of. 2nd. The great men were not only put to death, but put to ignominious deaths. "Princes were hanged," as if they had been slaves, "by the hands" of the Chaldeans, ver. 12; they took a pride in doing this barbarous execution with their own hands. Some think the dead bodies of the princes, after they were slain with the sword, were hung up, as the bodies of Saul's sons, in disgrace to them, and as it were to expiate the nation's guilt. 3rd. No respect was shewed to magistrates and those in authority. "The faces of elders," elders in age, elders in office, "were not honoured." This will be particularly remembered against the Chaldeans another day; Isa. xlvii. 6, "Upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke." 4th. The tenderness of youth was no more considered than the gravity of old age; ver. 13, they "took the young men to grind" at the handmills, nay perhaps at the horsemills. 'The young men have carried the grist,' so some; have 'carried the mill, or millstones,' so others; they loaded them as if they had been beasts of burthen, and so broke their backs when they were young, and made the rest of their lives the more miserable. Nay, they made the little children carry their wood home for fuel, and laid such burthens upon them that they fell down under them. So very inhuman were these cruel taskmasters.

7. An end was put to all their gladness, and their joy quite extinguished; ver. 14, "The young men," that used to be disposed to mirth, have "ceased from their music," have hung their harps upon the willow-trees. It doth indeed well become old men to cease from their music, it is time to lay it by with a gracious contempt, when "all the daughters of music are brought low;" but it speaks some great calamity upon a people when their young men are made to cease from it. It was so with the body of the people; ver. 15, "The joy of their heart was ceased;" they never knew what joy was since the enemy came upon them like a flood, for ever since deep has called unto deep, and one wave has flowed in upon the neck of another, so that we are quite overwhelmed, "our dance is turned into mourning;" instead of leaping for joy as formerly, we sink and lie down in sorrow. This may refer especially to the joy of their solemn feasts, and the dancing used in them, Jud. xxi. 21, which was not only modest but sacred dancing; this was turned into mourning, which was doubled on their festival days, in remembrance of their former pleasant things.

8. An end was put to all their glory. 1st. The public administration of justice was their glory, but that was gone; "The elders have ceased from the gate," ver. 14. The course of justice, which used to run down like a river, is now stopped; the courts of justice that used to be kept with so much solemnity are put down, for the judges are slain or carried captives. 2nd. The royal dignity was their glory, but that also was gone; "The crown is fallen from our head." Not only the king himself fallen into disgrace, but the crown; he has no successor; the regalia are all lost. Note, Earthly crowns are fading, falling things; but, blessed be God, there is a crown of glory that fades not away, that never falls, a kingdom that cannot be moved. Upon this complaint, but with reference to all the foregoing complaints, they make that penitent acknowledgment, "Woe unto us that we have sinned." Alas for us, our cause is very deplorable, and it is all long of ourselves; we are undone, and, which aggravates the matter, we are undone by our own hands. God is righteous, for we have sinned. Note, All our woes are owing to our own sin and folly. If "the crown of our head be fallen," for so the words run, if we lose our excellency, and become mean, we may thank ourselves; we have by our own iniquity profaned our crown and laid our honour in the dust.

17 For this our heart is faint;
For these things our eyes are dim.
18 Because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate,
The foxes walk upon it.
19 Thou, O LORD, remainest for ever;
Thy throne from generation to generation.
20 Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever,
And forsake us so long time?
21 Turn thou us unto thee, O LORD,
And we shall be turned; renew our days as of old.
22 But thou hast utterly rejected us;
Thou art very wroth against us.

Here, First. The people of God express the deep concern they had for the ruins of the temple more than for any other of their calamities; the interests of God's house lay nearer their hearts than those of their own; ver. 17, 18, "For this our heart is faint," and sinks under the load of its own heaviness; "for these things our eyes are dim," and our sight is gone, as is usual in a deliquium, or fainting fit. It is "because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate," the mountains, and the temple built upon that mountain. For other desolations our hearts grieve, and our eyes weep, but for this our hearts faint, and our eyes are dim. Note, Nothing lies so heavy upon the spirits of good people as that which threatens the ruin of religion, or weakens the interest of that; and it is a comfort if we can appeal to God that that afflicts us more than any temporal affliction to ourselves. The people had polluted the mountain of Zion with their sins, and therefore God has justly made it desolate to that degree that the foxes walk upon it as freely and commonly as they do in the woods. It is sad indeed when the mountain of Zion is become a portion for foxes, Ps. lxiii. 10; but sin had first made it so, Eze. xiii. 4.

Secondly. They comfort themselves with the doctrine of God's eternity, and the perpetuity of his government; ver. 19, But "thou, O Lord, remainest for ever." This they are taught to do by that Psalm which is entitled, "A prayer of the afflicted," Ps. cii. 27, 28. When all our creature comforts are removed from us, and our hearts fail us, we may then encourage ourselves with the belief, 1. Of God's eternity; "Thou remainest for ever." What shakes the world gives no disturbance to him that made it; whatever revolutions there are on earth there is no change in the eternal mind; God is still the same, and remains for ever infinitely wise and holy, just and good; "with him there is no variableness nor shadow of turning." 2. Of the never failing continuance of his dominion; "Thy throne is from generation to generation." The throne of glory, the throne of grace, and the throne of government, are all unchangeable, immovable, and this is matter of comfort to us when "the crown is fallen from our heads." When the thrones of princes, that should be our protectors, are brought to the dust, and buried in it, God's throne continues still; he still rules the world, and rules it for the good of his church. The Lord reigns, reigns for ever, even thy God, O Zion.

Thirdly. They humbly expostulate with God concerning the low condition they were now in, and the frowns of Heaven they were now under; ver. 20, "Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever," as if we were quite cast out of mind? "Wherefore dost thou forsake us so long time," as if we were quite deprived of the tokens of thy presence? Wherefore dost thou defer our deliverance, as if thou hadst utterly abandoned us? Thou art the same, and though the throne of thy sanctuary is demolished thy throne in heaven is unshaken. But wilt thou not be the same to us? Not as if they thought God had forgotten and forsaken them, much less feared his forgetting and forsaking them for ever; but thus they express the value they had for his favour and presence, which they thought it long that they were deprived of the evidence and comfort of. The last verse may be read as such an expostulation, and so the margin reads it, 'For wilt thou utterly reject us? wilt thou be perpetually wroth with us?' Not only not smile upon us, and remember us in mercy, but frown upon us, and lay us under the tokens of thy wrath; not only not draw nigh to us, but cast us out of thy presence, and forbid us to draw nigh to thee. How will this be reconciled with thy goodness and faithfulness, and the stability of thy covenant? We read it, "But thou hast rejected us;" that is, thou hast given us cause to fear that thou hast. Lord, how long shall we be in this temptation? Note, Though we may not quarrel with God, yet we may plead with him; and though we may not conclude that he has cast us off, yet we may with the prophet, Jer. xii. 1, humbly reason with him concerning his judgments, especially the continuance of the desolations of his sanctuary.

Fourthly. They earnestly pray to God for mercy and grace; Lord, do not reject us for ever, but "Turn thou us unto thee, renew our days," ver. 21. These words, though they be not put last, yet the rabbins, because they would not have the book to conclude with those melancholy words, ver. 22, repeat this prayer again, that the sun may not set under a cloud, and so make these the last words both in writing and reading this chapter. They here pray, 1. For converting grace, to prepare and qualify them for mercy; "Turn us to thee, O Lord." They had complained that God had forsaken and forgotten them, and then their prayer is not 'Turn thou to us,' but "Turn us to thee;" which implies an acknowledgment that the cause of the distance was in themselves. God never leaves any till they first leave him, nor stands afar off from them any longer than while they stand afar off from him; if, therefore, he turn them to him, in a way of duty, no doubt but he would presently return to them in a way of mercy. This agrees with that repeated prayer, Ps. lxxx. 3, 7, 19, "Turn us again, and then cause thy face to shine. "Turn us from our idols to thyself by a sincere repentance and reformation, "and then we shall be turned." This implies a farther acknowledgment of their own weakness and inability to turn themselves. There is in our nature a bent to backslide from God, but no disposition to return to him till his grace works in us both to will and to do. So necessary is that grace that we may truly say, 'Turn us, or we shall not be turned,' but shall wander endlessly; and so powerful and effectual is that grace that we may as truly say, "Turn us and we shall be turned," for it is a day of power, almighty power, in which God's people are made a willing people, Ps. cx. 3. 2. For restoring mercy. "Turn us to thee," and then "renew our days as of old;" that is, put us into the same happy state that our ancestors were in long ago, and that they continued long in; let it be with us as it was at the first, and at the beginning, Isa. i. 26. Note, If God by his grace renew our hearts, he will by his favour renew our days, so that we shall renew our youth as the eagle, Ps. ciii. 5. They that repent, and do their first works, shall rejoice, and recover their first comforts. God's mercies to his people have been ever of old, Ps. xxv. 6; and therefore they may hope, even then when he seems to have forsaken and forgotten them, that the mercy which was from everlasting will be to everlasting.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES
TO THE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

THIS poem affords the most elegant variety of affecting images that ever probably were collected into so small a compass. The scenes of affliction, the circumstances of distress, are painted with such beautiful combination, that we contemplate everywhere the most affecting picture of desolation and misery. The prophet reiterates his complaints in the most pathetic style; and aggravates his sorrow with a boldness and force of description that correspond with the magnitude and religious importance of the calamities displayed to view. In the instructive strains of an inspired writer he reminds his countrymen of the grievous rebellions which had provoked the Lord to "abhor his sanctuary;" confesses that "it was of God's mercies that they were not utterly consumed;" and points out the sources of evil in the iniquities of their false prophets and priests. He then, with indignant irony, threatens Edom with destruction for rejoicing over the miseries of Judæa; opens a consolatory prospect to Zion; and concludes with an affecting address to God, to consider the reproach of his people, and to renew their prosperity.—Gray's Key. Never was there a more rich and elegant variety of beautiful images and adjuncts arranged within so small a compass, nor more elegantly chosen and applied.—Bp. Lowth.

CHAP. I.—1. How doth the city sit solitary! There are extant numerous medals of Judæa vanquished, struck by order of the Roman general Titus, (who was afterwards emperor,) in order to commemorate the conquest of Judæa, and the subversion of the Jewish state and polity. On the representation of the reverse of one of these, (preserved in the cabinet of the British Museum,) the conquered country appears as a desolate female sitting under a tree; on another, as having her arms chained. They afford an extraordinary fulfilment of Isaiah's prediction, delivered at least eight hundred years before, "She being desolate shall SIT upon the ground," Isa. iii. 26; as well as a striking illustration of the Lamentations of Jeremiah. "How doth the city SIT solitary that was full of people! how is she become as a widow! she that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary!"—Horne's Introduction, vol. i. 199. See representation of these medals in Lu. xix. See also Supplementary Note on Deu. xxviii. 6. All her beauty is departed. No "streets of palaces, and walks of state;" no high raised order of triumph; no fountains to cool the air, or porticoes; not a single vestige meets the traveller to announce its former military greatness, or commercial opulence; but in the place of these he finds himself encompassed by walls of rude masonry, the dull uniformity of which is only broken by the occasional protrusion of a small grated window; all the streets are wretchedness, and the homes of the Jews more especially are as dunghills.—Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. 29. The beauty of its situation is all that we can hope to discern, and that beauty of situation—in the eminence and slopes of the platform on which it stands, and in its natural defences on two of its sides—still remains.—Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 402.

CHAP. II.—1. How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger. We then ascended to the wall of the city, and, entering by the Zion gate, once more passed through the Jewish quarters, and looked upon the miseries of Israel in the city where David dwelt. They are by far the most miserable and squalid of all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and, if we could have looked upon their precious souls, their temporal misery would have appeared but a faint emblem of the spiritual death that reigns within. "Ah sinful nation! a people laden with iniquity! The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint," Isa. i. 4. May we never lose the feelings of intense compassion toward Israel which these few days spent in Jerusalem awakened; and never rest till all the faithful of the church of our fathers have the same flame kindled in their hearts! 9. Her gates are sunk into the ground. In seeking a solid foundation, (for the site of a proposed Hebrew church,) the builders had already dug down about forty feet, and had not yet come to the rock. They laid bare heap after heap of rubbish and ancient stones. It is a remarkable fact, which cannot but strike the traveller, that not only on mount Zion but in many parts of the city, the modern town is really built on the rubbish of the old. The heaps of ancient Jerusalem are still remaining; indurated masses of stones and rubbish forty and fifty feet deep in many places. Truly the prophets spoke with a Divine accuracy when they said, "Jerusalem shall become heaps," Mic. iii. 12; "I will make Jerusalem heaps," Jer. ix. 11. The fact that these heaps of ruins are of so great depth suggested to us a literal interpretation of the words of Jeremiah, "Her gates are sunk into the ground," ch. ii. 9. The ancient gates mentioned by Nehemiah, Neh. iii., are no longer to be found, and it is quite possible that several of them may be literally buried below the feet of the inquiring traveller.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative. It is added in a note: They have since reached the old foundations, (Isa. lviii. 12,) after digging fifty feet. See Mr. Nicolayson's letter in the Jewish Intelligencer for April, 1840. It is a striking fact that the foundations of Jerusalem should be thus hid in the ground, when you contrast it with the case of Samaria, of which it was foretold, "I will discover the foundations thereof," Mic. i. 6. Here is the accurate minuteness and distinguishing definiteness of the God of truth, who can point his finger to one spot and say, "It shall be thus with thee;" and turn to another spot and say in equal sovereignty, "It shall be otherwise with thee."

CHAP. III.—1. I am the man that hath seen affliction. It is worthy to be observed that Jeremiah, in endeavouring to promote resignation in his countrymen, represents his own deportment under afflictions in terms which have a prophetic cast; so strikingly are they descriptive of the patience and conduct of our Saviour under his sufferings. The prophet, indeed, in the meek endurance of unmerited persecution was an illustrious type of Christ.—Gray's Key. 56. hide not thine ear at my breathing. Our own troubles, and those of the church and world around us, continually suggest causes of sorrow; and whereever we look 'our eyes may affect our hearts,' and cause our tears to flow afresh. Yet we may still hope and rejoice in the Lord; no dark dungeon or deep pit can exclude us from his throne of grace. If we cannot speak, he will hear our breathings and our sighs. He will draw near to encourage, to defend, and to plead the cause of his afflicted servants, and to redeem their souls. But what are all our sorrows compared with those of the Redeemer? 'He,' indeed, 'was the man who saw affliction, by the rod of the Lord's wrath against our sins, and exclaimed, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' He gave his cheek to the smiters, and was filled with reproach;' he was cut off, and laid in the grave, and the stone covered him; yet his prayer was answered, his cause was pleaded, he rose triumphant, and his enemies have, many of them, perished miserably from 'under the heavens of the Lord.' Thus he will deliver his people out of every trouble, and revive his church from every overwhelming persecution; thus will he raise our bodies from the grave, and save us with an everlasting salvation; whilst all his enemies will perish with an "everlasting destruction from his presence."—T. Scott.

CHAP. IV.—12. The kings of the earth—would not have believed that the adversary—should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem. Observing from the mount of Olives the various undulations and slopes of ground, it is not difficult to conceive that when mount Zion, Acra, and mount Moriah constituted the bulk of the city, with a deep and steep valley surrounding the greater part of it, it must have been considered, by the people of that age, as nearly impregnable. These words were said nearly two thousand five hundred years ago. And when, six hundred and fifty years after, Titus besieged and took this devoted city, he exclaimed, on viewing the vast strength of the place, "It was no other than God who ejected the Jews out of these fortifications; for what could the hands of men or any machines do towards overthrowing these towns?"—Jowett's Christian Researches.

CHAP. V.—5. Our necks are under persecution. 'In Media, on the perpendicular surface of a smooth mountain, on the road between Babylon and Hamadan, which is supposed to be the same as Ecbatana, the ancient capital of Media, there appears a remarkable sculpture, a copy of which, after Sir R. Ker Porter, is given below. Having visited the spot a few years since, we can vouch,' continues Dr. Kitto, (Pictorial Bible, 2 Kin. xvii.,) 'for the minute accuracy with which the sculpture is represented;' the principal figure in which, distinguished as a king by his regal dress and colossal stature, Sir Robert conceives to be Shalmaneser, attended by the generals of his Assyrian and Median forces; and the captives to be representations of the ten tribes, subdued and removed into this very country by himself and his father. 'Those who hesitate to accept this very beautiful sculpture as an illustration of that history will nevertheless value it as a most authentic representation of the mode frequently alluded to in the Scriptures, in which captive enemies were wont to be presented to, and treated by, the ancient Oriental conquerors.' 12. Hanged up by the hand. Suspending by the hand is a punishment very common in the East, especially for slaves and refractory children.—Roberts's Oriental Illustrations. Though we have cause to mourn, over the low estate of the church, yet the true Zion, to which believers are come, cannot be desolated, but remaineth for ever. Nor can our relation, as adopted into God's family, be abrogated, nor the freeness of our salvation disannulled, nor our joy and glorying in Christ be made void. Tribulations may cause our hearts to be faint, and our eyes dim, but our way to the mercy-seat of our reconciled God is open. We may beseech him not to forsake or forget us, and that he would turn and renew us more and more by his grace, that our hopes may revive, and our consolations abound, as in the days of old. Let us, in all our troubles, put our whole trust and confidence in his mercy; let us confess our sins, and pour out our hearts before him. Let us watch against repinings and despondency, whatever we suffer, or witness of the troubles of our brethren; for we surely know that it shall be well in the end with all that trust in, fear, love, and serve the Lord. Are not, as in Jeremiah's days, the Lord's judgments in the earth? And may we not trace the cause of the Lord's jealousy for his Zion? Did Christ purchase the church with his blood, and can he be indifferent to its best interests? Let Zion then be remembered by us in our warmest prayers, and her welfare be preferred above our chief joy. O that every heart's affection was on the stretch, under the influence of the Holy Ghost, to plead with our God for Zion! Spare, Lord, spare thy people, and give not thine heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them.—R. T. Society's Bible.

THE JEWS MOURNING

AN

IN THEIR CAPTIVITY.

OF THE BOOK OF

THE PROPHET EZEKIEL,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we entered upon the writings of the prophets which speak of "the things that should be hereafter," methought we had the same call given us that St. John had, Rev. iv. 1, to "Come up hither;" but when we enter upon the prophecy of this book methinks we are called to "come up higher." As we go forward in time (for Ezekiel prophesied in the captivity, as Jeremiah prophesied just before it) so we soar upward in discoveries yet more sublime of the Divine glory. These waters of the sanctuary still grow deeper, so far from being fordable, that in some places they are scarce fathomable; yet, as deep as they are, out of them flow streams which "make glad the city of our God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High." As to this prophecy now before us, we may inquire,

I. Concerning the penman of it. It was Ezekiel: his name signifies, 'the strength of God;' or, 'one girt or strengthened of God.' He girded up the loins of his mind to the service, and God put strength into him. Whom God calls to any service, he will himself enable for it; if he gives commission, he will give power to execute it. Ezekiel's name was answered when God said, (and no doubt he said it,) "I have made thy face strong against their faces."—The learned Selden in his book De Diis Syris, saith, it was the opinion of some of the ancients, that the prophet Ezekiel was the same with that Nazaratus Assyrius whom Pythagoras, as himself relates, had for his tutor for some time, and whose lectures he attended; and it is agreed that they lived much about the same time. And we have reason to think, that many of the Greek philosophers were acquainted with the sacred writings, and borrowed some of the best of their notions from them. If we may credit the tradition of the Jews, he was put to death by the captives in Babylon, for his faithfulness and boldness in reproving them; that they dragged him upon the stones till his brains were dashed out. An Arabic historian saith, he was put to death, and was buried in the sepulchre of Shem, the son of Noah: so Hottinger relates, Thesaur. Philol. lib. ii. cap. 1.

II. Concerning the date of it; the place whence it is dated, and the time when. The scene is laid in Babylon, when it was a house of bondage to the Israel of God; there the prophecies of this book were preached, there they were written, when the prophet himself and the people to whom he prophesied were captives there. Ezekiel and Daniel are the only writing prophets of the Old Testament, that lived and prophesied any where but in the land of Israel, except we add Jonah, who was sent to Nineveh to prophesy. Ezekiel prophesied in the beginning of the captivity, Daniel in the latter end of it. It was an indication of God's good will to them, and his gracious designs concerning them in their affliction, that he raised up prophets among them, both to convince them, when in the beginning of their troubles they were secure and unhumbled, which was Ezekiel's business, and to comfort them, when in the latter end of their troubles they were dejected and discouraged. If the Lord had been pleased to kill them, he would not have used such apt and proper means to cure them.

III. Concerning the matter and scope of it. 1. There is much in it that is very mysterious, dark, and hard to be understood, especially in the beginning and latter end of it; which, therefore, the Jewish rabbins forbade the reading of to their young men till they came to be thirty years of age, lest, by the difficulties they met with there, they should be prejudiced against the Scriptures. But if we read these difficult parts of Scripture with humility and reverence, and search them diligently, though we may not be able to untie all the knots we meet with, no more than we can solve all the phenomena in the book of nature, yet we may from them, as from the book of nature, gather a great deal for the confirming of our faith, and the encouraging of our hope in the God we worship. 2. Though the visions here be intricate, such as an elephant may swim in, yet the sermons are most plain, such as a lamb may wade in; and the chief design of them is, to shew God's people their transgressions, that in their captivity they may be repenting, and not repining. It should seem he was constantly attended; for we read of their sitting before him, as God's people sat, to hear his words, ch. xxxiii. 31, and that he was occasionally consulted; for we read of the elders of Israel that came to inquire of the Lord by him, ch. xiv. 1—3. And as it was of great use to the oppressed captives themselves to have a prophet with them, so it was a testimony to their holy religion against their oppressors, that ridiculed it and them. 3. Though the reproofs here, and the threatenings, be very sharp and bold, yet towards the close of the book very comfortable assurances are given of great mercy God had in store for them; and there, at length, we shall meet with something that has reference to gospel times, and which was to have its accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, of whom, indeed, this Prophet speaks less than almost any of the prophets. But by opening the terrors of the Lord he prepares Christ's way. By the law is the knowledge of sin, and so it becomes our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. The visions, which were the Prophet's credentials, we have ch. i.—iii.; the reproofs and threatenings, ch. iv.—xxiv. Betwixt which and the comforts we have in the latter part of the book, we have messages sent to the nations that bordered upon the land of Israel, whose destruction is foretold, ch. xxv.—xxxv., to make way for the restoration of God's Israel, and the re-establishment of their city and temple, which are foretold, ch. xxxvi.—xlviii. And those who would apply the comforts to themselves must apply the convictions to themselves.

A.M. 3409. B.C. 595.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The common circumstances of the prophecy now to be delivered: the time when it was delivered, ver. 1; the place where, ver. 2; and the person by whom, ver. 3. II. The uncommon introduction to it by a vision of the glory of God; 1. In his attendance and retinue in the upper world, where his throne is surrounded with angels, here called living creatures, ver. 4—14; 2. In his providences concerning the lower world, represented by the wheels, and their motions, ver. 15—26; 3. In the face of Jesus Christ sitting upon the throne, ver. 26—28. And the more we are acquainted, and the more intimately we converse with the glory of God in these three branches of it, the more commanding influence will Divine revelation have upon us, and the more ready shall we be to submit to it, which is the thing aimed at in prefacing the prophecies of this book with these visions. When such a God of glory speaks, it concerns us to hear with attention and reverence; it is at our peril if we do not.

NOW it came to pass in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, that the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God. 2 In the fifth day of the month, which was the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity, 3 The word of the LORD came expressly unto Ezekiel the priest, the son of Buzi, in the land of the Chaldeans by the river Chebar; and the hand of the LORD was there upon him.

The circumstances of the vision which Ezekiel saw, and in which he received his commission and instructions, are here very particularly set down, that the narrative may appear to be authentic, and not romantic. It may be of use to keep an account when and where God has been pleased to manifest himself to our souls in a peculiar manner, that the return of the day, and our return to the place of the altar, (Gen. xiii. 4,) may receive the pleasing, grateful remembrance of God's favour to us. Remember, O my soul, and never forget what communications of Divine love thou didst receive at such a time, at such a place. Tell others what God did for thee.

First. The time when Ezekiel had this vision is here recorded. It was "in the thirtieth year," ver. 1. Some make it the thirtieth year of the prophet's age. Being a priest, he was at that age to enter upon the full execution of the priestly office; but being debarred from that, by the iniquity and calamity of the times, now they had neither temple nor altar, God at that age called him to the dignity of a prophet. Others make it to be the thirtieth year from the beginning of the reign of Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, from which the Chaldeans began a new computation of times, as they had done from Nabonassar, one hundred and twenty-three years before. Nabopolassar reigned eighty-nine years, and this was the eleventh of his son, which makes the thirty; and it was proper enough for Ezekiel, when he was in Babylon, to use the computation they there used; as we in foreign countries date by the new style.

And he afterwards useth the melancholy computation of his own country; observe, ver. 2, that it was the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity. But the Chaldee paraphrase fixes upon another era, and saith, this was 'the thirtieth year after Hilkiah the priest found the book of the law in the house of the sanctuary, at midnight, after the setting of the moon, in the days of Josiah the king.' And it is true that this was just thirty years from thence; and that was an event so remarkable, as it put the Jewish state upon a new trial, that it was proper enough to date from it; and perhaps therefore the prophet speaks indefinitely of thirty years, as having an eye both to that event and to the Chaldean computation, which were coincident. It was in the fourth month, answering to our June, and in the fifth day of the month, that Ezekiel had this vision, ver. 2. It is probable it was on the sabbath day; because we read, ch. iii. 19, that "at the end of seven days," which we may well suppose to be the next sabbath, the word of the Lord came to him again. Thus John "was in the Spirit on the Lord's day," when he saw the visions of the Almighty, Rev. i. 10. God would hereby put an honour upon his sabbaths, then when "the enemies mocked at them," Lam. i. 7; and would thus encourage his people to keep up their attendance on the ministry of his prophets every sabbath day, by the extraordinary manifestations of himself on some sabbath days.

Secondly. The melancholy circumstances he was in when God honoured him, and thereby favoured his people with his vision. He was "in the land of the Chaldeans, among the captives, by the river of Chebar, and it was in the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity." Observe,

1. The people of God were now, some of them, "captives in the land of the Chaldeans." The body of the Jewish nation yet remained in their own land, but these were the firstfruits of the captivity, and they were some of the best; for in Jeremiah's vision these were the good figs whom God had sent into the land of the Chaldeans for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5; and that it might be for their good, God raised up a prophet among them, to teach them out of the law then when he chastened them, Ps. xciv. 12. Note, It is a great mercy to have the word of God brought us, and a great duty to attend to it diligently when we are in affliction. The word of instruction, and the rod of correction, may be of great service to us in concert and concurrence with each other; the word to explain the rod, and the rod to enforce the word; both together give wisdom. It is happy for a man when he is sick, and in pain, to have "a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand," if he had but his ear open to discipline, Job xxxiii. 23. One of the quarrels God had with the Jews when he sent them into captivity was, for mocking his messengers, and misusing his prophets; and yet, when they were suffering for this sin, he favoured them with this forfeited mercy. It were ill with us if God did not sometimes graciously thrust upon us those means of grace and salvation which we have foolishly thrust from us. In their captivity they wanted ordinary helps for their souls, and therefore God raised them up these extraordinary ones. For God's children, if they be baulked in their education one way, shall have it made up another way. But observe, "It was in the fifth year of the captivity" that Ezekiel was raised up among them, and not before; so long God left them without any prophet, till they began to lament after the Lord, and to complain, that they saw not their signs, and there was none to tell them how long, Ps. lxxiv. 9, and then they would know how to value a prophet, and God's discoveries of himself to them by him, would be the more acceptable and comfortable. The Jews that remained in their own land had Jeremiah with them, those that were gone into captivity had Ezekiel with them; for, wherever the children of God are scattered abroad, he will find out tutors for them.

2. The prophet was himself among the captives, those of them that were posted by the river Chebar; for it "was by the rivers of Babylon" that they sat down, and on the willow-trees, by the river side, they hung their harps, Ps. cxxxvii. 2. The planters in America keep along by the sides of the rivers, and perhaps those captives were employed by their masters in improving some parts of the country, by the river sides, that were uncultivated, the natives being generally employed in war; or they employed them in manufactures, and therefore chose to fix them by the sides of rivers, that the goods they made might the more easily be conveyed by water-carriage. Interpreters agree not what river this of Chebar was, but among the captives by that river Ezekiel was, and himself a captive.

Observe here, 1st. That the best men, and those that are dearest to God, often share, not only in the common calamities of this life, but in the public and national judgments that are inflicted for sin. They feel the smart who contributed nothing to the guilt; by which it appears that the difference between good and bad ariseth not from the events that are concerning them, but from the temper and disposition of their spirits under them. And since not only righteous men but prophets share with the worst in present punishments, we may infer from thence, with the greatest assurance, that there are rewards reserved for them in the future state. 2nd. Words of conviction, counsel, and comfort, come best to those that are in affliction from their fellow-sufferers. The captives will be best instructed by one that is a captive among them, and experimentally knows their sorrows. 3rd. The spirit of prophecy was not confined to the land of Israel, but some of the brightest of Divine revelations were revealed "in the land of the Chaldeans," which was a happy presage of the carrying of the church, with that Divine revelation upon which it is built, into the Gentile world; and as now, so afterwards, when the gospel kingdom was to be set up, the dispersion of the Jews contributed to the spreading of the knowledge of God. 4th. Wherever we are, we may keep up our communion with God; for 'from the remotest corners of the earth we may find a way open heavenward,'—undique ad cœlos tantundem est viæ. 5th. When God's ministers are bound, yet the word of the Lord is not bound, 2 Tim. ii. 9. When St. Paul was a prisoner, yet the Gospel had a free course. When St. John was banished into the isle of Patmos, Christ visited him there. Nay, God's suffering servants have generally been treated as favourites, and their consolations have much more abounded, then when affliction has abounded, 2 Cor. i. 5.

Thirdly. The discovery which God was pleased to make of himself to the prophet then when he was in these circumstances, to be by him communicated to his people. He here tells us what he saw, what he heard, and what he felt.

1. He saw visions of God, ver. 1. "No man can see God and live;" but many have seen visions of God, such displays of the Divine glory as have both instructed and affected them. And commonly, when God first revealed himself to any prophet, he did it by an extraordinary vision, as to Isaiah, ch. vi., to Jeremiah, ch. i., to Abraham, Acts vii. 2, to settle a correspondence, and a satisfactory way of intercourse, so as that there needed not afterwards a vision upon every revelation. Ezekiel was employed in turning the hearts of the people to the Lord their God, and therefore he must himself see the visions of God. Note, It concerns those to be well acquainted with God themselves, and much affected with what they know of him, whose business it is to bring others to the knowledge and love of him. That he might see the visions of God, the heavens were opened; the darkness and distance which hindered his visions were conquered, and he was let into the light of the glories of the upper world as near and clear as if heaven had been opened to him.

2. He heard the voice of God; ver. 3, "The word of the Lord came expressly" to him; and what he saw was designed to prepare him for what he was to hear. The expression is emphatical; Essendo fuit verbum Dei,—'The word of the Lord was as really it was to him.' There was no mistake in it; it came to him in the fulness of its light and power, in the evidence and demonstration of the Spirit; it came close to him; nay, it came into him, took possession of him, and dwelt in him richly. It came expressly or accurately to him; he did himself clearly understand what he said, and was abundantly satisfied of the truth of it. The essential Word, (so we may take it,) the Word, who is, who is what he is, came to Ezekiel, to send him on his errand.

3. He felt the power of God opening his eyes to see the visions, opening his ear to hear the voice, and opening his heart to receive both. "The hand of the Lord was there upon him." Note, The hand of the Lord goes along with the word of the Lord; and so it becomes effectual. Those only understand and believe the report to whom the arm of the Lord is revealed. The hand of God was upon him, as upon Moses, to cover him, that he should not be overcome by the dazzling light and lustre of the visions he saw, Ex. xxxiii. 22. It was upon him as upon St. John, Rev. i. 17, to revive and support him, that he might bear up and not faint under these discoveries; that he might neither be lifted up nor cast down with the abundance of the revelations. God's grace is sufficient for him, and in token of that his hand is upon him.

4 And I looked, and, behold, a whirlwind came out of the north, a great cloud, and a fire infolding itself, and a brightness was about it, and out of the midst thereof as the colour of amber, out of the midst of the fire. 5 Also out of the midst thereof came the likeness of four living creatures. And this was their appearance; they had the likeness of a man. 6 And every one had four faces, and every one had four wings. 7 And their feet were straight feet; and the sole of their feet was like the sole of a calf's foot: and they sparkled like the colour of burnished brass. 8 And they had the hands of a man under their wings on their four sides; and they four had their faces and their wings. 9 Their wings were joined one to another; they turned not when they went; they went every one straight forward. 10 As for the likeness of their faces, they four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side: and they four had the face of an ox on the left side; they four also had the face of an eagle. 11 Thus were their faces: and their wings were stretched upward; two wings of every one were joined one to another, and two covered their bodies. 12 And they went every one straight forward: whither the spirit was to go, they went; and they turned not when they went. 13 As for the likeness of the living creatures, their appearance was like burning coals of fire, and like the appearance of lamps: it went up and down among the living creatures; and the fire was bright, and out of the fire went forth lightning. 14 And the living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning.

The visions of God, which Ezekiel here saw, were very glorious, and had more particulars than those which other prophets saw. The scope and intention of these visions is, 1. To possess the prophet's mind with very great, and high, and honourable thoughts of that God by whom he was commissioned, and for whom he was employed. It is the likeness of the glory of the Lord that he sees, ver. 28, and from hence we may infer, it is his honour to serve him, for he is one whom angels serve. He may serve him with safety, for he hath power sufficient to bear him out in his work. It is at his peril to draw back from his service, for he hath power to pursue him, as he did Jonah. So great a God as this must be served with reverence and godly fear; and with assurance may Ezekiel foretell what this God will do, for he is able to make his words good. 2. To strike a terror upon the sinners that remained in Zion, and those that were already come to Babylon, who were secure, and bid defiance to the threatenings of Jerusalem's ruin, as we have found in Jeremiah's prophecy, and shall find in this, many did. Let those who said, "We shall have peace, though we go on," know, that our God is a consuming fire, whom they cannot stand before. That this vision had a reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, seems plain from ch. xiii. 3, where he saith, it was "the vision which he saw when he came to destroy the city," that is, to prophesy the destruction of it. 3. To speak comfort to those that feared God and trembled at his word, and humbled themselves under his mighty hand. Let them know, that though they are captives in Babylon yet they have God nigh unto them; though they have not the place of the sanctuary to be their glorious high throne, they have the God of the sanctuary. Dr. Lightfoot observes, 'That now the church is to be planted for a long time in another country, the Lord shews a glory in the midst of them, as he had done at their first constituting into a church in the wilderness; and out of a cloud and fire, as he had done there, he shewed himself, and from between living creatures, as from between the cherubims, he gives his oracles.' This put an honour upon them, by which they might value themselves when the Chaldeans insulted over them; and this might encourage their hopes of deliverance in due time.

Now, to answer these ends, we have in these verses the first part of the vision, which represents God as attended and served by an innumerable company of angels, who are all his messengers, his ministers, doing his commandments, and hearkening to the voice of his word, which speaks him great, as it magnifies an earthly prince to have a splendid retinue, and numerous armies at his command, which engageth his allies to trust him, and his enemies to fear him.

First. The introduction to this vision of the angels is very magnificent and awakening, ver. 4. The prophet, observing the heavens to open, looked, looked up, as it was time, to see what discoveries God would make to him. Note, When the heavens are opened it concerns us to have our eyes open. And to clear the way, "Behold a whirlwind came out of the north," which would drive away the interposing mists of this lower region. Fair weather uses to come out of the north, and thence the wind comes that drive away rain. God can by a whirlwind clear the sky and air, and produce that serenity of mind which is necessary to our communion with heaven. Yet this whirlwind was attended with a great cloud. When we think the clouds that arise from this earth are dispelled, and we can see beyond them, yet still there is a cloud which heavenly things are wrapped in, a cloud from above, so that we cannot order our speech concerning them by reason of darkness. Christ here descended as he ascended, in a cloud. Some by this whirlwind and cloud understand the Chaldean army coming out of the north against the land of Judah, bearing down all before them, as a tempest; and so it agrees with that which was signified by one of the first of Jeremiah's visions; Jer. i. 14, "Out of the north an evil shall break forth;" but I take it here as an introduction rather to the vision than to the sermons. This whirlwind came to Ezekiel, as that to Elijah, 1 Kin. xix. 11, to prepare the way of the Lord, and to demand attention. He that has eyes, that has ears, let him see, let him hear.

Secondly. The vision itself. "A great cloud" was the vehicle of this vision, in which it was conveyed to the prophet; for God's pavilion in which he rests, his chariot in which he rides, is darkness and thick clouds, Ps. xviii. 11; civ. 3. Thus he holds back the face of his throne, lest its dazzling light and lustre should overpower us, by spreading a cloud upon it. Now,

1. The cloud is accompanied with a fire, as upon mount Sinai, where God resided in a thick cloud; but "the sight of his glory was like devouring fire," Ex. xxiv. 16, 17; and his first appearance to Moses was in a flame of fire in the bush; "for our God is a consuming fire." This was "a fire infolding itself," a globe, or orb, or wheel of fire. God being his own cause, his own rule, and his own end, if he be as a fire, he is as a fire infolding itself, or as some read it, 'kindled by itself.' The fire of God's glory shines forth, but it presently catcheth itself, for he lets us know but part of his ways. The fire of God's wrath breaks forth, but presently catcheth itself; and the Divine patience suffers not all his wrath to be stirred up. If it were not a fire thus infolding itself, "O Lord, who shall stand?"

2. The fire is surrounded with a glory; "a brightness was about it," in which it infolded itself, yet it made some discovery of itself. Though we cannot see into the fire, cannot by searching find out God to perfection, yet we see the brightness that is round about it, the reflection of this fire from the thick cloud. Moses might see God's back parts, but not his face; we have some light concerning the nature of God from the brightness which encompasseth it, though we have not an insight into it, by reason of the cloud spread upon it. Nothing more easy than to determine that God is; nothing more difficult than to describe what he is. When God displays his wrath as fire, yet there is a brightness about it; for his holiness and justice appear very illustrious in the punishment of sin and sinners. Even about the devouring fire there is a brightness, which glorified saints will for ever admire.

3. Out of this fire shines the colour of amber. We are not told who or what it was that had this colour of amber, and therefore I take it to be the whole frame of the following vision, which came into Ezekiel's view out of the midst of the fire and brightness, and the first thing he took notice of, before he viewed the particulars, was, that it was of the colour of amber, or the eye of amber, that is, it looked as amber doth to the eye, of a bright flaming fiery colour; the colour of a burning coal, so some think it should be read. The living creatures which he saw coming out of the midst of the fire were seraphims, 'burners;' for "he maketh his angels spirits, his ministers a flaming fire."

4. That which comes out of the fire, of a fiery amber colour, when it comes to be distinctly viewed, is "the likeness of four living creatures," not the living creatures themselves. Angels are spirits, and cannot be seen, but the likeness of them, such a hieroglyphic or representation as God saw fit to make use of, for the leading of the prophet, and us with him, into some acquaintance with the world of angels, (a matter purely of Divine revelation,) so far as is requisite to possess us with an awful sense of the greatness of that God who hath angels for his attendants, and the goodness of that God who hath appointed them to be attendants on his people. The "likeness of these living creatures came out of the midst of the fire;" for angels derive their being and power from God. They are in themselves, and are to us, what he is pleased to make them; their glory is a ray of his. The prophet himself explains this vision; ch. x. 20, "I know that the living creatures were the cherubims," which is one of the names by which the angels are known in Scripture. To Daniel was made known their numbers; "ten thousand times ten thousand," Dan. vii. 10. But though they are many, yet they are one; and that is made known to Ezekiel here. They are one in nature and operation, as an army consisting of thousands is yet called a body of men. We have here an account of,

1st. Their nature. They are living creatures, they are the creatures of God, the work of his hands; their being is derived, they have not life in and of themselves, but receive it from him, who is the fountain of life. As much as the living creatures of this lower world excel the vegetables that are the ornaments of the earth, so much do the angels, the living creatures of the upper world, excel the sun, moon, and stars, the ornaments of the heavens. The sun, say some, is a flame of fire infolding itself, but it is not a living creature, as angels, those flames of fire, are. Angels are living lights, living beings, emphatically so; men on earth are dying creatures, dying daily; "In the midst of life we are in death;" but angels in heaven are living creatures, they live indeed, live to good purpose; and when saints come to be equal unto the angels they shall not die any more, Lu. xx. 36.

2nd. Their number. They are four, so they appear here, though they are innumerable. Not as if these were four particular angels, set up above the rest, as some have fondly imagined, Michael and Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel; but for the sake of the four faces they put on, and to insinuate their being sent forth towards the four winds of heaven, Mat. xxiv. 31; and Zechariah sees them as four chariots going forth, east, west, north and south, Zec. vi. 1. God has messengers to send each way, for his kingdom is universal, and reacheth to all parts of the world.

3rd. Their qualifications, by which they are fitted for the service of their Maker and Master. These are set forth figuratively, and by similitude, as is proper in visions, which are parables to the eye. Their description here is such, and so expressed, as that I think it is not possible by it to form an exact idea of them in our fancies, or with the pencil, for that would be a temptation to worship them; but the several instances of their fitness for the work they are employed in are intended in the several parts of this description. Note, It is the greatest honour of God's creatures to be in a capacity of answering the end of their creation; and the more ready we are to every good work the nearer we approach to the dignity of angels.

These living creatures are described here,

First. By their general appearance: "They had the likeness of a man," they appeared for the main in a human shape. 1*st.* To signify that these living creatures are reasonable creatures, intelligent beings, who have that spirit of a man, which is the candle of the Lord. 2*nd.* To put an honour upon the nature of man, who is made lower, yet but a little lower than the angels, in the very next rank of beings below them; when the invisible intelligences of the upper world would make themselves visible, it is in the likeness of man. 3*rd.* To intimate, that their delights are with the sons of men, as their Master's are, Pr. viii. 31, that they do service to men, and men may have a spiritual communion with them by faith, hope, and holy love. 4*th.* The angels of God appear in the likeness of man, because, in the fulness of time, the Son of God was not only to appear in that likeness, but to assume that nature; they therefore shew this love to it.

Secondly. By their faces: "Every one had four faces," looking four several ways. In St. John's vision, which has a near affinity with this, each of the four living creatures has one of these faces here mentioned, Rev. iv. 7. Here each of them has all four, to intimate that they have all the same qualifications for service; though perhaps, among the angels of heaven, as among the angels of the churches, some excel in one gift and others in another, but all for the common service. Let us contemplate their faces till we be, in some measure, changed into the same image, that we may do the will of God, as the angels do it in heaven. They all four had the face of a man, for in that likeness they appeared, ver. 5; but, besides that, they had the face of a lion, an ox, and an eagle; each masterly in their kind: the lion among wild beasts, the ox among tame ones, and the eagle among fowls, ver. 10. Doth God make use of them for the executing of judgments upon his enemies? they are fierce and strong as the lion and the eagle, in tearing their prey. Doth he make use of them for the good of his people? they are as oxen, strong for labour, and inclined to serve. And in both they have the understanding of a man. The scattered perfections of the living creatures on earth meet in the angels of heaven. They have the likeness of a man, but because there are some things in which man is excelled, even by the inferior creatures, they are therefore compared to some of them. They have the understanding of a man, and such as far exceeds it. They also resemble man in tenderness and humanity. But, 1*st.* A lion excels a man in strength and boldness, and is much more formidable; therefore, the angels, who do so too, put on the face of a lion. 2*nd.* An ox excels man in diligence and patience, and painstaking, and an unwearied discharge of the work he has to do; therefore, the angels, who are constantly employed in the service of God and the church, put on the face of an ox. 3*rd.* An eagle excels man in quickness and piercingness of sight, and in soaring high; and therefore, the angels, who seek things above, and see far into Divine mysteries, put on the face of a flying eagle.

Thirdly. By their wings: "Every one had four wings," ver. 6. In the vision Isaiah had of them they appeared with six, now with four; for they appeared above the throne, and had occasion for two to cover their faces with. The angels are fitted with wings to fly swiftly on God's errands; whatever business God sends them upon they lose no time. Faith and hope are the soul's wings, upon which it soars upwards; pious and devout affections are its wings, on which it is carried forward with vigour and alacrity. The prophet observes here concerning their wings, 1*st.* That they were joined one to another, ver. 9; and again, ver. 11. They did not make use of their wings for fighting, as some birds do; there is no contest among the angels; God maketh peace, perfect peace, in his high places. But their wings were joined in token of their perfect unity and unanimity, and the universal agreement there is among them. 2*nd.* That they were stretched upward, extended, and ready for use, not folded up, or flagging. Let an angel receive the least intimation of the Divine will, and he has nothing to seek, but is upon the wing presently; while our poor dull souls are like the ostrich, that with much difficulty lifteth up herself on high. 3*rd.* That two of their wings were made use of in covering their bodies, the spiritual bodies they assumed. The clothes that cover us are our hindrance in work; angels need no other covering but their own wings, which are their furtherance. They cover their bodies from us, so forbidding us needless inquiries concerning them; ask not after them, for they are wonderful, Jud. xiii. 18. They cover them before God, so directing us, when we approach to God, to see that we be so clothed with Christ's righteousness as that the shame of our nakedness may not appear.

Fourthly. By their feet, including their legs and thighs: They "were straight feet," ver. 7; they stood straight, and firm, and steady, no burthen of service could make their legs to bend under them. The spouse makes this part of the description of her Beloved, that his legs were "as pillars of marble set upon sockets of fine gold," Cant. v. 15; such are the angels' legs. 'The sole of their feet was like that of a calf's foot,' which divideth the hoof, and is therefore clean; 'as it were the sole of a round foot,' as the Chaldee words it; they were ready for motion any way. Their feet were winged, so the Seventy; they went so swiftly that it was as if they flew; and their very feet "sparkled like the colour of burnished brass." Not only the faces, but the very feet of those are beautiful whom God sends on his errands, Isa. lii. 7; every step the angels take is glorious. In the vision John had of Christ it is said, "his feet were like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace," Rev. i. 15.

Fifthly. By their hands: ver. 8, "They had the hands of a man under their wings on their four sides;" an arm and hand under every wing. They had not only wings for motion, but hands for action. Many are quick that are not active; they hurry about a great deal, but do nothing to purpose, bring nothing to pass; they have wings, but no hands: whereas God's servants, the angels, not only go when he sends them, and come when he calls them, but do what he bids them. They are the hands of a man, which are wonderfully made, and fitted for service, which are guided by reason and understanding; for what angels do they do intelligently, and with judgment. They have calves' feet, which speaks the swiftness of their motion; the cedars of Lebanon are said to skip like a calf, Ps. xxix. 6. But they have a man's hand, which speaks the niceness and exactness of their performances, as the heavens are said to be the work of God's fingers. Their hands were under their wings, which concealed them, as they did the rest of their bodies. Note, The agency of angels is a secret thing, and their work is carried on in an invisible way. In working for God, though we must not with the sluggard hide our hand in our bosom, yet we must with the humble not let our left hand know what our right hand doth. We may observe, that where these wings were their hands were under their wings; wherever their wings carried them they carried hands along with them, to be still doing something suitable, something that the duty of the place requires.

4th. Their motions: The living creatures are moving. Angels are active beings; it is not their happiness to sit still and do nothing, but to be always well employed; and we must reckon ourselves then best when we are doing good, doing it as the angels do it, of whom it is here observed,

First. That whatever service they went about, "they went every one straight forward," ver. 9; and again, ver. 12, which intimates, 1*st.* That they sincerely aimed at the glory of God and had a single eye to that in all they did. Their going straight forward supposeth that they looked straight forward, and never had any sinister intentions in what they did. And if thus our eye be single, our whole body will be full of light; the singleness of the eye is the sincerity of the heart. 2*nd.* That they were intent upon the service they were employed in, and did it with a close application of mind. They went forward with their work, for what their hand found to do they did it with all their might, and did not loiter in it. 3*rd.* That they were unanimous in it. They went straight forward, every one about his own work, and did not thwart or jostle one another; did not stand in one another's light, in one another's way. 4*th.* That they perfectly understood their business, and were thoroughly apprised of it; so that they needed not to stand still, to pause, or hesitate, but work their work before them with readiness, as those that knew what they had to do, and how to do it. 5*th.* They were steady and constant in their work. They did not fluctuate, did not tire, did not vary, but were of a piece with themselves; they moved in a direct line, and so went the next way to work in all they did, and lost no time. When we go straight, we go forward; when we serve God with one heart, we rid ground, we rid work.

Secondly. They turned not when they went, ver. 9; and again, ver. 12. 1*st.* They made no blunders or mistakes, which would give them occasion to turn back to rectify them. Their work needed no correction, and therefore needed not to be gone over again. 2*nd.* They minded no diversions. As they turned not back, so they turned not aside, to trifle with any thing that was foreign to their business.

Thirdly. "Whither the Spirit was to go" they went, ver. 12; either, 1*st.* Whither their own spirit was disposed to go, thither they went, having no bodies, as we have, to clog or hinder them. It is our infelicity and daily burthen, that when the spirit is willing yet the flesh is weak, and cannot keep pace with it, so that the good which we would do we do it not; but angels and glorified saints labour under no such impotency, but whatever they incline or intend to do they do it, and never come short of it. Or, rather, 2*nd.* Wheresoever the Spirit of God would have them go, thither they went. Though they had so much wisdom of their own, yet in all their motions and actions they subjected themselves to the conduct and government of the Divine will; whithersoever the Divine providence was to go they went to serve its purposes, and to execute its orders. The Spirit of God, saith Mr. Greenhill, is the great agent that sets angels to work, and it is their honour that they are led, they are easily led by the Spirit. See how tractable and obsequious these noble creatures are; whithersoever the Spirit is to go, they go immediately, with all possible alacrity. Note, Those that walk after the Spirit do the will of God as the angels do it.

Fourthly. They ran and returned like a flash of lightning, ver. 14. This intimates, 1*st.* That they made haste. They were quick in their motions, as quick as lightning; whatever business they went about, they despatched it presently, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. Happy they that have no bodies to retard their motion in holy exercises, and happy shall we be when we come to have spiritual bodies for spiritual work. Satan falls like lightning into his own ruin, Lu. x. 18; angels fly like lightning in their Master's work; the angel Gabriel flew swiftly. 2*nd.* That they made haste back. They ran and returned, ran to do their work and execute their orders, and then returned to give an account of what they had done, and receive new instructions, that they may be always doing. They ran into the lower world, to do what was to be done there; but when they had done it they returned like a flash of lightning to the upper world again, to the beatific vision of their God, which they could not with any patience be longer from than their service did require. Thus we should be in the affairs of this world as out of our element; though we run into them we must not repose in them, but our souls must presently return like lightning to God, their rest and centre.

5. We have an account of the light by which the prophet saw these living creatures, or the looking-glass in which he saw them, ver. 13. 1st. He saw them by their own light, for "their appearance was like burning coals of fire." They are seraphims, 'burners,' noting the ardour of their love to God, their fervent zeal in his service, their splendour and brightness, and their terror against God's enemies. When God employs them to fight his battles, they are as coals of fire, Ps. xviii. 12, to devour the adversaries, as lightnings shot out to discomfit them. 2nd. He saw them by the light of some lamps which "went up and down among" them, the shining whereof was very bright. Satan's works are works of darkness, he is "the ruler of the darkness of this world;" but the angels of light are in the light, and, though they conceal their working, they shew their work, for it will bear the light. But we see them and their works only by candle-light, by the dim light of lamps that go up and down among them; when the day breaks and the shadows flee away, we shall see them clearly. Some make the appearance of these burning coals, and of the lightning that issues out of the fire, to signify the wrath of God and his judgments that were now to be executed upon Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, in which angels were to be employed. And accordingly we find afterwards "coals of fire scattered upon the city," to consume it, which were "fetched from between the cherubims," ch. x. 2. But by the appearance of the lamps then, we may understand the light of comfort which shone forth to the people of God in the darkness of this present trouble. If the ministry of the angels is as a consuming fire to God's enemies, it is a rejoicing light to his own children. To the one this fire is bright, it is very reviving and refreshing; to the other, out of the fire comes forth lightning to destroy them. Note, Good angels are our friends or enemies according as God is.

15 Now as I beheld the living creatures, behold one wheel upon the earth by the living creatures, with his four faces. 16 The appearance of the wheels and their work was like unto the colour of a beryl: and they four had one likeness: and their appearance and their work was as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel. 17 When they went, they went upon their four sides; and they turned not when they went. 18 As for their rings, they were so high that they were dreadful; and their rings were full of eyes round about them four. 19 And when the living creatures went, the wheels went by them: and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up. 20 Whithersoever the spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go; and the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. 21 When those went, these went; and when those stood, these stood; and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. 22 And the likeness of the firmament upon the heads of the living creature was as the colour of the terrible crystal, stretched forth over their heads above. 23 And under the firmament were their wings straight, the one toward the other: every one had two, which covered on this side, and every one had two, which covered on that side, their bodies. 24 And when they went, I heard the noise of their wings, like the noise of great waters, as the voice of the Almighty, the voice of speech, as the noise of an host: when they stood, they let down their wings. 25 And there was a voice from the firmament that was over their heads, when they stood, and had let down their wings.

The prophet is very exact in making and recording his observations concerning this vision. And here we have,

First. The notice he took of the wheels, ver. 15—21. The glory of God appears not only in the splendour of his retinue in the upper world, but in the steadiness of his government here in this lower world. Having seen how "God doth according to his will in the armies of heaven," let us now see how he doth, according to it, "among the inhabitants of the earth;" for there, on the earth, the prophet saw the wheels, ver. 15. As he "beheld the living creatures," and was contemplating the glory of that vision, and receiving instruction from it, this other vision presented itself to his view. Note, Those who make a good use of the discoveries God has favoured them with may expect farther discoveries, for to him that hath shall be given. We are sometimes tempted to think there is nothing glorious but what is in the upper world, whereas, could we with an eye of faith discern the beauty of providence, and the wisdom, power, and goodness which shine in the administration of that kingdom, we would see and say, "Verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth," and acts like himself. There are many things in this vision which give us some light concerning the Divine providence.

1. The dispensations of providence are compared to wheels, either the wheels of a chariot, in which the conqueror rides in triumph; or, rather, the wheels of a clock or watch, which all contribute to the regular motion of the machine. We read of the course or wheel of nature, Jas. iii. 6, which is here set before us as under the direction of the God of nature. Wheels, though they move not of themselves, as the living creatures do, yet they are made movable, and are almost continually kept in action. Providence, represented by these wheels, orders changes; sometimes one spoke of the wheel is uppermost, and sometimes another; but the motion of the wheel on its own axletree, like that of the orbs above, is very regular and steady. The motion of the wheels is circular. By the revolutions of providence things are brought to the same posture and pass which they were in formerly; for "the thing that is is that which has been, and there is no new thing under the sun," Eccl. i. 9, 10.

2. The wheel is said to be "by the living creatures" who attended it to direct its motion; for the angels are employed as the ministers of God's providence, and have a greater hand in directing the motions of second causes to serve the Divine purpose than we think they have. Such a close connexion is there between the living creatures and the wheels, that they moved and rested together. Were angels busily employed, men were busily employed as instruments in their hand, whether of mercy or judgment, though they themselves were not aware of it; or are men active to compass their designs, angels at the same time are acting to control and overrule them. This is much insisted on here; ver. 19, "When the living creatures went" to bring about any business, "the wheels went by them;" when God has work to do by the ministry of angels, second causes are all found or made ready to concur in it; and, ver. 21, "when those stood these stood;" when the angels had done their work, the second causes had done theirs. If the "living creatures were lifted up from the earth," were elevated to any service above the common course of nature, and out of the ordinary road, as suppose in the working of miracles, the dividing of the water, the standing still of the sun, the wheels, contrary to their own natural tendency, which is towards the earth, move in concert with them, and are lifted up over against them; this is thrice mentioned, ver. 19—21. Note, All inferior creatures are, and move, and act, as the Creator, by the ministration of angels, directs and influences them. Visible effects are managed and governed by invisible causes. The reason given of this is, because "the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels," that is, the same wisdom, power, and holiness of God, the same will and counsel of his that guides and governs the angels and all their performances, doth by them order and dispose of all the motions of the creatures in this lower world, and the events and issues of them. God is the soul of the world, and animates the whole, both that above and that beneath; so that they move in perfect harmony, as the upper and lower parts of the natural body do. So that "whithersoever the Spirit is to go," that is, whatever it is God's will and purpose should be done and brought to pass, "thither their spirit is to go," that is, the angels, knowingly and designedly, set themselves to bring it about; and "their spirit is in the wheels," which are therefore "lifted up over against them," that is, both the powers of nature and the wills of men are all made to serve the intention, which they infallibly and irresistibly effect, though perhaps "they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so," Isa. x. 7; Mic. iv. 11, 12. Thus, though the will of God's precept be not done on earth as it is done in heaven, yet the will of his purpose and counsel is and shall be.

3. The wheel is said to have four faces, looking four several ways, ver. 15, noting that the providence of God exerts itself in all parts of the world, east, west, north, and south, and extends itself to the remotest corners of it. Look which way you will upon the wheel of providence, and it has a face towards you, a beautiful one, which you may admire the features and complexion of; it looks upon you as ready to speak to you, if you be but ready to hear the voice of it. Like a well-drawn picture, it has an eye upon all that has an eye upon it. The wheel had so four faces, that it had in it four wheels, which went upon their four sides, ver. 17. At first Ezekiel saw it as one wheel, ver. 15, one sphere; but afterwards he saw it was four, but they four had one likeness, ver. 16, not only that they were like one another, but they were as if they had been one. This intimates, 1st. That one event of providence is like another; what happens to us is that which is common to men, and what we are not to think strange. 2nd. That various events have a tendency to the same issue, and concur to answer the same intention.

4. Their appearance and their work is said to be like the colour of a beryl, ver. 16. 'The colour of Tarshish,' so the word is, that is, of the sea; the beryl is of that colour, sea green, blue Neptune, we call it. The nature of things in this world is like that of the sea, which is in a continual flux, and yet there is a constant coherence and succession of its parts. There is a chain of events which is always in the drawing one way or other. The sea ebbs and flows, so doth providence in its disposals, but always in the stated and appointed times and measures. The sea looks blue, as the air doth, because of the shortness and feebleness of our sight, which can see but a little way of either; to that colour, therefore, is the appearance and work of providence fitly compared, because we cannot find out that which God doth from the beginning to the end, Eccl. iii. 11. We see but part of his ways, Job xxvi. 14; and all beyond looks blue, which gives us to understand no more concerning it but that in truth we ken it not; it is far above out of our sight.

5. Their appearance and their work is likewise said to be "as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel." Observe, Here again their appearance to the prophet is designed to set forth what their work really is. Men's appearance and their work often differ, but the appearance of God's providence and its work agree; if they seem to differ, it is through our ignorance and mistake. Now both were as a wheel in a wheel, a lesser wheel moved by a greater. We pretend not to give a mathematical description of it; the meaning is, that the disposals of providence seem to us intricate, and perplexed, and unaccountable, and yet they will appear in the issue to have been all wisely ordered for the best, so that, though what God doth we know not now, yet we shall know hereafter, Jno. xiii. 7.

6. The motion of these wheels, like that of the living creatures, was steady, and regular, and constant; "They returned not when they went," ver. 17, because they never went amiss, nor otherwise than they should do. God in his providence takes his work before him, and he will have it go forward; and it is going on even then when it seems to us to be going backward. They went as the Spirit directed them, and therefore returned not. We should not have occasion to return back as we have, and to undo that by repentance which we have done amiss, and to do it over again, if we were but led by the Spirit, and followed his conduct. 'The spirit of life' (so some read it) 'was in the wheels,' which carried them on with ease and evenness, and then they returned not when they went.

7. "The rings" or rims "of the wheels were so high that they were dreadful," ver. 18. They were of a vast circumference, so that when they were reared and put in motion the prophet was even afraid to look upon them. Note, The vast compass of God's thought, and the vast reach of his design, is really astonishing; when we go about to describe the circle of providence, we are struck with amazement, and are even swallowed up. O the height and depth of God's counsels, the consideration whereof should strike an awe upon us!

8. They were "full of eyes round about." This circumstance of the vision is most surprising of all, and yet most significant, plainly speaking that the motions of providence are all directed by infinite wisdom. The issues of things are not determined by a blind fortune, but by those "eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the earth, and are in every place, beholding the evil and the good." Note, It is a great satisfaction to us, and ought to be so, that, though we cannot account for the springs and tendencies of events, yet they are all under the cognizance and conduct of an all-wise, all-seeing God.

Secondly. The notice he took of the firmament above, over the heads of the living creatures. When he saw the living creatures moving, and the wheels by them, he looked up, as it is proper for us to do when we observe the various motions of providence in this lower world; looking up he saw "the firmament stretched forth over the heads of the living creatures," ver. 22. What is done on earth is done under the heaven, as the Scripture often speaks, under its inspection and influence. Observe,

1. What he saw. "The firmament was as the colour of the terrible crystal," truly glorious, but terribly so; the vastness and brightness of it put the prophet into an amazement, and struck him with an awful reverence. The terrible ice or frost, (so it may be read,) the colour of snow congealed, or as mountains of ice in the northern seas, which are very frightful. Daring sinners ask, "Can God judge through the dark cloud?" Job xxii. 13; but that which we take to be a dark cloud is to him transparent as crystal, through which "from the place of his habitation he looks upon all the inhabitants of the earth," Ps. xxxiii. 14. Under the firmament he saw the wings of the living creatures erect, ver. 23; when they pleased they used them either for flight or for covering, or two for flight and two for covering. God is on high above the firmament, the angels are under the firmament, which notes their subjection to God's dominion, and their readiness to fly on his errands "in the open firmament of heaven," and to serve him unanimously.

2. What he heard. 1st. He heard "the noise of angels' wings," ver. 24. Bees and other insects make a great noise with the vibration of their wings; here the angels do so, to awaken the attention of the prophet to that which God was about to say to him from the firmament, ver. 25. Angels, by the providences they are employed in, sound God's alarms to the children of men, and stir them up to hear his voice; for that is it that cries in the city, and is heard and understood by the men of wisdom. The noise of their wings was loud and terrible, "as the noise of great waters;" like the rout or roaring of the sea, "and as the noise of an host," the noise of war; but it was articulate and intelligible, and did not give an uncertain sound, for it was "the voice of speech;" nay it was "as the voice of the Almighty," for God, by his providences, speaks once, yea twice, if we could but perceive it, Job xxxiii. 14; the Lord's voice cries, Mic. vi. 9. 2nd. He heard "a voice from the firmament," from him that sits upon the throne there, ver. 25. When the angels moved they made a noise with their wings, but when with that they had roused a careless world, they stood still, and "let down their wings," that there might be a profound silence, and so God's voice might be the better heard. The voice of providence is designed to open men's ears to the voice of the word, to do the office of the crier, that with a loud voice charges silence while the judge passeth sentence; "He that has ears to hear let him hear." Note, Noises on earth should awaken our attention to the voice from the firmament; for "how shall we escape if we turn away from him that speaks from heaven?"

26 And above the firmament that was over their heads was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone: and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it. 27 And I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it, from the appearance of his loins even upward, and from the appearance of his loins even downward, I saw as it were the appearance of fire, and it had brightness round about. 28 As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD. And when I saw it, I fell upon my face, and I heard a voice of one that spake.

All the other parts of this vision were but a preface and introduction to this. God in them had made himself known as Lord of angels, and supreme director of all the affairs of this lower world; from whence it is easy to infer, that, whatever God by his prophets either promiseth or threateneth to do, he is able to effect it. Angels are his servants, men are his tools. But now a Divine revelation is to be given to a prophet, and by him to the church, we must look higher than the living creatures or the wheels; and must expect that from the eternal Word, of whom we have an account in these verses. Ezekiel hearing a voice from the firmament, looked up, as John did, to see the voice that spake with him, and he saw one like unto the Son of man, Rev. i. 12, 13. The second Person sometimes tried the fashion of a man occasionally, before he clothed himself with it for good and all; and the spirit of prophecy is called the Spirit of Christ, 1 Pet. i. 11; and the testimony of Jesus, Rev. xix. 10.

First. This glory of Christ that the prophet saw was above the firmament, that was over the heads of the living creatures, ver. 26. Note, The heads of angels themselves are under the feet of the Lord Jesus; for the firmament that is over their heads is under his feet. Angels, principalities, and powers are made subject to him, 1 Pet. iii. 22. This dignity and dominion of the Redeemer before his incarnation magnifies his condescension in his incarnation, when he was made a little lower than the angels, Heb. ii. 9.

Secondly. The first thing he observed was a throne, for Divine revelation comes backed and supported with a royal authority; we must have an eye of faith to God and Christ as upon a throne. The first thing John discovered in his visions was a throne set in heaven, Rev. iv. 2; which commands reverence and subjection. It is a throne of glory, a throne of grace, a throne of triumph, a throne of government, a throne of judgment. "The Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens," has prepared it for his Son, whom he hath set King on his holy hill of Zion.

Thirdly. On the throne he saw the appearance of a man. This is good news to the children of men, that the throne above the firmament is filled with one that is not ashamed to appear even there in the likeness of man. Daniel in vision saw the kingdom and dominion given to one like the Son of man, who therefore hath "authority given him to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man," Jno. v. 27; so appearing in these visions.

Fourthly. The prince and judge upon this throne, though he appear in fashion as a man, yet he appears in more than human glory, ver. 27. 1. Is God a shining light? So is he. When the prophet saw him, he saw as the colour of amber; that is, a brightness round about, for God dwells in light, and covers himself with light as with a garment. How low did the Redeemer stoop for us, when, to bring about our salvation, he suffered this glory to be eclipsed by the veil of his humanity! 2. Is God a consuming fire? So is he. From his loins, both upward and downward, there was the appearance of fire. The fire above the loins was round about within the amber, it was inward and involved, that below the loins was more outward and open, and yet that also had brightness round about. Some make the former to signify Christ's Divine nature, the glory and virtue of which is hid within the colour of amber; it is what no man has seen, or can see. The latter, his human nature, the glory of which there were those that saw, "the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth," Jno. i. 14. He had rays coming out of his hand, and yet there was the hiding of his power, Hab. iii. 4. The fire in which the Son of man appeared here might be intended to signify the judgments that were ready to be executed upon Judah and Jerusalem, coming from that fiery indignation of the Almighty which devours the adversaries. Nothing more dreadful to the most daring sinners, than "the wrath of him that sits upon the throne, and of the Lamb," Rev. vi. 16. The day is coming "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed in flaming fire," 2 Thes. i. 7, 8. It concerns us, therefore, to "kiss the Son, lest he be angry."

Fifthly. The throne is surrounded with a rainbow, ver. 28; it is so in St. John's vision, Rev. iv. 3. The brightness about it was of divers colours, as "the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain;" which, as it is a display of majesty, and looks very great, so it is a pledge of mercy, and looks very kind; for it is a confirmation of the gracious promise God has made, that he will not drown the world again; and he hath said, he will look upon the bow, and remember the covenant, Gen. ix. 16. This intimates that he who sits upon the throne is the Mediator of the covenant; that his dominion is for our protection, not our destruction; that he interposeth between us and the judgments our sins have deserved; and that all the promises of God are in him Yea and Amen. Now the fire of God's wrath was breaking out against Jerusalem, bounds should be set to it; and he would not make an utter destruction of it, for he would look upon the bow, and remember the covenant, as he promised in such a case, Lev. xxvi. 42.

Sixthly. We have the conclusion of this vision.

1. What notion the prophet himself had of it; "This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord." Here, as all along, he is careful to guard against all gross, corporeal thoughts of God, which might derogate from the transcendent purity of his nature. He doth not say, "This was the Lord," for he is invisible, but this was "the glory of the Lord;" in which he was pleased to manifest himself a glorious Being. Yet it is not the glory of the Lord, but the likeness of that glory, some faint resemblance of it; nor is it any adequate likeness of that glory, but only the appearance of that likeness, a shadow of it, and not the very image of the thing, Heb. x. 1.

2. What impressions it made upon him; "When I saw it I fell upon my face." 1st. He was overpowered by it, the dazzling lustre of it conquered him, and threw him upon his face; for "who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?" Or rather, 2nd. He prostrated himself, in an humble sense of his own unworthiness of the honour now done him, and of the infinite distance which he now more than ever perceived to be between him and God. He fell upon his face, in token of that holy awe and reverence of God, which his mind was possessed and filled with. Note, The more God is pleased to make known of himself to us, the more low we should be before him. He fell upon his face to adore the majesty of God, and to implore his mercy; and to deprecate the wrath he saw ready to break out against the children of his people.

3. What instructions he had from it. All he saw was only to prepare him for that which he was to hear, for "faith comes by hearing;" he, therefore, "heard a voice of one that spake," for we are taught by words, not merely by hieroglyphics. When he fell on his face ready to receive the word, then he heard the voice of one that spake; for God delights to teach the humble.

CHAPTER II.

What our Lord Jesus said to St. Paul, Acts xxvi. 16, may fitly be applied to the prophet Ezekiel, to whom the same Jesus is here speaking, "Rise, and stand on thy feet, for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister." We have here Ezekiel's ordination to his office, which the vision was designed to fit him for; not to entertain his curiosity with uncommon speculations, but to put him into business. Now here, I. He is commissioned to go as a prophet to the house of Israel, now captives in Babylon, and to deliver God's messages to them from time to time, ver. 1—5. II. He is cautioned not to be afraid of them, ver. 6. III. He is instructed what to say to them, and has words put into his mouth, which is signified by the vision of a roll, which he was ordered to eat, ver. 7—10, and which in the next chapter we find he did eat.

AND he said unto me, Son of man, stand upon thy feet, and I will speak unto thee. 2 And the spirit entered into me when he spake unto me, and set me upon my feet, that I heard him that spake unto me. 3 And he said unto me, Son of man, I send thee to the children of Israel, to a rebellious nation that hath rebelled against me: they and their fathers have transgressed against me, even unto this very day. 4 For they are impudent children and stiffhearted. I do send thee unto them; and thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD. 5 And they, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, (for they are a rebellious house,) yet shall know that there hath been a prophet among them.

The title here given to Ezekiel, as often afterwards, is very observable. God, when he speaks to him, calls him, Son of man, ver. 1, 3; son of Adam, son of the earth. Daniel is once called so, Dan. viii. 17, and but once. The compellation is used to no other of the prophets, but to Ezekiel all along. We may take it, 1. As an humbling, diminishing title. Lest Ezekiel should be lifted up with the abundance of the revelations, he is put in mind of this that still he is a son of man, a mean, weak, mortal creature. Among other things made known to him, it was necessary he should be made to know this, that he was a son of man; and therefore it was wonderful condescension in God that he was pleased thus to manifest himself to him. Now he is among the living creatures the angels, yet he must remember that he is himself a man, a dying creature. What is man, or the son of man, that he should be thus visited, thus dignified? Though God had here a splendid retinue of holy angels about his throne, that were ready to go on his errands, yet he passeth them all by, and pitches upon Ezekiel, a son of man, to be his messenger to the house of Israel; for "we have this treasure in earthen vessels," and God's messages sent us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid, nor their hand be heavy upon us. Ezekiel was a priest, but the priesthood was brought low, and the honour of it laid in the dust; it therefore became him, and all of his order, to humble themselves and to lie low, as sons of men, common men. He was now to be employed as a prophet, God's ambassador, and a ruler over the kingdoms, Jer. i. 10, a post of great honour; but he must remember that he is a son of man, and whatever good he did it was not by any might of his own, for he was a son of man; but in the strength of Divine grace, which therefore must have all the glory. Or, 2. We may take it as an honourable, dignifying title; for it is one of the titles of the Messiah in the Old Testament, Dan. vii. 13, "I saw one like the Son of man come with the clouds of heaven;" from whence Christ borrows the title he often calls himself by, the Son of man. The prophets were types of him, as they had near access to God, and great authority among men; and, therefore, as David the king is called the Lord's anointed, or Christ, so Ezekiel the prophet, is called, Son of man.

First. Ezekiel is here set up, and made to stand, that he might receive his commission, ver. 1, 2. He is set up

1. By a Divine command; "Son of man, stand upon thy feet." His lying prostrate was a posture of greater reverence, but his standing up would be a posture of greater readiness, and fitness for business. Our adorings of God must not hinder, but rather quicken and excite, our actings for God. He fell on his face in a holy fear and awe of God, but he was quickly raised up again; for they that humble themselves shall be exalted. God delights not in the dejections of his servants, but the same that brings them low will raise them up; the same that is a spirit of bondage will be a spirit of adoption. "Stand, and I will speak to thee." Note, We may then expect that God will speak to us, when we stand ready to do what he commands us.

2. By a Divine power going along with that command, ver. 2. God bade him stand up; but, because he had not strength of his own to recover his feet, nor courage to face the vision, the Spirit entered into him, and set him upon his feet. Note, God is graciously pleased to work that in us which he requires of us, and raiseth those whom he bids rise. We must stir up ourselves, and then God will put strength into us; must work out our salvation, and then God will work in us. He observed that the Spirit entered into him then when Christ spake to him; for Christ conveys his Spirit by his word, as the ordinary means, and makes the word effectual by the Spirit. The Spirit set the prophet upon his feet, to raise him up from his dejections, for he is the Comforter. Thus in the like case Daniel was strengthened by a Divine touch, Dan. x. 18; and John was raised by the right hand of Christ laid upon him, Rev. i. 17. The Spirit set him upon his feet, made him willing and forward to do as he was bidden, and then he heard him that spake to him. He heard the voice before, ch. i. 28; but now he heard it more distinctly and clearly, heard it, and submitted to it. The Spirit sets us upon our feet, by inclining our will to our duty, and thereby disposeth the understanding to receive the knowledge of it.

Secondly. Ezekiel is here sent, and made to go with a message to the children of Israel; ver. 3, "I send thee to the children of Israel." God had for many ages been sending to them his servants the prophets, rising up betimes and sending them, but to little purpose. They were now sent into captivity for abusing God's messengers; and yet even there God sends this prophet among them, to try if their ears were open to discipline, now they were held in the cords of affliction. As the supports of life, so the means of grace, are continued to us after they have been a thousand times forfeited. Now observe,

1. The rebellion of the people to whom this ambassador is sent; and he is sent to reduce them to their allegiance, to bring back the children of Israel to the Lord their God. Let the prophet know that there is occasion for his going on this errand, for they are a rebellious nation, ver. 3; a rebellious house, ver. 5. They are called children of Israel; they retain the name of their pious ancestors, but they are wretchedly degenerated, they are become Goim,—'nations,' the word commonly used for the Gentiles; the children of Israel are become as the children of the Ethiopian, (Am. ix. 7,) for they are rebellious; and rebels at home are much more provoking to a prince than enemies abroad. Their idolatries and false worships were the sins which more than any other denominated them a rebellious nation; for thereby they set up another prince in opposition to their rightful sovereign, and did homage, and pay tribute to the usurper, which is the highest degree of rebellion that can be.

1st. They had been all along a rebellious generation, and had persisted in their rebellion; "they and their fathers have transgressed against me." Note, Those are not always in the right that have antiquity and the fathers on their side, for there are errors and corruptions of long standing; and it is so far from being an excuse for walking in an ill way, that our fathers walked in it, that it is really an aggravation, for it is justifying the sin of those that have gone before us. They have continued in their rebellion "even unto this very day," notwithstanding the various means and methods that have been made use of to reclaim them; to this day, when they are under Divine rebukes for their rebellion, yet they continue rebellious, many among them, like Ahaz, even in their distress, trespass yet more. They are not the better for all the changes that have been concerning them, but still remain unchanged.

2nd. They were now hardened in their rebellion. They are impudent children, brazen-faced, and cannot blush; they are stiff-hearted, self-willed, and cannot bend, cannot stoop; neither ashamed nor afraid to sin; that will not be wrought upon by the sense either of honour or duty. We are willing to hope this was not the character of all, but of many, and those perhaps the leading men. Observe, First. God knew this concerning them, how inflexible, how incorrigible they were. Note, God is perfectly acquainted with every man's true character, whatever his pretensions and professions may be. Secondly. He told the prophet this that he might know the better how to deal with them, and what handle to take them by. He must rebuke such men as those sharply, cuttingly; must deal plainly with them, though they call it dealing roughly. God tells him this, that it might be no surprise or stumblingblock to him, if he found that his preaching should not make that impression upon them which he had reason to think it would.

2. The dominion of the prince by whom this ambassador is sent. 1st. He has authority to command him whom he sends; "I do send thee unto them," and therefore thou shalt say so and so to them, ver. 4. Note, It is the prerogative of Christ to send prophets and ministers, and to enjoin them their work. St. Paul thanked Christ Jesus, who put him into the ministry, 1 Tim. i. 12; for as he was sent of the Father, ministers are sent by him; and as he received the Spirit without measure, he gives the Spirit by measure, saying, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." They are impudent and rebellious, and yet "I send thee unto them." Note, Christ gives the means of grace to many that he knows will not make a good use of those means; puts many a prize into the hands of fools, that not only have no heart to it, but have their hearts turned against it. Thus he will magnify his own grace, justify his own judgment, leave them inexcusable, and make their condemnation more intolerable. 2nd. He has authority by him to command those to whom he sends him; "Thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God." All he said to them must be spoken in God's name, enforced by his authority, and delivered as from him. Christ delivered his doctrines as a Son, "Verily, verily, I say unto you;" the prophets as servants, "Thus saith the Lord God," our Master and yours. Note, The writings of the prophets are the word of God, and are so to be regarded by every one of us. 3rd. He has authority to call those to an account to whom he sends his ambassadors. "Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear;" whether they will attend to the word, or turn their back upon it, "they shall know that there has been a prophet among them," shall know by experience. First. If they hear and obey, they will know by comfortable experience that the word which did them good was brought them by one that had a commission from God, and a Divine power going along with him in the execution of it. Thus they who were converted by St. Paul's preaching are said to be the seals of his apostleship, 1 Cor. ix. 2. When men's hearts are made to burn under the word, and their wills to bow to it, then they know and bear the witness in themselves, that it is not the word of man, but of God. Secondly. If they forbear, if they turn a deaf ear to the word, as it is to be feared they will, "for they are a rebellious house," yet they shall be made to know, that he whom they slighted was indeed a prophet, by the reproaches of their own consciences, and the just judgments of God upon them for refusing him. They shall know it to their cost, know it to their confusion, know it by sad experience, what a pernicious, dangerous thing it is to despise God's messengers. They shall know by the accomplishment of the threatenings, that the prophet who denounced them was sent of God; thus the word will take hold of men, Zec. i. 6. Note, 1*st*. Those to whom the word of God is sent are upon their trial, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear, and accordingly will their doom be. 2*nd*. Whether we be edified by the word or no, it is certain God will be glorified, and his word magnified, and made honourable. Whether it be a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death, either way it will appear to be of Divine original.

6 And thou, son of man, be not afraid of them, neither be afraid of their words, though briers and thorns be with thee, and thou dost dwell among scorpions: be not afraid of their words, nor be dismayed at their looks, though they be a rebellious house. 7 And thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear: for they are most rebellious. 8 But thou, son of man, hear what I say unto thee; Be not thou rebellious like that rebellious house: open thy mouth, and eat that I give thee. 9 And when I looked, behold, an hand was sent unto me; and, lo, a roll of a book was therein; 10 And he spread it before me; and it was written within and without: and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe.

The prophet, having received his commission, here receives a charge with it. It is a post of honour to which he is advanced, but withal it is a post of service and work; and it is here required of him,

First. That he be bold. He must act in the discharge of this trust with an undaunted courage and resolution, and not be either driven off from his work or made to drive on heavily by the difficulties and oppositions that he would be likely to meet with in it: "Son of man, be not afraid of them," ver. 6. Note, Those that will do any thing to purpose in the service of God must not be afraid of the face of man; for the fear of men will bring a snare, which will be very entangling to us in the work of God. 1. God tells the prophet what was the character of those to whom he sent him, as before, ver. 3, 4. They are briars and thorns, scratching and tearing, and vexing a man which way soever he turns. They are continually teasing God's prophets, and entangling them in their talk, Mat. xxii. 15. They are pricking briers, and grieving thorns. The best of them is as a brier, and "the most upright sharper than a thorn hedge," Mic. vii. 4. Thorns and briers are the fruit of sin and the curse, and of equal date with the enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. Note, Wicked men, especially the persecutors of God's prophets and people, are as briers and thorns, which are hurtful to the ground, choke the good seed, hinder God's husbandry, are vexatious to his husbandmen; but they are nigh unto cursing, and their end is to be burned; yet God makes use of them sometimes for the correction and instruction of his people, as Gideon taught the men of Succoth with thorns and briers, Jud. viii. 16. Yet this is not the worst of their character,—they are scorpions, venomous and malignant; the sting of a scorpion is a thousand times more hurtful than the scratch of a brier. Persecutors are a generation of vipers; are of the serpent's seed, and the poison of asps is under their tongue; and they are more subtle than any beast of the field. And, which makes the prophet's case the more grievous, he dwells among these scorpions, they are continually about him, so that he cannot be safe or quiet in his own house. These ill men are his ill neighbours, who thereby have many opportunities, and will let slip none to do him a mischief. God takes notice of this to the prophet, as Christ to the angel of one of the churches, Rev. ii. 13, "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is." Ezekiel had been, in vision, conversing with angels, but when he comes down from this mount he finds he dwells with scorpions. 2. He tells him what would be their carriage towards him, that they would do what they could to frighten him with their looks and their words; they would hector him and threaten him, would look scornfully and spitefully at him, and do their utmost to face him down, and put him out of countenance, that they might drive him off from being a prophet, or at least from telling them of their faults, and threatening them with the judgments of God; or, if they could not prevail in this, that they might vex and perplex him, and disturb the repose of his mind. They were now themselves in subjection, divested of all power, so that they had no other way of persecuting the prophet but with their looks and their words, and so they did persecute him. "Behold, thou hast spoken, and done evil things as thou couldst," Jer. iii. 5. If they had had more power they would have done more mischief. They were now in captivity, smarting for their rebellion, and particularly their misusing God's prophets, and yet they are as bad as ever. "Though thou bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." No providences will of themselves humble and reform men, unless the grace of God work with them. But, how malicious soever they were, Ezekiel must not be afraid of them, nor dismayed; he must not be deterred from his work, or any part of it, nor be disheartened or dispirited in it by all their menaces, but go on in it with resolution and cheerfulness, assuring himself of safety under the Divine protection.

Secondly. It is required that he be faithful, ver. 7. 1. He must be faithful to Christ who sent him; "Thou shalt speak my words unto them." Note, As it is the honour of prophets that they are intrusted to speak God's words, so it is their duty to cleave close to them, and to speak nothing but what is agreeable to the words of God; ministers must always speak according to that rule. 2. He must be faithful to the souls of those to whom he was sent; "Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear," he must deliver his message to them as he received it. He must bring them to comply with the word, and not study to accommodate the word to their humours. It is true, "they are most rebellious," they are rebellion itself; but however, speak my words to them, whether they are pleasing or unpleasing. Note, The untractableness and unprofitableness of people under the word is no good reason why ministers should leave off preaching to them; nor must we decline an opportunity by which good may be done, though we have a great deal of reason to think no good will be done.

Thirdly. It is required that he be observant of his instructions.

1. Here is a general intimation what the instructions were that were given him in the contents of the book which was spread before him, ver. 10. 1st. His instructions were large, for the roll was written within and without, on the inside and on the backside of the roll; it was as a sheet of paper written on all the four sides. One side contained their sins, the other side contained the judgments of God coming upon them for those sins. Note, God hath a great deal to say to his people when they are degenerated and become rebellious. 2nd. His instructions were melancholy, he was sent on a sad errand: the matter contained in the book was "lamentations, and mourning, and woe." The idea of his message is taken from the impression it would make upon the minds of those that carefully attended to it; it would set them a weeping, and crying out, Woe and alas! Both the discoveries of sin, and the denunciations of wrath, would be matter of lamentations. What could be more lamentable, more mournful, more woful, than to see a holy, happy people, sunk into such a state of sin and misery, as it appears by the prophecy of this book the Jews were at this time? Ezekiel echoes to Jeremiah's lamentations. Note, Though God is rich in mercy, yet impenitent sinners will find there are, even among his words, lamentations and woe.

2. Here is an express charge given the prophet to observe his instructions, both in receiving his message and delivering it. He is now to receive it, and is here commanded,

1st. To attend diligently to it; "Son of man, hear what I say unto thee," ver. 8. Note, Those that speak from God to others must be sure to hear from God themselves, and be obedient to his voice. "Be not thou rebellious," that is, Do not refuse to go on this errand, or to deliver it; do not fly off, as Jonah did, for fear of disobliging thy countrymen. They are a rebellious house among whom thou livest; but be not thou like them, do not comply with them in any thing that is evil. If ministers, that are reprovers by office, connive at sin, and indulge sinners, either shew them not their wickedness, or shew them not the fatal consequences of it, for fear of displeasing them, and getting their ill-will, they hereby make themselves partakers of their guilt, and are rebellious like them. If people will not do their duty in reforming, yet let ministers do theirs in reproving; and they will have the comfort of it in the reflection, whatever the success be, as that prophet had, Isa. l. 5, "The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious." Even the best men, when their lot is cast in bad times and places, have need to be cautioned against the worst crimes.

2nd. To digest it in his own mind by an experience of the savour and power of it. Do not only hear what I say unto thee, but "open thy mouth, and eat that I give thee." Prepare to eat it, and eat it willingly, and with an appetite. All God's children are content to be at their heavenly Father's finding, and to eat whatever he gives them. That which God's hand reached out to Ezekiel was a roll of a book, or, the volume of a book; a book, or scroll of paper or parchment full written, and rolled up. Divine revelation comes to us from the hand of Christ; he gave it to the prophets, Rev. i. 1. When we look at the roll of the book we must have an eye to the hand by which it is sent to us. He that brought it to the prophet spread it before him, that he might not swallow it with an implicit faith, but might fully understand the contents of it, and then receive it and make it his own. "Be not rebellious," saith Christ, "but eat what I give thee." If we receive not what Christ in his ordinances and providences allots for us, if we submit not to his word and rod, and reconcile not ourselves to both, we shall be accounted rebellious.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter we have the farther preparation of the prophet for the work to which God called him. I. His eating of the roll that was presented to him in the close of the foregoing chapter, ver. 1—3. II. Farther instructions and encouragements given him to the same purpose with those in the foregoing chapter, ver. 4—11. III. The mighty impulse he was under, with which he was carried to those that were to be his hearers, ver. 12—15. IV. A farther explication of his office and business as a prophet, under the similitude of a watchman, ver. 16—21. V. The restraining and restoring of the prophet's liberty of speech, as God pleased, ver. 22—27.

MOREOVER he said unto me, Son of man, eat that thou findest; eat this roll, and go speak unto the house of Israel. 2 So I opened my mouth, and he caused me to eat that roll. 3 And he said unto me, Son of man, cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this roll that I give thee. Then did I eat it; and it was in my mouth as honey for sweetness. 4 And he said unto me, Son of man, go, get thee unto the house of Israel, and speak with my words unto them. 5 For thou art not sent to a people of a strange speech and of an hard language, but to the house of Israel; 6 Not to many people of a strange speech and of an hard language, whose words thou canst not understand. Surely, had I sent thee to them, they would have hearkened unto thee. 7 But the house of Israel will not hearken unto thee; for they will not hearken unto me: for all the house of Israel are impudent and hardhearted. 8 Behold, I have made thy face strong against their faces, and thy forehead strong against their foreheads. 9 As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead: fear them not, neither be dismayed at their looks, though they be a rebellious house. 10 Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, all my words that I shall speak unto thee receive in thine heart, and hear with thine ears. 11 And go, get thee to them of the captivity, unto the children of thy people, and speak unto them, and tell them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear. 12 Then the spirit took me up, and I heard behind me a voice of a great rushing, saying, Blessed be the glory of the LORD from his place. 13 I heard also the noise of the wings of the living creatures that touched one another, and the noise of the wheels over against them, and a noise of a great rushing. 14 So the spirit lifted me up, and took me away, and I went in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit; but the hand of the LORD was strong upon me. 15 Then I came to them of the captivity at Tel-abib, that dwelt by the river of Chebar, and I sat where they sat, and remained there astonished among them seven days.

CHEBAR.

These verses are fitly joined by some translators to the foregoing chapter, as being of a piece with it, and a continuation of the same vision. The prophets received the word from God that they might deliver it to the people of God; furnished themselves, that they might furnish them with the knowledge of the mind and will of God. Now here the prophet is taught,

First. How he must receive Divine revelation himself, ver. 1. Christ (whom he saw upon the throne, ch. i. 26,) said to him, "Son of man, eat this roll." Admit this revelation into thine understanding, take it, take the meaning of it, understand it aright; admit it into thy heart, apply it, and be affected with it; imprint it in thy mind, ruminate and chew the cud upon it; take it as it is, entire, and make no difficulty of it; nay, take a pleasure in it, as thou dost in thy meat, and let thy soul be nourished and strengthened by it; let it be meat and drink to thee, and as thy necessary food; be full of it, as thou art of the meat thou hast eaten. Thus ministers should in their studies and meditations take in that word of God which they are to preach to others. "Thy words were found, and I did eat them," Jer. xv. 16. They must be both well acquainted and much affected with the things of God, that they may speak of them both clearly and warmly, with a great deal of Divine light and heat. Now observe,

1. How this command is inculcated upon the prophet. In the chapter before, "Eat what I give thee;" and here, ver. 1, "Eat that thou findest," that is, that which is presented to thee by the hand of Christ. Note, Whatever we find to be the word of God, whatever is brought to us by him who is the Word of God, we must receive it without disputing. What we find set before us in the Scripture, that we must eat. And again, ver. 3, "Cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this roll." Do not eat it and bring it up again, as that which is nauseous, but eat it and retain it, as that which is nourishing, and grateful to the stomach. Feast upon this vision till thou be full of matter, as Elihu was, Job xxxii. 17. Let the word have a place in thee, the innermost place. We must take pains with our own hearts, that we may cause them duly to receive and entertain the word of God, that every faculty may do its office in order to the due digesting of the word of God, that it may be turned in succum et sanguinem,—'into blood and spirits.' We must empty ourselves of worldly things, that we may fill our bowels with this roll.

2. How this command is explained; ver. 10, "All my words that I shall speak unto thee," to be spoken unto the people, "thou must receive in thine heart," as well as hear with thine ears; receive them in the love of them. "Let these sayings sink down into your ears," Lu. ix. 44. Christ demands the prophet's attention, not only to what he now saith, but to all that he shall at any time hereafter speak; receive it all in thine heart, meditate on these things, and give thyself wholly to them, 1 Tim. iv. 15.

3. How this command was obeyed, in vision. He opened his mouth and Christ caused him to eat the roll, ver. 2. If we be truly willing to receive the word into our hearts, Christ will by his Spirit bring it into them, and cause it to dwell in us richly. If he that opens the roll, and by his Spirit, as a Spirit of revelation, spreads it before us, did not also open our understandings, and by his Spirit, as a Spirit of wisdom, give us the knowledge of it, and cause us to eat it, we should be for ever strangers to it. The prophet had reason to fear that the roll would be an unpleasant morsel, and a sorry dish to make a meal of, but it proved it was in his mouth as honey for sweetness. Note, If we readily obey even the most difficult commands, we shall find that comfort in the reflection which will make us abundant amends for all the hardships we meet with in the way of our duty. Though the roll was filled with lamentations, mournings, and woe, yet it was to the prophet as honey for sweetness. Note, Gracious souls can receive those truths of God with great delight, which speak most terror to wicked people. We find St. John let into some part of the revelation by such a sign as this, Rev. x. 9, 10. He took the book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up, and it was as this here, in his mouth sweet as honey, but it was bitter in the belly; and we shall find that this here was so too, for, ver. 14, the prophet went in bitterness.

Secondly. How he must deliver that Divine revelation to others which he himself had received; ver. 1, "Eat this roll, and" then "go speak to the house of Israel." 1. He must not undertake to preach the things of God to others till he did himself fully understand them. Let him not go without his errand, or take it by the halves. 2. When he doth himself fully understand them, he must be both busy and bold to preach them for the good of others. We must not conceal the words of the Holy One, Job vi. 10, for that is burying a talent which was given us to trade with. He must go and speak to the house of Israel, for it is their privilege to have God's statutes and judgments made known to them; as the giving of the law, the lively oracles, so prophecy, the living oracle, pertains to them. He is not sent to the Chaldeans, to reprove them for their sins, but to the house of Israel, to reprove them for theirs; for the father corrects his own child if he do amiss, not the child of a stranger. The instructions given him in speaking to them are much the same with those in the foregoing chapter.

1. He must speak to them all that, and that only, which God spake to him. He had said before, ch. ii. 7, "Thou shalt speak my words to them;" here he saith, ver. 4, "Thou shalt speak with my words unto them;" or in my words. He must not only say that which for substance is the same that God had said to him, but as near as may be in the same language and expressions. Blessed Paul, though a man of very happy invention, yet speaks of the things of God in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. ii. 13. Scripture truths look best in Scripture language, their native dress; and how can we better speak God's mind than with his words?

2. He must remember that they are the house of Israel whom he is sent to speak to; God's house, and his own, and therefore such as he ought to have a particular concern for, and to deal faithfully and tenderly with. They were such as he had an intimate acquaintance with, being not only their countryman, but their companion in tribulation. They and he were fellow-sufferers, and had lately been fellow-travellers in very melancholy circumstances from Judea to Babylon, and had often mingled their tears, which could not but knit their affections to each other. It was well for the people that they had a prophet who knew experimentally how to symphathize with them, and could not but be touched with the feeling of their infirmities. It was well for the prophet that he had to do with those of his own nation, not with "a people of strange speech and a hard language;" 'deep of lip,' so that thou canst not fathom their meaning; and 'heavy of tongue,' whom it is intolerable and impossible to converse with. Every strange language seems to us to be deep and heavy. Thou art not sent to many such people, whom thou couldest neither speak to nor hear from, neither understand nor be understood among, but by an interpreter. The apostles indeed were sent to many people of a strange speech, but they could not have done any good among them if they had not had the gift of tongues; but Ezekiel was sent only to one people, those but a few, and his own, who having acquaintance with he might hope to find acceptance with.

3. He must remember what God had already told him of the ill character of those to whom he was sent, that if he met with discouragement and disappointment in them, he might not be offended. They are impudent and hard-hearted, ver. 7. No convictions of sin would make them blush, no denunciations of wrath would make them tremble. Two things aggravated their obstinacy: 1st. That they were more obstinate than their neighbours would have been, if the prophet had been sent to them. Had God sent him to any other people, though of a strange speech, surely they would hearkened to him; they would at least have given him a patient hearing, and shewed him that respect which he could not obtain of his own countrymen. The Ninevites were wrought upon by Jonah's preaching, when the house of Israel, that was compassed about with so great a cloud of prophets, was unhumbled and unreformed; but what shall we say to these things? The means of grace are given to those that will not improve them, and withheld from those that would have improved them. We must resolve this into the Divine sovereignty, and say, Lord, "thy judgments are a great deep." 2nd. That they were obstinate against God himself; "They will not hearken unto thee," and no marvel, "for they will not hearken unto me;" they will not regard the word of the prophet, for they will not regard the rod of God, by which the Lord's voice cries in the city. If they believe not God speaking to them by a minister, neither would they believe though he should speak to them by a voice from heaven. Nay, therefore they reject what the prophet saith, because it comes from God, whom the carnal mind is enmity to. They are prejudiced against the law of God, and for that reason turn a deaf ear to his prophets, whose business it is to enforce his law.

4. He must resolve to put on courage, and Christ promiseth to steel him with it, ver. 8, 9. He is sent to such as are impudent and hard-hearted, that will receive no impressions, nor be wrought upon either by fair means or foul, that will take a pride in affronting God's messenger, and confronting the message; it will be a hard task to know how to deal with them. But, 1st. God will enable him to put a good face on it; "I have made thy face strong against their faces," that is, endued thee with all the firmness and boldness that the case calls for. Perhaps Ezekiel was naturally bashful and timorous; but if God did not find him fit, yet by his grace he made him fit, to encounter the greatest difficulties. Note, The more impudent wicked people are in their opposition to religion, the more openly and resolutely should God's people appear in the practice and defence of it; let the innocent stir up himself against the hypocrite, Job xvii. 8. When vice is daring, let not virtue be sneaking; and when God has work to do, he will spirit men for it, and give them strength according to the day. If there be occasion, God can and will by his grace make the foreheads of faithful ministers as an adamant, so that the most threatening powers shall not dash them out of countenance; "The Lord God will help me, therefore have I set my face like a flint," Isa. l. 7. 2nd. He is therefore commanded to have a good heart on it; and to go on in his work with a holy security, not valuing either the censures or the threats of his enemies. "Fear not, neither be dismayed at their looks;" let not the menaces of their impotent malice cast either a damp upon thee or a stumblingblock before thee.

Bold sinners must have bold reprovers; evil beasts must be rebuked cuttingly, Tit. i. 12, 13; must be saved with fear, Jude 23. Those that keep close to the service of God may be sure of the favour of God, and then they need not be dismayed at the proud looks of men. Let not the angry countenance, that drives away a backbiting tongue, give any check to a reproving tongue.

5. He must continue instant with them in his preaching, whatever the success was, ver. 11. He must go to them of the captivity, who being in affliction it was to be hoped would receive instruction; must look upon them as the children of his people, to whom he was nearly allied, and for whom he therefore ought to have a very tender concern, as Paul for his kinsmen, Rom. ix. 3; and he must tell them, not only what the Lord said, but that the Lord said it. Let him speak in God's name, and back what he said with his authority, "Thus saith the Lord God;" tell them so, "whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear." Not that it may be indifferent to us what success our ministry has; but whatever it be, we must go on with our work, and leave the issue to God. We must not say, here are some so good that we do not need to speak to them; or, here are others so bad that it is to no purpose to speak to them; but, however it be, deliver thy message faithfully; tell them the Lord God saith so and so, let them reject it at their peril.

Full instructions being thus given to the prophet, pursuant to his commission, we are here told,

1st. With what satisfaction this mission of his was applauded by the holy angels, who were very well pleased to see one of a nature inferior to their own thus honourably employed and intrusted. He heard "a voice of a great rushing," ver. 12; as if the angels thronged and crowded to see the inauguration of a prophet; for to them is known by the church, that is, by reflection from the church, the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. They seemed to strive who should get nearest to this great sight. He heard "the noise of their wings that touched;" or, as the word is, 'kissed one another;' noting the mutual affections and assistances of the angels. He heard also the noise of the wheels of providence, moving over against the angels, and in concert with them. All this was to engage his attention, and to convince him that the God that sent him, having such a glorious train of attendants, no doubt had power sufficient to bear him out in his work. But all this noise ended in the voice of praise; he heard them saying, "Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place," that is, First. From heaven, his place above, whence his glory was now in vision descending, or whither perhaps it was now returning. Let the innumerable company of angels above join with those employed in this vision, in saying, "Blessed be the glory of the Lord. Praise ye the Lord from the heavens. Praise him all his angels," Ps. cxlviii. 1, 2. Secondly. From the temple, his place on earth, whence his glory was now departing. They lament the departure of the glory, but adore the righteousness of God in it; however it be, yet God is blessed and glorious, and ever will be so. The prophet Isaiah heard God thus praised, when he received his commission, Isa. vi. 4; and a comfort it is to all the faithful servants of God, when they see how much God is dishonoured in this lower world, to think how much he is admired and glorified in the upper world. The glory of the Lord hath many slights from our place, but many praises from his place.

2nd. With what reluctancy of his own spirit, and yet with what a mighty efficacy of the Spirit of God, the prophet was himself brought to the execution of his office. The grace given to him was not in vain; for,

First. The Spirit led him with a strong hand. God bade him go, but he stirred not till the Spirit took him up. "The Spirit of the living creatures," that was in the wheels, now was in the prophet too, and took him up, first, to hear more distinctly the acclamations of the angels, ver. 12; but afterwards, ver. 14, lifted him up, and took him away to his work, which he was backward to, being very loath either to bring trouble upon himself or foretell it to his people. He would gladly have been excused, but must own, as another prophet doth, Jer. xx. 7, "Thou wast stronger than I, and hast prevailed." Ezekiel would willingly have kept all he heard and saw to himself, that it might go no farther; but the hand of the Lord was strong upon him, and overpowered him; he was carried on contrary to his own inclinations by the prophetical impulse, so that he could not but speak the things which he had heard and seen, as the apostles, Acts iv. 20. Note, Those whom God calls to the ministry, as he furnisheth their heads for it, so he bows their hearts to it.

Secondly. He followed with a sad heart. "The Spirit took me away," saith he, "and then I went," but it was "in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit." He had perhaps seen what a hard task Jeremiah had at Jerusalem, when he appeared as a prophet, what pains he took, what opposition he met with, how he was abused by hand and tongue, and what ill treatment he met with, and all to no purpose; and must I be set up for a mark like him? thinks Ezekiel. The life of a captive was bad enough, but what would the life of a prophet in captivity be? therefore he went in this fret, and under this discomposure. Note, There may in some cases be a great reluctancy of corruption, even there where there is a manifest predominancy of grace. "I went," not disobedient to the heavenly vision, or outrunning the work, as Jonah; but I went "in bitterness," not at all pleased with it. When he received the Divine revelation himself, it was to him sweet as honey, ver. 3, he could with abundance of pleasure have spent all his days in meditating upon it; but when he is to preach it to others, who he foresees will be hardened and exasperated by it, and have their condemnation aggravated, then he goes in bitterness. Note, It is a great grief to faithful ministers, and makes them go on in their work with a heavy heart, when they find people untractable, and hating to be reformed. He went in the heat of his spirit, because of the discouragements he foresaw he should meet with; but the hand of the Lord was strong upon him, not only to compel him to his work, but to fit him for it, and carry him through it, and animate him against the difficulties he would meet with, (so we may understand it,) and when he found it so he was better reconciled to his business, and applied himself to do it. Then he "came to them of the captivity," ver. 15, to some place where there were many of them together, "and sat where they sat," either working, or reading, or talking; and continued "among them seven days," to hear what they said, and observe what they did, and all that time he was waiting for the word of the Lord to come to him. Note, Those that would speak suitably and profitably to people about their souls must acquaint themselves with them and with their case; must do as Ezekiel did here, must sit where they sit, and speak familiarly to them of the things of God, and put themselves into their condition; yea, though they sit by the rivers of Babylon: but observe, he was there astonished, overwhelmed with grief for the sins and miseries of his people, and overpowered by the pomp of the vision he had seen. He was there desolate, so some read it. God shewed him no visions, men made him no visits; thus was he left to digest his grief, and come to a better temper, before the word of the Lord should come to him. Note, Those whom God designs to exalt and enlarge he first humbles and straitens for a time.

16 And it came to pass at the end of seven days, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 17 Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me. 18 When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand. 19 Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul. 20 Again, When a righteous man doth turn from his righteousness, and commit iniquity, and I lay a stumblingblock before him, he shall die: because thou hast not given him warning, he shall die in his sin, and his righteousness which he hath done shall not be remembered; but his blood will I require at thine hand. 21 Nevertheless if thou warn the righteous man, that the righteous sin not, and he doth not sin, he shall surely live, because he is warned; also thou hast delivered thy soul.

These farther instructions God gave to the prophet "at the end of seven days," that is, on the seventh day after the vision he had; and it is very probable that both that and this were on the sabbath day, which the house of Israel, even in their captivity, observed as well as they could in those circumstances. We do not find that their conquerors and oppressors tied them to any constant service, as their Egyptian taskmasters had formerly done, but that they might observe the sabbath rest, for a sign to distinguish between them and their neighbours; but for the sabbath work they had not the convenience of temple or synagogue, only it should seem they had a place by the river side where prayer was wont to be made, as Acts xvi. 13. There they met on the sabbath days, there their enemies upbraided them with the songs of Zion, Ps. cxxxvii. 1—3, there Ezekiel met them, and the word of the Lord then and there came to him. He that had been musing and meditating on the things of God all the week was fit to speak to the people in God's name on the sabbath day, and disposed to hear God speak to him. This sabbath day Ezekiel was not so honoured with visions of the glory of God as he had been the sabbath before; but is plainly, and by a very vulgar similitude, told his duty, which he is to communicate to the people. Note, Raptures and transports of joy are not the daily bread of God's children, however they may upon special occasions be feasted with them. We must not deny but that we have truly communion with God, (1 Jno. i. 3,) though we have it not always so sensibly as at some times; and, though the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven may sometimes be looked into, yet ordinarily it is plain preaching that is most for edification. God here tells the prophet what his office was, and what the duty of that office; and this (we may suppose) he was to tell the people, that they might attend to what he said, and improve it accordingly. Note, It is good for people to know and consider what a charge their ministers have of them, and what an account they must shortly give of that charge. Observe,

First. What the office is to which the prophet is called; "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman to the house of Israel," ver. 17. The vision he saw astonished him; he knew not what to make of that, and therefore God used this plain comparison, which served better to lead him into the understanding of his work, and so to reconcile him to it. He sat among the captives, and said little; but God comes to him, and tells him that will not do. He is a watchman, and hath something to say to them; he is appointed to be as a watchman in the city, to guard against fire, robbers, and disturbers of the peace; as a watchman over the flock, to guard against thieves, and beasts of prey; but especially as a watchman in the camp, in an invaded country, or a besieged town, that is to watch the motions of the enemy, and to sound an alarm upon the approach, nay, upon the first appearance of danger. This supposeth the house of Israel to be in a military state, and exposed to enemies, who are subtle and restless in their attempts upon it; yea, and each of the particular members of that house to be in danger, and concerned to stand upon their guard. Note, Ministers are watchmen on the church's walls, Isa. lxii. 6; watchmen that go about the city, Cant. iii. 3. It is a toilsome office. Watchmen must keep awake be they never so sleepy, and keep abroad be it never so cold; they must stand all weathers upon the watch-tower, Isa. xxi. 8; Gen. xxxi. 40. It is a dangerous office. Sometimes they cannot keep their post, but in peril of death from the enemy, who gain their point if they kill the sentinel, and yet they dare not quit their post upon pain of death from their general; such a dilemma are the church's watchmen in. Men will curse them if they be faithful, and God will curse them if they be false; but it is a needful office, the house of Israel cannot be safe without watchmen, and yet except the Lord keep it the watchman waketh but in vain, Ps. cxxvii. 1, 2.

Secondly. What is the duty of this office. The work of a watchman is to take notice, and to give notice.

1. The prophet, as a watchman, must take notice of what God said concerning this people; not only concerning the body of the people, which the prophecies of Jeremiah, and other prophets had most commonly reference to, but concerning particular persons according as their character was. He must not, as other watchmen, look round to spy danger, and gain intelligence; but he must look up to God, and farther he need not look; "hear the word at my mouth," ver. 17. Note, Those that are to preach must first hear; for how can they teach others who have not first learned themselves?

2. He must give notice of what he heard. As a watchman must have eyes in his head, so he must have a tongue in his head; if he be dumb, it is as bad as if he were blind, Isa. lvi. 10. Thou shalt "give them warning from me," sound an alarm in the holy mountain; not in his own name, or as from himself, but in God's name, and from him. Ministers are God's mouth to the children of men. The Scriptures are written for our admonition; "By them is thy servant warned," Ps. xix. 11; but, because that which is delivered viva voce commonly makes the deepest impression, God is pleased by men like ourselves, who are equally concerned, to enforce upon us the warnings of the written word. Now the prophet in his preaching must distinguish between the wicked and the righteous, the precious and the vile; and in his applications must suit his alarms to each, giving every one his portion, which if he did, he should have the comfort of it, whatever the success was; but if not, he was accountable.

1st. Some of those he had to do with were wicked, and he must warn them not to go on in their wickedness, but to turn from it, ver. 18, 19. We may observe here, First. That the God of heaven hath said, and doth say, to every wicked man, that if he go on still in his trespasses, he shall surely die. His iniquity shall undoubtedly be his ruin; it tends to ruin, and will end in ruin. Dying thou shalt die, thou shalt die so great a death; shalt die eternally, be ever dying, but never dead. "The wicked man shall die in his iniquity," shall die under the guilt of it, die under the dominion of it. Secondly. That if a wicked man turn from his wickedness, and from his wicked way, he shall live, and the ruin he is threatened with shall be prevented; and, that he may do so, he is warned of the danger he is in, The wicked man shall die if he go on, but shall live if he repent. Observe, he is to turn from his wickedness, and from his wicked way. It is not enough for a man to turn from his wicked way by an outward reformation, which may be the effect of his sins leaving him, rather than of his leaving his sins; but he must turn from his wickedness, from the love of it, and the inclination to it, by an inward regeneration; if he do not so much as turn from his wicked way, there is little hopes that he will turn from his wickedness. Thirdly. That it is the duty of ministers both to warn sinners of the danger of sin and to assure them of the benefit of repentance; to set before them how miserable they are if they go on in sin, and how happy they may be if they will but repent and reform. Note, The ministry of the word is concerning matters of life and death, for those are the things it sets before us; the blessing and the curse, that we may escape the curse, and inherit the blessing. Fourthly. That though ministers do not warn wicked people as they ought, of their misery and danger, yet that shall not be admitted as an excuse for those that go on still in their trespasses; for, though the watchman did not give them warning, yet they shall die in their iniquity; for they had sufficient warning given them by the providence of God and their own consciences, which if they would have taken they might have saved their lives. Fifthly. That if ministers be not faithful to their trust, if they do not warn sinners, of the fatal consequences of sin, but suffer them to go on unreproved, the blood of those that perish through their carelessness, will be required at their hand; that is, it shall be charged upon them in the day of account, that it was owing to their unfaithfulness that such and such precious souls perished in sin; for who knows but, if they had had fair warning given them, they might have fled in time from the wrath to come? and if it contract so heinous a guilt as it doth to be accessary to the murder of a dying body, what is it to be accessary to the ruin of an immortal soul? Sixthly. That if ministers do their duty, in giving warning to sinners, though the warning be not yet taken, they may have this satisfaction, that they are clear from their blood, and have delivered their own souls, though they cannot prevail to deliver theirs; those that are faithful shall have their reward, though they be not successful.

2nd. Some of those he had to deal with were righteous; at least he had reason to think, in a judgment of charity, that they were so, and he must warn them not to apostatize and turn away from their righteousness, ver. 20, 21. We may observe here, First. That the best men in the world have need to be warned against apostacy, and to be told of the danger they are in of it, and the danger they are in by it. God's servants must be warned, (Ps. xix. 11,) that they do not neglect his work, and quit his service. One good means to keep us from falling is, to keep up a holy fear of falling; Heb. iv. 1, "Let us therefore fear;" and Rom. xi. 20, even those that stand by faith must not be highminded but fear, and must therefore be warned. Secondly. There is a righteousness which a man may turn from, a seeming righteousness, from which, if men turn, thereby it appears that it was never sincere, how passable, nay, how plausible soever it was; for "if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us," 1 Jno. ii. 19. There are many that begin in the spirit, but end in the flesh; that set their faces heavenwards, but look back; that had a first love, but have lost it, and turned from the holy commandment. Thirdly. When men turn from their righteousness, they soon learn to commit iniquity. When they grow careless and remiss in the duties of God's worship, neglect them, or are negligent in them, they become an easy prey to the tempter. Omissions make way for commissions. Fourthly. When men turn from their righteousness, and commit iniquity, it is just with God to lay stumblingblocks before them, that they may grow worse and worse till they are ripened for destruction. When Pharaoh hardened his heart, God hardened it. When sinners turn their back upon God, desert his service, and so cast a reproach upon it, he doth in a way of righteous judgment not only withdraw his restraining grace, and give them up to their own hearts' lusts, but order them, by his providence, into such circumstances as occasion their sin and hasten their ruin. There are those to whom Christ himself is "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence," 1 Pet. ii. 8. Fifthly. The righteousness which men relinquish shall never be remembered to their honour or comfort; it will stand them in no stead in this world or the other. Apostates lose all that they have wrought; their services and sufferings are all in vain, and shall never be brought to account, because not continued in. It is a rule in the law, Factum non dicitur quod non perseverat,—'We are said to do that only which we do perseveringly;' Gal. iii. 3, 4. Sixthly. If ministers do not give fair warning as they ought, of the weakness of the best, their aptness to stumble and fall, the particular temptations they are in, and the fatal consequences of apostacy, the ruin of those that do apostatise will be laid at their door, and they shall answer for it. Not but that there are those who are warned against it, and yet turn from their righteousness; but that case is not put here as was concerning the wicked man; but on the contrary, that a righteous man being warned, takes the warning, and doth not sin, ver. 21, for if you give instruction to a wise man, he will be yet wiser. We must not only not flatter the wicked, but not flatter even the righteous, as if they were perfectly safe anywhere on this side heaven. Seventhly. If ministers give warning, and people take it, it is well for both; nothing more beautiful than "a wise reprover upon an obedient ear;" the one shall live because he is warned, and the other has delivered his soul. What can a good minister desire more, than to save himself and those that hear him? 1 Tim. iv. 16.

22 And the hand of the LORD was there upon me; and he said unto me, Arise, go forth into the plain, and I will there talk with thee. 23 Then I arose, and went forth into the plain: and, behold, the glory of the LORD stood there, as the glory which I saw by the river of Chebar: and I fell on my face. 24 Then the spirit entered into me, and set me upon my feet, and spake with me, and said unto me, Go, shut thyself within thine house. 25 But thou, O son of man, behold, they shall put bands upon thee, and shall bind thee with them, and thou shalt not go out among them: 26 And I will make thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth, that thou shalt be dumb, and shalt not be to them a reprover: for they are a rebellious house. 27 But when I speak with thee, I will open thy mouth, and thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; He that heareth, let him hear; and he that forbeareth, let him forbear: for they are a rebellious house.

After all this large and magnificent discovery which God had made of himself to the prophet, and the full instructions he had given him how to deal with those to whom he sent him with an ample commission, we would have expected presently to see him preaching the word of God to a great congregation of Israel; but here we find it quite otherwise. His work here at first seems not at all proportionable to the pomp of his call.

First. We have him here retired for farther learning. By his unwillingness to go, it should seem as if he were not so thoroughly convinced as he might have been of the ability of him that sent him to bear him out; and therefore to hearten him against the difficulties he foresaw, God will favour him with another vision of his glory, which, if any thing, would put life into him, and animate him for his work. In order to this God calls him to the plain, (ver. 22,) and there he will have some talk with him. See and admire the condescension of God in conversing thus familiarly with a man, a son of man, a poor captive; nay, with a sinful man, that when God sent him went in bitterness of spirit, and was at this time out of humour with his work; and let us own ourselves for ever indebted to the mediation of Christ for this blessed intercourse and communion between God and man, between heaven and earth. See here the benefit of solitude, and how much it befriends contemplation. It is very comfortable to be alone with God, withdrawn from the world for converse with him; to hear from him, to speak to him: and a good man will say he is never less alone than when thus alone. Ezekiel went forth into the plain more willingly than he went among them of the captivity, ver. 15, for they that know what it is to have communion with God cannot but prefer that before any converse with this world, especially such as is commonly met with. He went out into the plain, and there he saw the same vision that he had seen by the river of Chebar; for God is not tied to places. Note, Those who follow God shall meet with his consolations wherever they go. God called him out to talk with him, but did more than that, he shewed him his glory, ver. 23. We are not to expect such visions, but we must own we have a favour done us no way inferior, if we so by faith behold the glory of the Lord as to be changed into the same image by the Spirit of the Lord; and this honour have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord, 2 Cor. iii. 18.

Secondly. We have him here restrained from farther teaching for the present. When he saw the glory of the Lord, he fell on his face, being struck with an awe of God's majesty, and a dread of his displeasure; but the Spirit entered into him to raise him up, and then he recovered himself, and got upon his feet, and heard what the Spirit whispered to him; which is very surprising. One would have expected now that God should send him directly to the chief place of concourse, should give him favour in the eyes of his brethren, and make him and his message acceptable to them; that he should have a wider door of opportunity opened to him, and that God should give him a door of utterance to open his mouth boldly; but what is here said to him is the reverse of all this.

1. Instead of sending him to a public assembly, he orders him to confine himself to his own lodgings; "Go, shut thyself within thy house," ver. 24. He was not willing to appear in public, and when he did the people did not regard him, nor shew him the respect he deserved; and, as a just rebuke both to him and them, to him for his shyness of them, and to them for their coldness towards him, God forbids him to appear in public. Note, Our choice is often made our punishment, and it is a righteous thing with God to remove teachers into corners, when they, or their people, or both, grow indifferent to solemn assemblies. Ezekiel must shut up himself, some think, to give a sign of the besieging of Jerusalem, in which the people should be closely shut up as he was in his house, and which he speaks of in the next chapter. He must shut himself within his house, that he might receive farther discoveries of the mind of God, and might abundantly furnish himself with something to say to the people when he went abroad. We find that the elders of Judah visited him, and sat before him, sometimes in his house, ch. viii. 1, to be witnesses of his ecstasies; but it was not till ch. xi. 25, that he spake to them of the captivity all the things that the Lord had shewed him. Note, Those that are called to preach must find time to study, and a great deal of time too; must often shut themselves up in their houses, that they may give attendance to reading and meditation, and so their profiting may appear to all.

2. Instead of securing him an interest in the esteem and affections of those to whom he sent him, he tells him that they shall put bands upon him, and bind him, ver. 25, either, 1st. As a criminal. They shall bind him in order to the farther punishing of him as a disturber of the peace. Though they were themselves sent into bondage in Babylon for persecuting the prophets, yet there they continue to persecute them. Or rather, 2nd. As a distracted man. They would go about to bind him as one beside himself; for to that they imputed his violent motions in his raptures. The captains asked Jehu, "Wherefore came this mad fellow unto thee?" Festus said to Paul, "Thou art beside thyself;" and so they said of our Lord Jesus, Mar. iii. 21. Perhaps this was the reason why he must keep within doors, because otherwise they would bind him, under pretence of his being mad, and therefore he must not go out among them. Justly are prophets forbidden to go to those that will abuse them.

3. Instead of opening his lips, that his mouth might shew forth God's praise, God silenced him, made his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth, so that he was dumb for a considerable time, ver. 26. The pious captives in Babylon used this imprecation upon themselves, That if they did forget Jerusalem, their tongue might cleave to the roof of their mouth, Ps. cxxxvii. 6. Ezekiel remembers Jerusalem more than any of them, and yet his tongue cleaves to the roof of his mouth; and he that can speak best is forbidden to speak at all, and the reason given is, because they are a rebellious house to whom he is sent, and they are not worthy to have him for a reprover. He shall not give them instructions and admonitions, for they are lost and thrown away upon them. He is before commanded to speak boldly to them, because they are most rebellious, ch. ii. 7. But, since that proves to no purpose, he is now for that reason enjoined silence, and shall not speak at all to them. Note, Those whose hearts are hardened against conviction are justly deprived of the means of conviction. Why should not the reprovers be dumb, if, after long trials, it be found that the reproved resolve to be deaf? If Ephraim be joined to idols, let him alone. "Thou shalt be dumb, and not be a reprover;" implying that, unless he were dumb, he would be reproving; if he could speak at all, he would witness against the wickedness of the wicked. But when God speaks with him, and designs to speak by him, he will open his mouth, ver. 27. Note, Though God's prophets may be silenced awhile, there will come a time when God will give them the opening of the mouth again. And when God speaks to his ministers, he not only opens their ears to hear what he saith, but opens their mouth to return an answer. Moses, that had a veil on his face when he went down to the people, took it off when he went up again to God, Ex. xxxiv. 34.

4. Instead of giving him assurance of success when he should at any time speak to the people, he here leaves the matter very doubtful, and Ezekiel must not perplex and disquiet himself about it, but let it be as it will. "He that heareth let him hear," and he is welcome to the comfort of it; let him hear and his soul shall live; but "he that forbeareth let him forbear" at his peril, and take what comes. "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it;" neither God nor his prophet shall be any loser by it; but the prophet shall be rewarded for his faithfulness in reproving the sinner, and God will have the glory of his justice in condemning him for not taking the reproof.

CHAPTER IV.

Ezekiel was now among the captives in Babylon, but they there had Jerusalem still upon their hearts. The pious captives looked towards it with an eye of faith, as Daniel, Dan. vi. 10; the presumptuous ones looked towards it with an eye of pride, and flattered themselves with a conceit that they should shortly return thither again. They that remained corresponded with the captives, and it is likely buoyed them up with hopes that all would be well yet, as long as Jerusalem was standing in its strength, and perhaps upbraided those with their folly who had surrendered at first; therefore to take down this presumption God gives the prophet, in this chapter, a very clear and affecting foresight of the besieging of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, and the calamities which would attend that siege. Two things are here represented to him in vision: I. The fortifications that should be raised against the city. This is signified by the prophet's laying siege to the portraiture of Jerusalem, ver. 1—3; and lying first on one side and then on the other side before it, ver. 4—8. II. The famine that should rage within the city. This is signified by his eating very coarse fare, and confining himself to a little of it, so long as this typical representation lasted, ver. 9—17.

THOU also, son of man, take thee a tile, and lay it before thee, and pourtray upon it the city, even Jerusalem: 2 And lay siege against it, and build a fort against it, and cast a mount against it; set the camp also against it, and set battering rams against it round about. 3 Moreover take thou unto thee an iron pan, and set it for a wall of iron between thee and the city: and set thy face against it, and it shall be besieged, and thou shalt lay siege against it. This shall be a sign to the house of Israel. 4 Lie thou also upon thy left side, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it: according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon it thou shalt bear their iniquity. 5 For I have laid upon thee the years of their iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel. 6 And when thou hast accomplished them, lie again on thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year. 7 Therefore thou shalt set thy face toward the siege of Jerusalem, and thine arm shall be uncovered, and thou shalt prophesy against it. 8 And, behold, I will lay bands upon thee, and thou shalt not turn thee from one side to another, till thou hast ended the days of thy siege.

ENGRAVED BRICKS FROM BABYLON.

The prophet is here ordered to represent to himself and others, by signs which would be proper and powerful to strike the fancy, and to affect the mind, the siege of Jerusalem; and this amounted to a prediction.

First. He was ordered to engrave a draught of Jerusalem upon a tile, ver. 1. It was Jerusalem's honour, that while she kept her integrity God had graven her upon the palms of his hands, Isa. xlix. 15, and the names of the tribes were engraven in precious stones on the breastplate of the high priest; but now the faithful city is become a harlot, a worthless brittle tile, or brick, is thought good enough to pourtray it upon. This the prophet must lay before him, that the eye may affect the heart.

Secondly. He was ordered to build little forts against this portraiture of the city, resembling the batteries raised by the besiegers, ver. 2. Between the city that was besieged and himself that was the besieger he was to set up an iron pan, as an iron wall, ver. 3. This represented the inflexible resolution of both sides: the Chaldeans resolved, whatever it cost them, they would make themselves masters of the city, and would never quit it till they had conquered it; on the other side, the Jews resolved never to capitulate, but to hold out to the last extremity.

Thirdly. He was ordered to lie upon his side before it, as it were to surround it; representing the Chaldean army lying before it, to block it up, to keep the meat from going in, and the mouths from going out. He was to lie on his left side three hundred and ninety days, ver. 5, about thirteen months. The siege of Jerusalem is computed to last eighteen months, Jer. lii. 4—6; but if we deduct from that five months' interval, when the besiegers withdrew upon the approach of Pharaoh's army, Jer. xxxvii. 5—8, the number of the days of the close siege will be three hundred and ninety. Yet that also had another signification; the three hundred and ninety days, according to the prophetic dialect, signified three hundred and ninety years. And when the prophet lies so many days on his side he bears the guilt of that iniquity which the "house of Israel," that is, the ten tribes, had borne three hundred and ninety years, reckoning from their first apostacy under Jeroboam to the destruction of Jerusalem, which completed the ruin of those small remains of them that had incorporated with Judah. He is then to lie forty days upon his right side, and so long to "bear the iniquity of the house of Judah," the kingdom of the two tribes, because the measure-filling sins of that people were those which they were guilty of during the last forty years before their captivity, since the thirteenth year of Josiah, when Jeremiah began to prophesy, Jer. i. 1. Or, as some reckon it, since the eighteenth, when the book of the law was found, and the people renewed their covenant with God. When they persisted in their impieties and idolatries, notwithstanding they had such a prophet, and such a prince, and were brought into the bond of such a covenant, what could be expected but ruin without remedy? Judah, that hath such helps and advantages for reformation, fills the measure of their iniquity in less time than Israel doth. Now we are not to think that the prophet lay constantly, night and day, upon his side, but every day, for so many days together, at a certain time of the day when he received visits, and company came in, he was found lying three hundred and ninety days on his left side, and forty days on his right side before his portraiture of Jerusalem, which all that saw might easily understand to mean the close besieging of that city; and people would be flocking in daily, some for curiosity, and some for conscience, at the hour appointed, to see it and make their different remarks upon it.

His being found constantly on the same side, as if bands were laid upon him, (as indeed they were by the Divine command,) so that he could not turn him from one side to another till he had ended the days of the siege, did plainly represent the close and constant continuance of the besiegers about the city, during that number of days, till they had gained their point.

Fourthly. He was ordered to prosecute the siege with vigour; ver. 7, "Thou shalt set thy face towards the siege of Jerusalem," as wholly intent upon it, and resolved to carry it; so the Chaldeans would be, and neither bribed nor forced to withdraw from it. Nebuchadnezzar's resentment of Zedekiah's treachery, in breaking his league with him, made him very furious in pushing on this siege, that he might chastise the insolence of that faithless prince and people; and his army promised themselves a rich booty of that pompous city, so that both set their faces against it, for they were very resolute. Nor were they less active and industrious, exerting themselves to the utmost in all the operations of the siege, which the prophet was to represent by the uncovering of his arm; or, as some read it, the stretching out of his arm, as it were to deal blows about without mercy. When God is about to do some great work he is said to make bare his arm, Isa. lii. 10. In short, the Chaldeans will go about their business, and go on in it as men in earnest, that resolve to go through with it. Now,

1. This is intended to be "a sign to the house of Israel," ver. 3; both to them in Babylon that were eyewitnesses of what the prophet did, and to them also who remained in their own land, who would hear the report of it. The prophet was dumb, and could not speak, ch. iii. 26; but, as his silence had a voice, and upbraided the people with their deafness, so even then God left not himself without witness, but ordered him to make signs, as dumb men use to do, and as Zecharias did when he was dumb, and by them to make known his mind, that is, the mind of God, to the people. And thus likewise the people were upbraided with their stupidity and dulness, that they were not capable of being taught as men of sense are by words, but must be taught as children are by pictures, or as deaf men are by signs. Or, perhaps they are hereby upbraided with their malice against the prophet; had he spoken in words at length what was signified by these figures, they would have entangled him in his talk, would have indicted him for treasonable expressions, for they knew how to "make a man an offender for a word," Isa. xxix. 21; to avoid which he is ordered to make use of signs. Or, the prophet made use of signs for the same reason that Christ made use of parables, that hearing they might hear, and not understand; and seeing they might see, and not perceive, Mat. xxiii. 14, 15. They would not understand what was plain, and therefore shall be taught by that which is difficult, and herein the Lord was righteous.

2. Thus the prophet prophesies against Jerusalem, ver. 7; and there were those who not only understood it so, but were the more affected with it by its being so represented; for images to the eye commonly make deeper impressions upon the mind than words can; and for this reason sacraments are instituted to represent Divine things, that we might see and believe, might see and be affected with those things; and we may expect this benefit by them, and a blessing to go along with them, whilst, as the prophet here, we make use only of such signs as God has himself expressly appointed, which we must conclude are the fittest. Note, The power of imagination, if it be rightly used, and kept under the direction and correction of reason and faith, may be of good use to kindle and excite pious and devout affections, as it was here to Ezekiel and his attendants. Methinks I see so and so, myself dying, time expiring, the world on fire, the dead rising, the great tribunal sit, and the like, may have a mighty good influence upon us; for fancy is like fire, a good servant, but a bad master.

3. This whole transaction hath that in it which the prophet might, with a good colour of reason, have boggled at and excepted against, and yet in obedience to God's command, and in execution of his office, he did it according to order. 1st. It seemed childish, and ludicrous, and beneath his gravity, and there were those that would ridicule him for it; but he knew the Divine appointment put honour enough upon that which otherwise seemed mean to save his reputation in the doing of it. 2nd. It was toilsome and tiresome to do as he did; but our ease, as well as our credit, must be sacrificed to our duty; and we must never call God's service, in any instance of it, a hard service. 3rd. It could not but be very much 'against the grain' with him to appear thus against Jerusalem, the city of God, the holy city, to act as an enemy against a place to which he was so good a friend; but he is a prophet, and must follow his instructions, not his affections, and must plainly preach the ruin of a sinful place, though its welfare is what he passionately desires and earnestly prays for.

4. All this that the prophet sets before the children of his people concerning the destruction of Jerusalem is designed to bring them to repentance, by shewing them sin is the provoking cause of this destruction; sin the ruin of that once flourishing city, than which sure nothing could be more effectual to make them hate sin, and turn from it. While he thus in lively colours describes the calamity with a great deal of pain and uneasiness to himself, he is bearing the iniquity of Israel and Judah. Look here, said he, and see what work sin makes; what an evil and bitter thing it is to depart from God; this comes of sin, your sin, and the sin of your fathers. Let that therefore be the daily matter of your sorrow and shame now in your captivity, that you may make your peace with God, and he may return in mercy to you. But observe, it is a day of punishment for a year of sin; "I have appointed thee each day for a year." The siege is a calamity of three hundred and ninety days, in which God reckons for the iniquity of three hundred and ninety years; justly therefore do they acknowledge that God had punished them less than their iniquity deserved, Ezr. ix. 13. But let impenitent sinners know that though now God is longsuffering towards them, in the other world there is an everlasting punishment. When God laid bands upon the prophet it was to shew them how they were bound with the cords of their own transgression, Lam. i. 14, and therefore they were now "holden in the cords of affliction." But we may well think of the prophet's case with compassion, when God laid upon him the bands of duty, as he doth on all his ministers, 1 Cor. ix. 16, "Necessity is upon me, and woe unto me if I preach not the Gospel;" and yet men laid upon him bonds of restraint, ch. iii. 25. But under both it is satisfaction enough that they are serving the interests of God's kingdom among men.

9 Take thou also unto thee wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentiles, and millet, and fitches, and put them in one vessel, and make thee bread thereof, according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon thy side, three hundred and ninety days shalt thou eat thereof. 10 And thy meat which thou shalt eat shall be by weight, twenty shekels a day: from time to time shalt thou eat it. 11 Thou shalt drink also water by measure, the sixth part of an hin: from time to time shalt thou drink. 12 And thou shalt eat it as barley cakes, and thou shalt bake it with dung that cometh out of man, in their sight. 13 And the LORD said, Even thus shall the children of Israel eat their defiled bread among the Gentiles, whither I will drive them. 14 Then said I, Ah Lord GOD! behold, my soul hath not been polluted: for from my youth up even till now have I not eaten of that which dieth of itself, or is torn in pieces; neither came there abominable flesh into my mouth. 15 Then he said unto me, Lo, I have given thee cow's dung for man's dung, and thou shalt prepare thy bread therewith. 16 Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, behold, I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem: and they shall eat bread by weight, and with care; and they shall drink water by measure, and with astonishment: 17 That they may want bread and water, and be astonied one with another, and consume away for their iniquity.

COLLECTING DUNG FOR FUEL.—ver. 15.

The best exposition of this part of Ezekiel's prediction of Jerusalem's desolation is Jeremiah's lamentation of it, Lam. iv. 3, &c., and ch. v. 10; where he pathetically describes the terrible famine that was in Jerusalem during the siege, and the sad effects of it. The prophet here, to affect the people with the foresight of it, must confine himself for three hundred and ninety days to coarse fare, and short commons, and that ill dressed; for they should want both food and fuel.

First. His meat, for the quality of it, was to be of the worst bread, made of but a little wheat and barley, and the rest of "beans, and lentiles, and millet, and fitches," such as we feed horses or fatted hogs with; and this mixed as millcorn, or as that in the beggar's bag, that has a dish full of one sort of corn at one house, and of another at another house. Of such corn as this must the prophet's bread be made, while he underwent the fatigue of lying on his side, and needed something better to support him, ver. 9. Note, It is our wisdom not to be too fond of dainties, and pleasant bread, because we know not what hard meat we may be tied to, nay, and may be glad of, before we die. The meanest sort of food is better than we deserve, and therefore must not be despised or wasted; nor must those that use it be looked upon with disdain, because we know not what may be our own lot.

Secondly. For the quantity of it, it was to be of the least that a man could be kept alive with, to signify that the besieged should be reduced to short allowance, and should hold out till "all the bread in the city was spent," Jer. xxxvii. 21. The prophet must eat but twenty shekels weight of bread a day, ver. 10. That was about ten ounces; and he must drink but the "sixth part of a hin" of water, that was half a pint, about eight ounces, ver. 11. The stint of the Lessian diet is fourteen ounces of meat, and sixteen of drink. The prophet in Babylon had bread enough and to spare, and was by the river side, where there was plenty of water; and yet, that he might confirm his own prediction, and be a sign to the children of Israel, God obligeth him to live thus sparingly, and he submits to it. Note, God's servants must learn to endure hardness, and to deny themselves the use of lawful delights, when they may thereby serve the glory of God, evidence the sincerity of their faith, and express their sympathy with their brethren in affliction. The body must be kept under, and brought into subjection. Nature is content with a little, and grace with less; but lust with nothing. It is good to stint ourselves of choice, that we may the better bear it if ever we should come to be stinted by necessity. And in times of public distress and calamity it ill becomes us to make much of ourselves, as those that "drank wine in bowls," and "were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph," Am. vi. 4—6.

Thirdly. For the dressing of it, he must bake it with man's dung, ver. 12; that must be dried and serve for fuel to heat his oven with. The thought of it would almost turn one's stomach; yet the coarse bread thus baked he must "eat as barley cakes;" that is, as freely as if it were the same bread he had been used to. This nauseous piece of cookery he must exercise publicly in their sight, that they might be the more affected with the calamity approaching, which was signified by it; that in the extremity of the famine they should not only have nothing that was dainty, but nothing that was cleanly about them; but must take up with what they could get: "To the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet."

This circumstance of the sign, the baking of his bread with man's dung, the prophet, with submission, humbly desired might be dispensed with, ver. 14. It seemed to have in it something of a ceremonial pollution; for there was a law that man's dung should be "covered with earth," that God might "see no unclean thing in their camp," Deu. xxiii. 13, 14. And must he go and gather a thing so offensive, and use it in dressing his meat in the sight of the people? "Ah, Lord God," saith he, "behold my soul has not been polluted," and I am afraid lest by this it be polluted. Note, The pollution of the soul by sin is what good people dread more than any thing; and yet sometimes tender consciences fear it without cause, and perplex themselves with scruples about lawful things, as the prophet here, who had not yet learned that it is not that which goes into the mouth that defiles the man, Mat. xv. 11. But observe, he doth not plead, Lord, from my youth I have been brought up delicately, and never used to any thing but what was clean and nice; and there were those who were so brought up that in the siege of Jerusalem did embrace dunghills, Lam. iv. 5; but that he had been brought up conscientiously, and had never eaten any thing that was forbidden by the law, that died of itself, or was torn in pieces. And therefore, Lord, do not put this upon me now. Thus Peter pleaded, Acts x. 14, "Lord, I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean." Note, It will be comfortable to us when we are reduced to hardships if our hearts can witness for us that we have always been careful to abstain from sin, even from little sins, and the appearances of evil. Whatever God commands us we may be sure is good; but if we be put upon any thing that we apprehend to be evil, we should argue against it from this consideration, that hitherto we have preserved our purity, and shall we lose it now? Now because Ezekiel, with a manifest tenderness of conscience, made this scruple, God dispensed with him in this matter. Note, Those who have power in their hands should not be rigorous in pressing their commands upon those that are dissatisfied concerning them, yea, though their dissatisfactions be groundless, or arising from education and long usage; but should recede from them rather than grieve or offend the weak, or put a stumblingblock before them, in conformity to the example of God's condescension to Ezekiel, though we are sure his authority is incontestable, and all his commands wise and good. God allowed Ezekiel to use cow's dung instead of man's dung, ver. 15. This is an implicit reflection upon man, as intimating that, he being polluted with sin, his filthiness is more nauseous and odious than that of any other creature. "How much more abominable and filthy is man!" Job xv. 16.

Now this sign is particularly explained here. It signified,

1. That those who remained in Jerusalem should be brought to extreme misery for want of necessary food. All supplies being cut off by the besiegers, the city would soon find a want of the country, for "the king himself is served of the field," and thus the "staff of bread" would be "broken in Jerusalem," ver. 16. God would not only take away from the bread its power to nourish, so that "they shall eat and not be satisfied," Lev. xxvi. 26, but take away the bread itself, Isa. iii. 1; so that what little remained should be "eaten by weight," so much a day, so much a head; that they might have an equal share, and might make it last as long as possible. But to what purpose, when they could not make it last always; and the besieged must be tired out before the besiegers? They shall eat and drink with care, to make it go as far as might be, and with astonishment when they saw it almost spent, and know not which way to look for a recruit. They shall be "astonied one with another;" whereas it used to be some alleviation of a calamity to have others share with us in it, (Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris,) and some ease to the spirit to complain of the burthen, it should be an aggravation of the misery that it was universal, and their complaining to one another should but make them all the more uneasy, and increase the astonishment; and the event shall be as ill as their fears: they cannot make it worse than it is, for "they shall consume away for their iniquity;" multitudes of them shall die of famine, a lingering death, worse than that by the sword, Lam. iv. 9. They shall die so as to feel themselves die; and it is sin that brings all this misery upon them. They shall 'consume away in their iniquity;' so it may be read. They shall continue hardened and impenitent, and shall die in their sins, which is more miserable than to die on a dunghill.

Now, 1st. Let us see here what woful work sin makes with a people, and acknowledge the righteousness of God herein. Time was when Jerusalem was filled with the finest of the wheat, Ps. cxlvii. 14, but now it would be glad of the coarsest, and cannot have it. Fulness of bread, as it was one of Jerusalem's mercies, so it was become one of her sins, ch. xvi. 49. The plenty was abused to luxury and excess, which was therefore thus justly punished with famine. It is a righteous thing with God to deprive us of those enjoyments which we have made the food and fuel of our lusts. 2nd. Let us see what reason we have to bless God for plenty; not only for the fruits of the earth, but for the freedom of commerce, that the husbandman can have money for his bread, and the tradesman bread for his money; that there is not only abundance in the field, but in the market, that those who live in cities and great towns, though they sow not, neither do they reap, yet are fed from day to day with food convenient,

2. It signified that those who were carried into captivity should be forced to "eat their defiled bread among the Gentiles," ver. 13; that is, to eat meat made up by Gentile hands, otherwise than according to the law of the Jewish church, which they were always taught to call defiled, and which they would have as great an aversion to as a man would have to bread prepared with dung; that is, as perhaps it may be understood, kneaded and moulded with dung. Daniel and his fellows confined themselves to "pulse and water," rather than they would "eat the portion of the king's meat" assigned them, because they apprehended it would defile them, Dan. i. 8. Or they should be forced to eat nasty, stinking meat, such as their oppressors would allow them in their slavery, and such as formerly they would have scorned to touch. Because they "served not God" with cheerfulness, "in the abundance of all things," God will make them "serve their enemies in the want of all things."

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter we have a farther and no less terrible denunciation of the judgments of God that were coming with all speed and force upon the Jewish nation, which would utterly ruin it, for when God judgeth he will overcome. This destruction of Judah and Jerusalem is here, I. Represented by a sign, the cutting and burning and scattering of hair, ver. 1—4. II. That sign is expounded, and applied to Jerusalem. 1. Sin is charged upon Jerusalem as the cause of this desolation: contempt of God's law, ver. 5—7, and profanation of his sanctuary, ver. 11; 2. Wrath is threatened, great wrath, ver. 8—10, a variety of miseries, ver. 12, 16, 17, such as should be their reproach and ruin, ver. 13—15.

AND thou, son of man, take thee a sharp knife, take thee a barber's razor, and cause it to pass upon thine head and upon thy beard: then take thee balances to weigh, and divide the hair. 2 Thou shalt burn with fire a third part in the midst of the city, when the days of the siege are fulfilled: and thou shalt take a third part, and smite about it with a knife: and a third part thou shalt scatter in the wind; and I will draw out a sword after them. 3 Thou shalt also take thereof a few in number, and bind them in thy skirts. 4 Then take of them again, and cast them into the midst of the fire, and burn them in the fire; for thereof shall a fire come forth into all the house of Israel.

We have here the sign by which the utter destruction of Jerusalem is set forth; and here, as before, the prophet is himself the sign, that the people might see how much he affected himself with, and interested himself in, the case of Jerusalem, and how near it lay to his heart. Even then when he foretold the desolations of it, he was himself so much concerned about it as to take what was done to it as done to himself, so far was he from desiring the woful day

First. He must "shave off the hair of his head and beard," ver. 1; which signified God's utter rejecting and abandoning that people as a useless, worthless generation, such as could well be spared, nay, such as it would be his honour to part with. His judgments, and all the instruments he made use of in cutting them off, were this sharp knife, and this razor, that were proper to be made use of, and would do execution. Jerusalem had been the head, but being degenerated was become as the hair, which, when it grows thick and long, is but a burthen, which a man wishes to get clear of, as God of the sinners in Zion; Ah, "I will ease me of mine adversaries," Isa. i. 24. Ezekiel must not cut off that hair only that was superfluous, but cut it all off, noting the full end that God would make of Jerusalem. The hair that would not be trimmed, and kept neat and clean by the admonitions of the prophets, must be all shaved off by an utter destruction. Those will be ruined that will not be reformed.

Secondly. He must weigh the hair, and divide it into three parts. This intimates the very exact directing of God's judgments, according to equity, (by him men and their actions are weighed in the unerring balance of truth and righteousness,) and the proportion which Divine justice observes in punishing some by one judgment and others by another; but one way or other they shall be met with. Some make the shaving of the hair to note the loss of their liberty and of their honour; it was looked upon as a mark of ignominy, as in the disgrace Hanun put on David's ambassadors. It notes also the loss of their joy; for they shaved their heads upon occasion of great mourning. I may add the loss of their Nazariteship; for the shaving the head was a period to that vow, Num. vi. 18, and Jerusalem was now no longer looked upon as a holy city.

Thirdly. He must dispose of the hair, so as that it might all be destroyed or dispersed, ver. 2. 1. One "third part" must be burnt "in the midst of the city;" noting the multitudes that should perish by famine and pestilence, and perhaps many in the conflagration of the city, "when the days of the siege were fulfilled;" or the laying of that glorious city in ashes might well be looked upon as a third part of the destruction threatened. 2. Another third part was to be cut in pieces with a knife, representing the many that during the siege were slain by the sword in their sallies out upon the besiegers, and especially when the city was taken by storm, the Chaldeans being then most furious, and the Jews most feeble. 3. Another third part was to be "scattered in the wind;" noting the carrying away of some into the land of the conqueror, and the flight of others into the neighbouring countries for shelter, so that they were hurried some one way and some another, like loose hairs in the wind. But, lest they should think that this dispersion would be their escape, God adds, "And I will draw out a sword after them," so that wherever they go evil shall pursue them. Note, God has variety of judgments wherewith to accomplish the destruction of a sinful people, and to make an end when he begins.

Fourthly. He must preserve a small quantity of the third sort that were to be "scattered in the wind," and "bind them in his skirts," as one would bind that which he is very mindful and careful of, ver. 3. This signified perhaps that little handful of people which were left under the government of Gedaliah, who it was hoped would keep possession of the land when the body of the people were carried into captivity. Thus God would have done well for them, if they would have done well for themselves. But these few that were reserved must be taken and "cast into the fire," ver. 4. When Gedaliah and his friends were slain, the people that put themselves under his protection were scattered, some gone into Egypt, others carried off by the Chaldeans, and, in short, the land totally cleared of them; then this was fulfilled, for out of those combustions "a fire came forth into all the house of Israel;" who, as fuel upon the fire, kindled, and consumed one another. Note, It is ill with a people when those are taken away in wrath that seemed to be marked for monuments of mercy; for then there is no remnant or escaping, none shut up or left.

SHAVING THE HEAD.—ver. 1.

5 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
This is Jerusalem:
I have set it in the midst of the nations
And countries that are round about her.
6 And she hath changed my judgments into wickedness more than the nations,
And my statutes more than the countries that are round about her:
For they have refused my judgments and my statutes,
They have not walked in them.
7 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;

Because ye multiplied more than the nations that are round about you,
And have not walked in my statutes,
Neither have kept my judgments,
Neither have done according to the judgments
Of the nations that are round about you;
8 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I, even I, am against thee,
And will execute judgments in the midst of thee
In the sight of the nations.
9 And I will do in thee that which I have not done,
And whereunto I will not do any more the like,
Because of all thine abominations. [thee,
10 Therefore the fathers shall eat the sons in the midst of
And the sons shall eat their fathers;
And I will execute judgments in thee,
And the whole remnant of thee will I scatter
Into all the winds.
11 Wherefore, as I live, saith the Lord GOD;
Surely, because thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things,
And with all thine abominations,
Therefore will I also diminish thee;
Neither shall mine eye spare,
Neither will I have any pity.
12 A third part of thee shall die with the pestilence,
And with famine shall they be consumed in the midst of thee:
And a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee;
And I will scatter a third part into all the winds,
And I will draw out a sword after them.
13 Thus shall mine anger be accomplished,
And I will cause my fury to rest upon them,
And I will be comforted: [my zeal,
And they shall know that I the LORD have spoken it in
When I have accomplished my fury in them
14 Moreover I will make thee waste, [thee,
And a reproach among the nations that are round about
In the sight of all that pass by.
15 So it shall be a reproach and a taunt,
An instruction and an astonishment
Unto the nations that are round about thee,
When I shall execute judgments in thee
In anger and in fury and in furious rebukes.
I the LORD have spoken it.
16 When I shall send upon them the evil arrows of famine,
Which shall be for their destruction,
And which I will send to destroy you:
And I will increase the famine upon you,
And will break your staff of bread:
17 So will I send upon you famine and evil beasts,
And they shall bereave thee;
And pestilence and blood shall pass through thee;
And I will bring the sword upon thee.
I the LORD have spoken it.

We have here the reddition of the foregoing similitude. "This is Jerusalem;" thus it is usual in Scripture language to give the name of the thing signified to the sign; as when Christ said, "This is my body." The prophet's head that was to be shaved signified Jerusalem, that by the judgments of God was now to be stripped of all its ornaments, to be emptied of all its inhabitants, and to be "set naked and bare," to be "shaved with a razor that is hired," Isa. vii. 20. The head of one that was a priest, a prophet, a holy person, was fittest to represent Jerusalem the holy city. Now the contents of these verses are much the same with what we have often met with, and still shall, in the writings of the prophets. Here is,

First. The privileges Jerusalem was honoured with; ver. 5, "I have set it in the midst of the nations and countries that are round about her," and those famous nations, and very considerable. Jerusalem was not situated in a remote, obscure corner of the world, far from neighbours, but in the midst of kingdoms that were populous, polite, and civilised, famed for learning, arts, and sciences, and which then made the greatest figure in the world. But there seems to be more in it than so.

1. Jerusalem was dignified and preferred above the neighbour nations and their cities; it was set in the midst of them, as excelling them all. This holy mountain was exalted above all the hills, Isa. ii. 2. "Why leap ye, ye high hills? this is the hill which God desireth to dwell in," Ps. lxviii. 16. Jerusalem was a city upon a hill, conspicuous and illustrious, and which all the neighbour nations had an eye upon, some for good-will, some for ill-will.

2. Jerusalem was designed to have a good influence upon the nations and countries round about; was set in the midst of them as a candle upon a candlestick, to spread the light of Divine revelation which she was blessed with, to all the dark corners of the neighbour nations, that from them it might diffuse itself farther, even to the ends of the earth. Jerusalem was set in the midst of the nations, to be as the heart in the body, to invigorate this dead world with a Divine life, as well as to enlighten this dark world with a Divine light, to be an example of every thing that was good. The nations that observed what excellent statutes and judgments they had concluded them to be a wise and understanding people, Deu. iv. 6; fit to be consulted as an oracle, as they were in Solomon's time, 1 Kin. iv. 34. And had they preserved this reputation, and made a right use of it, what a blessing had Jerusalem been to all the nations about. But failing to be so, the accomplishment of this intention was reserved for its latter days, when out of Zion went forth the gospel law, and the word of the Lord Jesus from Jerusalem, and there repentanee and remission began to be preached, and thence the preachers of them "went forth into all nations." And when that was done Jerusalem was levelled with the ground. Note, When places and persons are made great, it is with design that they may do good, and that those about them may be the better for them, that their light might shine before men.

Secondly. The provocations Jerusalem was guilty of. A very high charge is here drawn up against that city, and proved beyond contradiction, sufficient to justify God in seizing its privileges and putting it under military execution.

1. She had not walked in God's statutes, nor kept his judgments, ver. 7; nay, they had refused his judgments and his statutes, ver. 6; they did not do their duty, nay, they would not, they said they would not. Those statutes and judgments which their neighbours admired they despised; which they should have set before their face, they cast behind their back. Note, A contempt of the word and law of God opens a door to all manner of iniquity. God's statutes are the terms on which he deals with men; they that refuse his terms cannot expect his favours.

2. She had changed God's judgments into wickedness, ver. 6; a very high expression of their profaneness; that they had not only broken God's laws, but had so perverted and abused them that they had made them the excuse and colour of their wickedness; they introduced the abominable customs and usages of the heathen, instead of God's institutions. This was changing the "truth of God into a lie," Rom. i. 25; and the glory of God into shame, Ps. iv. 2. Note, Those that have been well educated, if they live ill, put the highest affront imaginable upon God, as if he were the patron of sin, and his judgments were "turned into wickedness."

3. She had been worse than the neighbour nations, to whom she should have set a good example. She "hath changed my judgments," by idolatries and false worship, "more than the nations," ver. 6, and "multiplied," (that is, multiplied idols and altars, gods and temples, multiplied those things the unity of which was their praise,) "more than the nations that were round about." Israel's God is one, and his name one, his altar one; but they, not content with this one God, multiplied their gods to that degree, that "according to the numbers of their cities, so were their gods," and their altars "as heaps in the furrows of the field;" so that they exceeded all their neighbours in having gods many and lords many. They corrupted revealed religion more than the Gentiles had corrupted natural religion. Note, If those that have made a profession of religion, and have had a pious education, apostatize from it, they are commonly more profane and vicious than those who never made any profession; they have the "seven other spirits more wicked."

4. She had "not done according to the judgments of the nations," ver. 7; that is, they had not carried it towards their God, though he is the only true God, as the nations had carried it towards their gods, though they were false gods; had not been so observant of him, nor so constant to him. Hath a nation changed their gods, or slighted them so as they have? Jer. ii. 11. Or, it may refer to their morals; instead of reforming their neighbours, they came short of them, and many that were of "the uncircumcision kept the righteousness of the law," better than those that were of the circumcision, Rom. ii. 26, 27. Those that had the light of Scripture did not "according to the judgments" of many that had the light of nature. Note, There are those who are called Christians that will in the great day be condemned by the better tempers and better lives of sober heathens.

5. The particular crime charged upon Jerusalem is "profaning the holy things," which she had been both intrusted and honoured with; ver. 11, "Thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things;" that is, with thine idols and idolatries. The images of their pretended deities, and the groves erected in honour of them were brought into the temple, and the ceremonies used by idolaters were brought into the worship of God; thus every thing that is sacred was polluted. Note, Idols are detestable things anywhere, but more especially so in the sanctuary.

Thirdly. The punishment that Jerusalem should fall under for these provocations. "Shall not God visit for these things?" No doubt he shall. The matter of the sentence here passed upon Jerusalem is very dreadful, and the manner of expression makes it yet more so. The judgments are various, and the threatenings of them varied, iterated, inculcated, that one may well say, "Who is able to stand in God's sight when once he is angry?"

1. God will take this work of punishing Jerusalem into his own hands. And "who knows the power of his anger?" and what a fearful thing it is to "fall into his hands." Observe what a mighty emphasis is laid upon it; ver. 8, "I, even I, am against thee." God had been for Jerusalem to defend and save it; but miserable is its case when he is "turned to be its enemy, and fight against it." If God be against us the whole creation is at war with us, and nothing can be for us so as to stand us in any stead. You think it is only the Chaldean army that is against you; but they are God's hand, or rather the staff in his hand. It is "I, even I," that "am against thee;" not only to speak against thee by prophets, but to act against thee by providence; "I will execute judgments in thee," ver. 10; "in the midst of thee," ver. 8; not only in the suburbs, but in the heart of the city; not only in the borders, but in the bowels of the country. Note, Those that will not observe the judgments of God's mouth shall not escape the judgments of his hand; and God's judgments, when they come with commission, will penetrate into the midst of a people, will enter into the soul; "into the bowels like water," and "like oil into the bones." "I will execute judgments." Note, God himself undertakes to execute his own judgments according to the true and full intent of them; whatever are the instruments, he is the principal agent.

2. These punishments shall come from his displeasure. As to the body of the people it shall not be a correction in love, but he will "execute judgments in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebukes," ver. 15; strange expressions to come from a God who hath said, "Fury is not in me;" and who hath declared himself "gracious, and merciful, and slow to anger." But they are designed to shew the malignity of sin, and the offence it gives to the just and holy God. That must needs be a very evil thing which provokes him to such resentments, and against his own people too that had been so high in his favour; and expressed with so much satisfaction: ver. 13, "Mine anger," which has long been withheld, "shall now be accomplished, and I will cause my fury to rest upon them;" it shall not only light upon them, but lie upon them, and fill them as vessels of wrath, fitted by their own wickedness to destruction. And justice being hereby glorified, "I will be comforted," that is, will be entirely satisfied in what I have done. As when God is dishonoured by the sins of men he is said to be grieved, Ps. xcv. 10, so when he is honoured by their destruction he is said to be comforted. The struggle between mercy and judgment is over, and in this case judgment triumphs; triumphs indeed, for mercy that has been so long abused is now silent, and gives up the cause, has not a word more to say on the behalf of such an ungrateful, incorrigible people; "Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have any pity," ver. 11. Divine compassion defers the punishment, or mitigates it, or supports under it, or shortens it; but here is "judgment without mercy," wrath without any mixture or allay of pity. These expressions are thus sharpened and heightened perhaps with design to look farther to "the vengeance of eternal fire," which some of the destructions we read of in the Old Testament were typical of, and particularly that of Jerusalem; for surely it is nowhere on this side hell that this word has its full accomplishment, "Mine eye shall not spare," but "I will cause my fury to rest." Note, Those that live and die impenitent will perish for ever unpitied. There is a day coming when "the Lord will not spare."

3. Punishment shall be public and open. I will execute these judgments "in the sight of the nations," ver. 8. The judgments themselves shall be so remarkable, as that all the nations far and near shall take notice of them, they shall be all the talk of that part of the world, and the more for the conspicuousness of the place and people on which they are inflicted. Note, Public sins, as they call for public reproofs, ("them that sin rebuke before all,") so, if those prevail not, they call for public judgments. "He striketh them as wicked men in the open sight of others," Job xxxiv. 26, that he may maintain and vindicate the honour of his government; for, as Grotius descants upon it here, 'Why should he suffer it to be said, See what wicked lives they lead that profess to be the worshippers of the only true God?' And as the publicness of the judgments will redound to the honour of God, so it will serve, 1st. To aggravate the punishment, and to make it lie the more heavy. Jerusalem being made waste, becomes "a reproach among the nations, in the sight of all that pass by," ver. 14. The more conspicuous, and the more peculiar any have been in the day of their prosperity, the greater disgrace attends their fall, and that was Jerusalem's case. The more Jerusalem had been a praise in the earth, the more it is now a reproach and a taunt, ver. 15. This she was warned of as much as any thing when her glory commenced, 1 Kin. ix. 8; and this was lamented as much as any thing when it was laid in the dust, Lam. ii. 15. 2nd. To teach the nations to fear before the God of Israel, when they saw what a jealous God he is, and how severely he punished sin, even in those that are nearest to him. "It shall be an instruction to the nations," ver. 15. Jerusalem should have taught her neighbours the fear of God by her piety and virtue; but, she not doing that, God will teach it them by her ruin; for they have reason to say, "If this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If judgment begin at the house of God, where will it end? If they be thus punished that only had some idolaters among them, what will become of us that are all idolaters? Note, The destruction of some is designed for the instruction of others. Malefactors are publicly punished, in terrorem, that others may take warning.

4. These punishments, in the kind of them, shall be very severe and grievous. 1st. They shall be such as have no precedent or parallel. Their sins being more provoking than those of others, the judgments executed upon them should be uncommon; ver. 9, "I will do in thee that which I have not done" in thee before, though thou hast long since deserved it, nay, that which I have not done in any other city; this punishment of Jerusalem is said to be "greater than that of Sodom," Lam. iv. 6, which was the sorest of all that went before it. Nay, it is such as "I will not do any more the like," all the circumstances taken in, to any other city, till the like comes to be done again to this city, in its final overthrow by the Romans. This is a rhetorical expression of the most grievous judgments, like that character of Hezekiah, that there was "none like him, before or after him." 2nd. They shall be such as will force them to break the strongest bonds of natural affection to one another, which will be a just punishment of them for their wilful breaking of the bonds of their duty to God; ver. 10, "The fathers shall eat the sons, and the sons shall eat the fathers," through the extremity of the famine, or compelled to do it by their barbarous conquerors. 3rd. There shall be a complication of judgments, any one of them terrible enough, and desolating; but what then would they be when they came all together and in perfection? Some shall be taken away by the plague, ver. 12; The pestilence shall pass through thee, ver. 17, sweeping all before it, as the destroying angel. Others shall be consumed with famine, shall gradually waste away as men in a consumption, ver. 13. This is again insisted on, ver. 16, "I will send upon them the evil arrows of famine," hunger shall pine and pierce them, and wound them to the heart, as if arrows, evil arrows, poisoned darts, were shot into them. God has many arrows, evil arrows, in his quiver; when some are discharged he hath still more in reserve; "I will increase the famine upon you." A famine in a bereaved country may decrease, as fruits spring forth, but a famine in a besieged city will increase of course; yet God speaks of it as his act, "I will increase it, and will break your staff of bread," will take away the necessary supports of life, will disappoint you of all that which you depend upon, so that there is no remedy but you must fall to the ground. Life is frail, is weak, is burthened; so that, if it have not daily bread for its staff to lean upon, it cannot but sink, and is soon gone if that staff be broken. Others shall fall by the sword round about Jerusalem, when they sally out upon the besiegers. It is a sword which God will bring, ver. 17. The sword of the Lord, that used to be drawn for Jerusalem's defence, is now drawn for its destruction. Others are devoured by evil beasts, which will make a prey of those that fly for shelter to the deserts and mountains; they shall meet their ruin where they expected refuge, for there is no outrunning the judgments of God, ver. 17. And lastly, Those that escape shall be scattered into all parts of the world; into all the winds, so it is expressed, ver. 10, 12, intimating that they should not only be dispersed, but hurried and tossed, and driven to and fro, as chaff before the wind. Nay, and Cain's curse, to be fugitives and vagabonds, is not the worst of it neither; the restless life shall be cut off by a bloody death, "I will draw out a sword after them," which shall follow them wherever they go. "Evil pursues sinners," and the curse shall come upon them and overtake them.

5. These punishments will prove their ruin by degrees; they shall be diminished, ver. 11; their strength and glory shall grow less and less; they shall be bereaved, ver. 17, emptied of all that which was their joy and confidence. God sends these judgments on purpose to destroy them, ver. 16. The arrows are not sent (as those which Jonathan shot) for their direction, but for their destruction; for God will accomplish his fury upon them, ver. 13. The day of God's patience is over, and the ruin is remediless. Though this prophecy was to have its accomplishment now presently in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, yet, the executioners not being named here, but the criminal only, This is Jerusalem, we may well suppose that it looks farther to the final destruction of that great city by the Romans, when God made a full end of the Jewish nation, and caused his fury to rest upon them.

6. All this is ratified by the Divine authority and veracity, "I the Lord have spoken it," ver. 15; and again, ver. 17. The sentence is passed by him that is judge of heaven and earth, whose judgment is according to truth, and the judgments of his hand according to the judgments of his mouth. He hath spoken it who can do it, for with him nothing is impossible. He hath spoken it who will do it, "for he is not a man that he should lie." He hath spoken it whom we are bound to hear and heed, whose ipse dixit commands the most serious attention and submissive assent. And "they shall know that I the Lord have spoken it," ver. 13. There were those who thought it was only the prophet that spake it in his delirium; but God will make them know by the accomplishment of it that he has spoken it in his zeal. Note, Sooner or later God's word will prove itself.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter we have, I. A threatening of the destruction of Israel for their idolatry, and the destruction of their idols with them, ver. 1—7. II. A promise of the gracious return of a remnant of them to God, by true repentance and reformation, ver. 8—10. III. Directions given to the prophet and other the Lord's servants, to lament both the iniquities and the calamities of Israel, ver. 11—14.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, set thy face toward the mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them, 3 And say,
Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord GOD;
Thus saith the Lord GOD to the mountains, and to the hills,
To the rivers, and to the valleys;
Behold, I, even I, will bring a sword upon you,
And I will destroy your high places.
4 And your altars shall be desolate,
And your images shall be broken:
And I will cast down your slain men before your idols.
5 And I will lay the dead carcases of the children of Israel
Before their idols;
And I will scatter your bones
Round about your altars.
6 In all your dwellingplaces the cities shall be laid waste,
And the high places shall be desolate;
That your altars may be laid waste and made desolate,
And your idols may be broken and cease,
And your images may be cut down,
And your works may be abolished.
7 And the slain shall fall in the midst of you,
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

Here, First. The prophecy is directed to the mountains of Israel, ver. 1, 2. The prophet must set his face towards them. If he could see so far off as the land of Israel, the mountains of that land would be first and farthest seen; towards them therefore he must look, and look boldly and stedfastly, as the judge looks at the prisoner, and directs his speech to him, when he passeth sentence upon him. Though the mountains of Israel be never so high, and never so strong, he must set his face against them, as having judgments to denounce that should shake their foundation. The mountains of Israel had been holy mountains, but now they had polluted them with their high places, God sets his face against them, and therefore the prophet must. Israel is here put, not as sometimes for the ten tribes, but for the whole land. The mountains are called upon to hear the word of the Lord, to shame the inhabitants that would not hear. The prophets might as soon gain attention from the mountains as from that rebellious and gainsaying people, to whom they all day long stretched out their hands in vain. "Hear, O mountains, the Lord's controversy," Mic. vi. 1, 2; for God's cause will have a hearing, whether we hear it or no. But from the mountains the word of the Lord echoes to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys; for to them also the Lord God speaks, intimating that the whole land is concerned in what is now to be delivered, and shall be witnesses against his people, that they had fair warning given them of the judgments coming; but they would not take it. Nay, they contradicted the message, and persecuted the messengers; so that God's prophets might more safely and comfortably speak to the hills and mountains than to them.

Secondly. That which is threatened in this prophecy is the utter destruction of the idols and the idolaters, and both by the sword of war. God himself is commander-in-chief of this expedition against the mountains of Israel, it is he that saith, "Behold, I, even I, will bring a sword upon you," ver. 3; the sword of the Chaldeans is at God's command, goes where he sends it, comes where he brings it, and lights as he directs it. In the desolations of that war,

1. The idols and all their appurtenances should be destroyed. The high places which were on the tops of mountains, ver. 3, these shall be levelled and made desolate, ver. 6; they shall not be beautified, shall not be frequented as they had been. The altars on which they offered sacrifice and burnt incense to strange gods shall be broken to pieces, and laid waste. The images and idols shall be defaced, shall be broken and cease, and be cut down, and all the fine costly works about them shall be abolished, ver. 4, 6. Observe here, 1st. That war makes woful desolations, which those persons, places, and things that were esteemed most sacred, cannot escape, for the sword devours one as well as another. 2nd. That God sometimes ruins idolaters even by the hands of idolaters, for such the Chaldeans themselves were. But, as if the deity were a local thing, the greatest admirers of the gods of their own country were the greatest despisers of the gods of other countries. 3rd. It is just with God to make that a desolation which we make an idol of; for he is a jealous God, and will not bear a rival. 4th. If men do not, as they ought, destroy idolatry, God will, first or last, find out a way to do it. When Josiah had destroyed the high places, altars, and images with the sword of justice, they set them up again; but God will now destroy them with the sword of war, and let us see who dares re-establish them.

2. The worshippers of idols, and all their adherents, should be destroyed likewise. As all their high places shall be laid waste, so shall all their dwelling places too, even all their cities, ver. 6. They that profane God's dwelling place, as they had done, can expect no other but that he should abandon theirs, ch. v. 11. "If any man defile the temple of God, him will God destroy," 1 Cor. iii. 17. It is here threatened that "their slain shall fall in the midst of them," ver. 7; there shall be abundance slain, even in those places which were thought most safe; but it is added as a remarkable circumstance, that they shall fall before their idols, ver. 4, that their dead carcases should be laid, and their bones scattered about their altars, ver. 5. 1st. Thus their idols should be polluted, and those places profaned by the dead bodies which they had had in veneration. If they will not "defile the covering of their graven images," God will, Isa. xxx. 22. The throwing of the carcases among them, as upon the dunghill, intimates that they were but dunghill deities. 2nd. Thus it was intimated that they were but dead things, unfit to be rivals with the living God; for the carcases of dead men, that, like them, have eyes and see not, ears and hear not, were the fittest company for them. 3rd. Thus the idols were upbraided with their inability to help their worshippers, and idolaters upbraided with the folly of trusting in them; for it should seem they fell by the sword of the enemy then when they were actually before their idols imploring their aid, and putting themselves under their protection; Sennacherib was slain by his sons then when he was worshipping in the house of his god. 4th. The sin might be read in this circumstance of the punishment; the slain men are cast before the idols, to shew that therefore they are slain, because they worshipped those idols: see Jer. viii. 2. Let the survivors observe it, and take warning not to worship images. Let them see it, and know that God is the Lord, that is, that the Lord he is God, and he alone.

8 Yet will I leave a remnant,
That ye may have some that shall escape the sword among the nations,
When ye shall be scattered through the countries.
9 And they that escape of you shall remember me
Among the nations whither they shall be carried captives,
Because I am broken
With their whorish heart, which hath departed from me,
And with their eyes, which go a whoring after their idols:
And they shall lothe themselves for the evils which they have committed
In all their abominations.
10 And they shall know that I am the LORD,
And that I have not said in vain
That I would do this evil unto them.

Judgment had hitherto triumphed, but in these verses "mercy rejoiceth against judgment." A sad end is made of this provoking people, but not a full end. The ruin seems to be universal, and "yet will I leave a remnant," a little remnant, distinguished from the body of the people, a few of many, such as are left when the rest perish; and it is God that leaves them. This intimates that they deserved to have been cut off with the rest, and had been cut off, if God had not left them: see Isa. i. 9. And it is God who by his grace works that in them which he has an eye to in sparing them. Now,

First. It is a preserved remnant, saved from the ruin which the body of the nation is involved in, ver. 8, "That ye may have some that shall escape the sword." God said, ch. v. 12, that he would draw a sword after them that were scattered, that destruction should pursue them in their dispersions. But here is mercy remembered in the midst of that wrath, and a promise that some of the Jews of the dispersion, as they were afterwards called, should escape the sword. None of those that were to fall by the sword about Jerusalem shall escape, for they trusted to Jerusalem's walls for security, and shall be made ashamed of that vain confidence; but some of them shall escape the sword among the nations, where, being deprived of all other stays, they stay themselves upon God only. They are said to have those that do escape; for they shall be the seed of another generation, out of which Jerusalem shall flourish again.

Secondly. It is a penitent remnant; ver. 9, "They that escape of you shall remember me." Note, To those whom God designs for life he will give repentance unto life. They are reprieved and escape the sword that they may have time to return to God. Note, God's patience both leaves room for repentance and is an encouragement to sinners to repent. Where God designs grace to repent he allows space to repent, yet many that have the space want the grace; many that escape the sword do not forsake the sin, as it is promised these here shall do. This remnant here marked for salvation is a type of the remnant reserved out of the body of mankind, to be monuments of mercy, which are made safe in the same way that these were, by being brought to repentance. Now observe here,

1. The occasion of their repentance, and that is a mixture of judgment and mercy: judgment that they were carried captives, but mercy that they escaped the sword in the land of their captivity. They were driven out of their own land, but not out of the land of the living, not chased out of the world, as others were, and they deserved to be. Note, The consideration of the just rebukes of providence we are under, and yet of the mercy mixed with them, should engage us to repent, that we may answer God's end in both. And true repentance shall be accepted of God, though we are brought to it by our troubles; nay, sanctified afflictions often prove means of conversion, as to Manasseh.

2. The root and principle of their repentance. "They shall remember me among the nations." They that forgat God in the land of their peace and prosperity, waxed fat and kicked, were brought to remember him in the land of their captivity. The prodigal son never bethought himself of his father's house till he was ready to perish for hunger in the far country. Their remembering God was the first step they took in returning to him. Note, Then there begins to be some hopes of sinners when they begin to think of him whom they have sinned against, and to inquire, "Where is God my maker?" Sin takes rise in forgetting God, Jer. iii. 21. Repentance takes rise from the remembrance of him, and of our obligations to him. God saith, "They shall remember me," that is, I will give them grace to do so, for otherwise they would for ever forget him; that grace shall find them out wherever they are, and by bringing God to their mind shall bring them to their right mind. The prodigal, when he remembered his father, remembered how he had sinned against heaven, and before him; so do these penitents.

1st. They remember the base affront they had put upon God by their idolatries; and this is that which an ingenuous repentance fastens upon and most sadly laments. They had departed from God to idols, had given that honour to pretended deities, the creatures of men's fancies, and the work of men's hands, which they should have given to the God of Israel. They departed from God; from his word, which they should have made their rule, from his work which they should have made their business; their hearts departed from him. The heart which he requires and insists upon, and without which bodily exercise profits nothing,—the heart which should be set upon him, and carried out towards him,—when that departs from him, it is as the treacherous elopement of a wife from her husband, or the rebellious revolt of a subject from his sovereign. "Their eyes also go after their idols;" they doated on them, and had great expectations from them. Their hearts followed their eyes in the choice of their gods, they must have gods that they could see: and then their eyes followed their hearts in the adoration of them. Now the malignity of this sin is that it is spiritual whoredom; it is a whorish heart that departs from God; and they are eyes that go a whoring after their idols. Note, Idolatry is spiritual whoredom; it is the breach of a marriage covenant with God; it is the setting of the affections upon that which is a rival with him, and the indulgence of a base lust which deceives and defiles the soul, and is a great wrong to God in his honour.

2nd. They remember what a grief this was to him, and how he resented it. They shall remember "that I am broken with their whorish heart," and their eyes that are full of this spiritual adultery. Not only angry at it, but grieved, as a husband is at the lewdness of a wife whom he dearly loved, grieved to that degree that he is broken with it; it breaks his heart to think that he should be so disingenuously dealt with. He is broken as an aged father is with the undutiful carriage of a rebellious and disobedient son, which sinks his spirits, and makes him to stoop. "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation," Ps. xcv. 10. God's measures were broken, so some; a stop was put to the current of his favours towards them; and he was even compelled to punish them. This they shall remember in the day of their repentance, and it shall affect and humble them more than any thing; not so much that their peace was broken, and their country broken, as that God was broken by their sin. Thus "they shall look on him whom they have pierced, and shall mourn," Zec. xii. 10. Note, Nothing grieves a true penitent so much as to think that his sin hath been a grief to God and to the Spirit of his grace.

3. The product and evidence of their repentance; "They shall loathe themselves for the evils which they have committed in all their abominations." Thus God gave them grace to qualify them for pardon and deliverance. Though he had been broken by their whorish heart, yet he would not quite cast them off: see Isa. lvii. 17, 18; Hos. ii. 13, 14. His goodness took occasion from their badness to appear the more illustrious. Note, 1st. True penitents see sin to be an abominable thing, that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and which makes sinners and even their services odious to him, Jer. xliv. 4; Isa. i. 11. It defiles the sinner's own conscience, and makes him, unless he be past feeling, an abomination to himself. An idol is particularly called an abomination, Isa. xliv. 19. Those gratifications, which the hearts of sinners were set upon as delectable things, the hearts of penitents are turned against as detestable things. 2nd. There are many evils committed in these abominations, many included in them, attendant on them, and flowing from them, many transgressions in one sin, Lev. xvi. 21. In their idolatries they were sometimes guilty of whoredom, as in the worship of Peor; sometimes of murder, as in the worship of Moloch: these were evils committed in their abominations. Or, it notes the great malignity there is in sin; it is an abomination that has abundance of evil in it. 3rd. Those that truly loathe sin cannot but loathe themselves because of sin; self-loathing is evermore the companion of true repentance. Penitents quarrel with themselves, and can never be reconciled to themselves till they have some ground to hope that God is reconciled to them; nay, then they shall lie down in their shame, when he is pacified towards them, Eze. xvi. 1.

4. The glory that will redound to God by their repentance; ver. 10, "They shall know that I am the Lord," that is, they shall be convinced of it by experience, and shall be ready to own it, "and that I have not said in vain that I would do this evil unto them," finding that what I have said is made good, and made to work for good, and to answer a good intention, and that it was not without just provocation that they were thus threatened and thus punished. Note, 1st. One way or other God will make sinners to know and own that he is the Lord, either by their repentance or by their ruin. 2nd. All true penitents are brought to acknowledge both the equity and the efficacy of the word of God, particularly the threatenings of the word, and to justify God in them and in the accomplishment of them.

11 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Smite with thine hand,
And stamp with thy foot, and say,
Alas for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel!
For they shall fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence.
12 He that is far off shall die of the pestilence;
And he that is near shall fall by the sword;
And he that remaineth and is besieged shall die by the famine:
Thus will I accomplish my fury upon them.
13 Then shall ye know that I am the LORD,
When their slain men shall be among their idols round about their altars,
Upon every high hill, in all the tops of the mountains,
And under every green tree, and under every thick oak,
The place where they did offer sweet savour to all their 14 So will I stretch out my hand upon them, [idols

And make the land desolate,
Yea, more desolate than the wilderness toward Diblath,
In all their habitations:
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

The same threatenings which we had before in the foregoing chapter, and in the former part of this, are here repeated, with a direction to the prophet to lament them, that those he prophesied to might be the more affected with the foresight of them.

First. He must, by his gestures in preaching, express the deep sense he had both of the iniquities and of the calamities of the house of Israel; ver. 11, "Smite with thy hand, and stamp with thy foot." Thus he must make it to appear that he was in earnest in what he said to them, that he firmly believed it, and laid it to heart; thus he must signify the just displeasure he had conceived at their sins, and the just dread he was under of the judgments coming upon them. Some would reject the use of these gestures, and call them antic and ridiculous. But God bids him use them, because they might help to enforce the word upon some, and give it the setting on. And those that know the worth of souls will be content to be laughed at by the wits, so they may but edify the weak. Two things the prophet must thus lament: 1. National sins; "Alas, for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel!" Note, The sins of sinners are the sorrows of God's faithful servants, especially "the evil abominations of the house of Israel," whose sins are more abominable, and have more evil in them, than the sins of others. Alas, what will be in the end hereof? 2. National judgments. To punish them for these abominations, "They shall fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence." Note, It is our duty to be affected not only with our own sins and sufferings, but with the sins and sufferings of others, and to look with compassion upon the miseries that wicked people bring upon themselves, as Christ beheld Jerusalem and wept over it.

Secondly. He must inculcate what he had said before concerning the destruction that was coming upon them.

1. They shall be run down and ruined by a variety of judgments, which shall find them out and follow them wherever they are; ver. 12, "He that is far off," and thinks himself out of danger, because out of the reach of the Chaldeans' arrows, yet shall find himself not out of the reach of God's arrows, which fly day and night, Ps. xci. 5, "he shall die of the pestilence." "He that is near" a place of strength, which he hopes will be to him a place of safety, yet "shall fall by the sword" before he can retreat. He that is so cautious as not to venture out, but remains in the city, there he shall die by the famine, the saddest death of all. Thus will God accomplish his fury, that is, do all that against them which he had purposed to do.

2. They shall read their sin in their punishment; for their "slain men shall be among their idols, round about their altars," as was threatened before, ver. 5—7. There, where they had prostrated themselves in honour of their idols, God will lay them dead to their own reproach, and the reproach of their idols. They lived among them, and shall die among them. They had offered sweet odours to their idols, but there shall their dead carcases send forth a stinking smell, as it were to atone for that misplaced incense.

3. The country shall be all laid waste, as before the cities; ver. 6, "I will make the land desolate." That fruitful, pleasant, populous country, that had been as the garden of the Lord, the glory of all lands, shall be desolate, "more desolate than the wilderness towards Diblath," ver. 14; Diblathaim, it is called, Num. xxxiii. 46; Jer. xlviii. 22; that great and terrible wilderness which is described Deu. viii. 15, wherein were fiery serpents and scorpions. The land of Canaan is at this day one of the most barren, desolate countries in the world. City and country are thus depopulated, "that the altars may be laid waste, and made desolate," ver. 6. Rather than their idolatrous altars shall be left standing, both town and country shall be laid in ruins. Sin is a desolating thing; therefore stand in awe, and sin not.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter the approaching ruin of the land of Israel is most particularly foretold, in affecting expressions often repeated, that if possible they might be awakened by repentance to prevent it. The prophet must tell them, I. That it will be a final ruin, a complete, utter destruction, which would make an end of them, a miserable end, ver. 1—6. II. That it is an approaching ruin, just at the door, ver. 7—10. III. That it is an unavoidable ruin, because they had by sin brought it upon themselves, ver. 10—15. IV. That their strength and wealth should be no fence against it, ver. 16—19. V. That the temple which they trusted in should itself be ruined, ver. 20—22. VI. That it should be an universal ruin, the sin that brought it having been universal, ver. 23—27.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Also, thou son of man, thus saith the Lord GOD unto the land of Israel;

An end, the end is come
Upon the four corners of the land.
3 Now is the end come upon thee,
And I will send mine anger upon thee,
And will judge thee according to thy ways,
And will recompense upon thee all thine abominations.
4 And mine eye shall not spare thee,
Neither will I have pity:
But I will recompense thy ways upon thee,
And thine abominations shall be in the midst of thee:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
5 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
An evil, an only evil, behold, is come.
6 An end is come, the end is come:
It watcheth for thee; behold, it is come.
7 The morning is come unto thee, O thou that dwellest in the land:
The time is come, the day of trouble is near,
And not the sounding again of the mountains.
8 Now will I shortly pour out my fury upon thee,
And accomplish mine anger upon thee:
And I will judge thee according to thy ways,
And will recompense thee for all thine abominations.
9 And mine eye shall not spare,
Neither will I have pity:
I will recompense thee according to thy ways
And thine abominations that are in the midst of thee;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD that smiteth.
10 Behold the day, behold, it is come:
The morning is gone forth;
The rod hath blossomed, pride hath budded.
11 Violence is risen up into a rod of wickedness:
None of them shall remain, nor of their multitude, nor of any of their's:
Neither shall there be wailing for them.
12 The time is come, the day draweth near:
Let not the buyer rejoice, nor the seller mourn:
For wrath is upon all the multitude thereof.
13 For the seller shall not return to that which is sold,
Although they were yet alive:
For the vision is touching the whole multitude thereof,
Which shall not return; [his life.
Neither shall any strengthen himself in the iniquity of 14 They have blown the trumpet, even to make all ready;
But none goeth to the battle:
For my wrath is upon all the multitude thereof.
15 The sword is without, and the pestilence and the famine within:
He that is in the field shall die with the sword;
And he that is in the city, famine and pestilence shall devour him.

We have here fair warning given of the destruction of the land of Israel, which was now hastening on apace. God, by the prophet, not only sends notice of it, but will have it inculcated in the same expressions, to shew that the thing is certain, that it is near, that the prophet is himself affected with it, and desires they should be so too, but finds them deaf, and stupid, and unaffected. When the town is on fire men do not seek for fine words and quaint expressions in which to give an account of it, but cry about the streets with a loud and lamentable voice, Fire, fire! so the prophet here exclaims, "An end, an end; it is come, it is come; behold, it is come!" He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

First. "An end is come, the end is come," ver. 2; and again, ver. 6; and ver. 3, "Now is the end come upon thee." The end which all their wickedness had a tendency to, and which God had often told them it would come to at last, when by his prophet he asked them, "What will ye do in the end hereof?" The end which all the foregoing judgments had been working towards, as means to bring it about; (their ruin shall now be completed;) or, the end, that is, the period of their state, the final destruction of their nation; as the deluge was the end of all flesh, Gen. vi. 13. They had flattered themselves with hopes that they should shortly see an end of their troubles; Yea, saith God, an end is come, but a miserable one, not the expected end which is promised to the pious remnant among them, Jer. xxix. 11. It is the end, that end which you have been so often warned of, that last end which Moses wished you to consider, Deu. xxxii. 29, and which, because "Jerusalem remembered not, therefore she came down wonderfully," Lam. i. 9; this end was long in coming, but now it is come. Though the ruin of sinners comes slowly, it comes surely; "It is come, it watcheth for thee," ready to receive thee. This perhaps looks farther to the last destruction of that nation by the Romans, which that by the Chaldeans was an earnest of; and still farther to the final destruction of the world of the ungodly. "The end of all things is at hand," and Jerusalem's last end was a type of the end of the world, Mat. xxiv. 3. O that we could all see that end of time and days very near, and the end of our own time and days much nearer, that we may secure a happy lot in the end of the days, Dan. xii. 13. This end comes upon the four corners of the land. The ruin, as it shall be final, so it shall be total; no part of the land shall escape, no, not that which lies most remote. Such will the destruction of the world be. All these things shall be dissolved; such will the destruction of sinners be, none can avoid it. Oh, that the wickedness of the wicked might come to an end before it bring them to an end.

Secondly. "An evil, an only evil, behold, is come," ver. 5. Sin is an evil, an only evil, an evil that has no good in it; it is the worst of evils. But this is spoken of the evil of trouble; it is an evil, one evil, and that one shall suffice to effect and complete the ruin of the nation; there needs no more to do its business. This one shall make an utter end; affliction needs not rise up a second time, Nah. i. 9. It is an evil without precedent or parallel, an evil that stands alone; you cannot produce such another instance. It is to the impenitent an evil, an only evil; it hardens their hearts and irritates their corruptions; whereas there were those to whom it was sanctified by the grace of God, and made a means of much good: they were sent into Babylon for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5. The wicked have the dregs of that cup to drink, which to the righteous is full of mixtures of mercy, Ps. lxxv. 8; the same affliction is to us either a half evil or an only evil, according as we carry ourselves under it and make use of it. But when an end, the end, is come upon the wicked world, then an evil, an only evil, comes upon it, and not till then. The sorest of temporal judgments have their allays, but the torments of the damned are an evil, an only evil.

Thirdly. "The time is come," the set time, for the inflicting of this only evil, and the making of this full end; for to all God's purposes there is a time, a proper time, and that prefixed, in which the purpose shall have its accomplishment. Particularly the time of reckoning with wicked people, and rendering to them according to their deserts, is fixed; the "day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God;" and he sees, whether we see it or no, that his day is coming. This they are here told of again and again, ver. 10. Behold the day that has lingered so long is come at last; "Behold, it is come: the time is come, the day draws near, the day of trouble is near," ver. 7, 12. Though threatened judgments may be long deferred, yet they shall not be dropped; the time for executing them will come. Though God's patience may put them off, nothing but man's sincere repentance and reformation will put them by. "The morning is come upon thee," ver. 7; and again, ver. 10, "the morning is gone forth." The day of trouble dawns, the day of destruction is already begun. The morning discovers that which was hidden; they thought their secret sins should never come to light, but now they will be brought to light. They used to try and execute malefactors in the morning; and such a morning of judgment and execution is now coming upon them, a day of trouble to sinners, "the year of their visitation." See how stupid these people were, that, though the day of their destruction was already begun, yet they were not aware of it, but must be thus told of it again and again. "The day of trouble," real trouble, is near, "and not the sounding again of the mountains;" that is, not a mere echo or report of troubles, as they were willing to think it was, nothing but a groundless surmise, as if the men that came against them were but the shadow of the mountains, as Zebul suggested to Gaal, Jud. ix. 36, and the intelligence they received were but an empty sound, reverberated from the mountains. No, the trouble is not a fancy, and so you will soon find.

Fourthly. All this comes from God's wrath, not allayed, as sometimes it has been with mixtures of mercy. This is the fountain from which all these calamities flow, and this is the wormwood and the gall, in the affliction and the misery, which makes it bitter indeed; ver. 3, "I will send mine anger upon thee." Observe, God is Lord of his anger; it doth not break out but when he pleaseth, nor fasten upon any but as he directs it and gives it commission. The expression riseth higher, ver. 8, "Now will I shortly pour out my fury upon thee" in full vials, "and accomplish mine anger," all the purposes and all the products of it upon thee. This wrath doth not single out here and there one to be made examples, but it is upon all the multitude thereof, ver. 12, 14; the whole body of the nation is become a vessel of wrath, fitted for destruction. God doth sometimes in wrath remember mercy, but now he saith, "Mine eye shall not spare thee, neither will I have pity," ver. 4; and again, ver. 9. They shall have judgment without mercy that made light of mercy when it was offered them.

Fifthly. All this is the just punishment of their sins, and it is what they have by their own folly brought upon themselves. This is much insisted on here, that they might be brought to justify God in all he had brought upon them. God never sends his anger but in wisdom and justice; and therefore it follows, "I will judge thee according to thy ways," ver. 3. I will examine what thy ways have been, compare them with the law, and then deal with thee according to the merit of them, and recompense them to thee, ver. 4. Note, In the heaviest judgments God inflicts upon sinners he doth but recompense their own ways upon them; they are beaten with their own rod. And when God comes to reckon with a sinful people, he will bring every provocation to account; "I will recompense upon thee all thine abominations," ver. 3; and now "thine iniquity shall be found to be hateful," Ps. xxxvi. 2; and "thine abominations shall be in the midst of thee," ver. 4; that is, thy secret wickedness shall now be brought to light, and that shall appear to have been in the midst of thee which before was not suspected, and thy sin shall now become an abomination to thyself. So the abomination of iniquity will be when it comes to be an abomination of desolation, Mat. xxiv. 15. Or, Thine abominations, that is, the punishments of them, shall be in the midst of thee; that is, they shall reach to thy heart: see Jer. iv. 18. Or, Therefore, God will not spare, nor have pity, because even then when he is recompensing their ways upon them, yet in their distress they trespass yet more; their abominations are still in the midst of them, indulged and harboured in their hearts. It is repeated again, ver 8, 9, "I will judge thee, I will recompense thee."

Two sins are particularly instanced in as provoking God to bring these judgments upon them,—pride and oppression. 1. God will humble them by his judgments, for they have magnified themselves. The rod of affliction hath blossomed, but it was pride that budded, ver. 10. What buds in sin will blossom in some judgment or other. The pride of Judah and Jerusalem appeared among all orders and degrees of men, as buds upon the tree in spring. 2. Their enemies shall deal hardly with them, for they have dealt hardly with one another; ver. 11, "Violence is risen up into a rod of wickedness," that is, their injuriousness to one another is protected and patronised by the power of the magistrate. The rod of government was become a rod of wickedness, to such a degree of impudence was violence risen up: "I saw the place of judgment that wickedness was there," Eccl. iii. 16; Isa. v. 7. Whatever are the fruits of God's judgments, it is certain our sin is the root of them.

Sixthly. There is no escape from these judgments, nor fence against them; for they shall be universal, and shall bear down all before them without remedy.

1. Death in its various shapes shall ride triumphantly both in town and country, both within the city and without it, ver. 15. Men shall be safe no where, for "he that is in the field shall die by the sword;" every field shall be to them a field of battle; and "he that is in the city," though it be a holy city, yet it shall not be his protection, but "famine and pestilence shall devour him." Sin had abounded both in city and country; Iliacos intra muros peccatur et extra,—'Trojans and Greeks offend alike;' and therefore in both desolations are made.

2. None of those that are marked for death shall escape. There shall none of them remain,—none of those proud oppressors that did violence to their poor neighbours with the rod of wickedness; none of them shall be left, but they shall be all swept away by the desolation that is coming, ver. 11. None of their multitude, that is, of the rabble whom they set on to do mischief, and to countenance them in doing it,—to cry, Crucify, crucify, such as they were resolved to run down; "None of them shall remain, nor of any of theirs." Their families shall all be destroyed, and neither root nor branch left them. This multitude, this mob, Divine vengeance will in a particular manner fasten upon, for "wrath is upon all the multitude thereof," ver. 12, 14; and "the vision was touching the whole multitude thereof," ver. 3, the bulk of the common people. The judgments coming shall carry them away by wholesale, and they shall neither secure themselves nor their masters, whose creatures and tools they were. God's judgments, when they come with commission, cannot be overpowered by multitudes. "Though hand join in hand, yet shall not the wicked go unpunished."

3. Those that fall shall not be lamented; ver. 11, "There shall be no wailing for them," for there shall be none left to bewail them, but such as are hastening apace after them. And the times shall be so bad that men shall rather congratulate than condole the death of their friends, as reckoning those happy that are taken away from seeing these desolations, and sharing in them, Jer. xvi. 4, 5.

4. They shall not be able to make any resistance. The decree is gone forth, and the vision concerning them shall not return, ver. 13. God will not recall it, and they cannot defeat it; and therefore it shall not return re infecta,—'without having accomplished any thing,' but shall accomplish that for which he sends it. God's word will take place, and then, 1st. Particular persons cannot make their part good against God. No man shall "strengthen himself in the iniquity of his life," that is, it will be to no purpose for sinners to set God and his judgments at defiance, as they used to do; none ever hardened his heart against God and prospered. Those that strengthen themselves in their wickedness will be found not only to weaken but to ruin themselves, Ps. lii. 7. 2. The multitude cannot resist the torrent of these judgments, nor make head against them; ver. 14, "They have blown the trumpet" to call their soldiers together, and to animate and encourage those whom they have got together; and thus they think "to make all ready," but all in vain; none list themselves, and those that do have not courage to face the enemy. Note, If God be against us, none can be for us to do us any service.

5. They shall have no hope of the return of their prosperity, with which to support themselves in their adversity. They shall have given up all for gone, and therefore "let not the buyer rejoice" that he is increasing his estate, and is become a purchaser; neither "let the seller mourn" that he is lessening his estate, and is become a bankrupt, ver. 11. See the vanity of the things of this world, and how worthless they are, that in a time of trouble, when we have most need of them, we may, perhaps, make least account of them. They that have sold are the more easy, having the less to lose, and they that have bought have but increased their own cares and fears. Because "The fashion of this world passeth away, let those that buy be as though they possessed not," because they know not how soon they may be dispossessed, 1 Cor. vii. 29. It is added, ver. 12, "The seller shall not return" at the year of jubilee "to that which is sold," according to the law, though he should escape the sword and pestilence, and live till that year comes; for no inheritances shall be enjoyed here till the seventy years be accomplished, and then men shall return to their possessions, shall claim and have their own again, in the belief of which Jeremiah about this time bought his uncle's field; yet, according to the charge, the buyer did not rejoice, but complain, Jer. xxxii. 25.

6. God will be glorified in all. "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," ver. 4; that "I am the Lord that smiteth," ver. 9. You look at second causes, and think it is Nebuchadnezzar that smites you, but you shall be made to know he is but the staff; it is the hand of the Lord that smiteth you, and who knows the weight of his hand? Those who would not know it was the Lord that did them good shall be made to know it is the Lord that smiteth them; for, one way or other, he will be owned.

16 But they that escape of them shall escape,
And shall be on the mountains like doves of the valleys,
All of them mourning, every one for his iniquity.
17 All hands shall be feeble,
And all knees shall be weak as water.
18 They shall also gird themselves with sackcloth,
And horror shall cover them;
And shame shall be upon all faces,
And baldness upon all their heads.
19 They shall cast their silver in the streets,
And their gold shall be removed:
Their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them
In the day of the wrath of the LORD:
They shall not satisfy their souls, neither fill their bowels:
Because it is the stumblingblock of their iniquity.
20 As for the beauty of his ornament, he set it in majesty:
But they made the images of their abominations
And of their detestable things therein:
Therefore have I set it far from them.
21 And I will give it into the hands of the strangers for a prey,
And to the wicked of the earth for a spoil;
And they shall pollute it.
22 My face will I turn also from them,
And they shall pollute my secret place;
For the robbers shall enter into it, and defile it.

We have attended the fate of those that are cut off, and are now to attend the flight of those that have an opportunity of outrunning the danger. Some of them shall escape, ver. 16; but what the better? as good die once as in a miserable life die a thousand deaths, and escape only like Cain to be fugitives and vagabonds, and afraid of being slain by every one they meet; so shall these here be.

First. They shall have no comfort or satisfaction in their own minds, but be in continual anguish and terror; for wherever they go they carry about with them guilty consciences, which make them a burthen to themselves.

1. They shall be always solitary, and under prevailing melancholy. They shall not be in the cities, or places of concourse, but all alone upon the mountains, not caring for society, but shy of it, as being ashamed of the low circumstances to which they are reduced.

2. They shall be always sorrowful. Those have reason to be so that are under the tokens of God's displeasure; and God can make those so that have been most jovial, and have set sorrow at defiance. They that, when time was, thought themselves as the lions of the mountains, so daring were they, now become as the doves of the valleys, so sneaking are they, and so dispirited; ready to flee when none pursues, and to tremble at the shaking of a leaf. They are all of them mourning, not with a godly sorrow, but with the sorrow of the world, which worketh death, every one for his iniquity; that is, for those calamities which they now see their iniquity has brought upon them; not only the iniquity of the land, but their own; they shall then be brought to acknowledge what they have each of them contributed to the national guilt. Note, Sooner or later sin will have sorrow, of one kind or other; and those that will not repent of their iniquity may justly be left to pine away in it; that will not mourn for it as it is an offence to God, shall be made to mourn for it as it is a shame and ruin to themselves; to "mourn at the last when the flesh and the body are consumed, and to say, How have I hated instruction," Pr. v. 11.

3. They shall be deprived of all their strength of body and mind; ver. 17, "All hands shall be feeble," so that they shall not be able to fight, or defend themselves; and "all knees shall be weak as water," so that they shall be able neither to flee nor to stand their ground. They shall feel a universal colliquation; their knees shall flow as water, so that they must fall of course. Note, It is folly for the strong man to glory in his strength, for God can soon weaken it.

4. They shall be deprived of all their hopes, and shall abandon themselves to despair, ver. 18. They shall have nothing to hold up their spirits with, their aspects shall shew what are their prospects,—all dreadful; for "They shall gird themselves with sackcloth," as having no expectation ever to wear better clothing. "Horror shall cover them, and shame, and baldness," all the expressions of a desperate sorrow, Isa. xvii. 11. Note, Those who will not be kept from sin by fear and shame shall by fear and shame be punished for it; such is the confusion that sin will end in.

Secondly. They shall have no benefit by their wealth and riches, but shall be perfectly sick of them, ver. 19. They that were reduced to this distress were such as had had abundance of silver and gold, money, and plate, and jewels, and other valuable goods, from which they promised themselves a great deal of advantage in times of public trouble. They thought it would be their strong city, that with it they could bribe enemies, and buy friends; that it would be the ransom of their lives, and that they could never want bread as long as they had money, and that money would answer all things. But see how it proved:

1. It had been a great temptation to them in the day of their prosperity; they set their affections upon it, and put their confidence in it. By their eager pursuit of it they were drawn into sin, and by their plentiful enjoyment of it they were hardened in sin, and thus it was the stumblingblock of their iniquity, it occasioned their falling into sin, and obstructed their return to God. Note, There are many whose wealth is their snare and ruin. The gaining of the world is the losing of their souls; it makes them proud, secure, covetous, oppressive, voluptuous; and that which, if well used, might have been the servant of their piety, being abused, becomes the stumblingblock of their iniquity.

2. It was no relief to them now in the day of their adversity; for, 1st. Their gold and silver could not protect them from the judgments of God; they "shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord." They shall not serve to atone his justice, or turn away his wrath, nor to screen them from the judgments he is bringing upon them. Note, "Riches profit not in the day of wrath," Pr. xi. 4. They neither set them so high as that God's judgments cannot reach them, nor make them so strong as that they cannot conquer them. There is a day of wrath coming, when it will appear that men's wealth is utterly unable to deliver them, or do them any service. What the better was the rich man for his full barns, when his soul was required of him? Or that other rich man for his purple, and scarlet, and sumptuous fare, when in hell he could not procure a drop of water to cool his tongue? Money is no defence against the arrests of death, nor any alleviation to the miseries of the damned. 2nd. Their gold and silver could not give them any content under their calamities. First. They could not fill their bowels. When there was no bread left in the city, none to be had for love or money, their silver and gold could not satisfy their hunger, nor serve to make one meal's meat for them. Note, We could better be without mines of gold than fields of corn. The products of the earth, which may easily be gathered from the surface of it, are much greater blessings to mankind than its treasures, which are with so much difficulty and hazard digged out of its bowels. If God give us daily bread we have reason to be thankful, and no reason to complain, though silver and gold we have none. Secondly. Much less could they satisfy their souls, or yield them any inward comfort. Note, The wealth of this world has not that in it that will answer the desires of the soul, or be any satisfaction to it in a day of distress. "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver," much less he that loseth it. 3rd. Their gold and silver shall be thrown into the streets; either by the hands of the enemy, who shall have more spoil than they care for, or can carry away. Silver shall be nothing accounted of, they shall cast that in the streets; but the gold, which is more valuable, shall be removed and brought to Babylon. Or, they themselves shall throw away their silver and gold, either because it would be an incumbrance to them, and retard their flight, or because it would expose them, and be a temptation to the enemy to cut their throats for their money; or in indignation at it, because they found that, after all the care and pains they had taken to scrape it together, and hoard it up, it would stand them in no stead, but do them a mischief rather. Note, "The world passeth away, and the lust thereof," 1 Jno. ii. 17. The time may come when worldly men will be as weary of their wealth as now they are wedded to it, when those will fare best that have least.

Thirdly. God's temple shall stand them in no stead, ver. 20—22. This they had prided themselves in, and promised themselves security from, Jer. vii. 4; Mic. iii. 11; but this confidence of theirs shall fail them. Observe, 1. The great honour God had done to that people in setting up his sanctuary among them; ver. 20, "As for the beauty of his ornament," that holy and beautiful house where they and their fathers praised God, Isa. lxiv. 11, which was therefore beautiful, because holy, (it was called the beauty of holiness, and that is the beauty of his ornament; it was also adorned with gold and gifts;) as for this, he set it in majesty; every thing was contrived to make it magnificent, that it might help to make the people of Israel the more illustrious among their neighbours. "He built his sanctuary like high palaces," Ps. lxxviii. 69. It was a glorious high throne from the beginning, Jer. xvii. 12. But, 2. Here is the great dishonour they had done to God in profaning his sanctuary. They made the images of their counterfeit deities, which they set up in a rivalship with God, and which are here called their abominations and their detestable things; for so they were to God, and so they should have been to them; and these they set up in God's temple, than which a greater affront could not be put upon him. And, therefore, 3. It is here threatened that they shall be deprived of the temple, and it shall be no succour to them; "Therefore have I set it far from them," that is, sent them far from it, so that it is out of the reach of their services, and they out of the reach of its influences. Note, God's ordinances, and the privileges of a profession of religion, will justly be taken away from those that despise and profane them. Nay, they shall not only be kept at a distance from the temple, but the temple shall itself be involved in the common desolation, ver. 21. The Chaldeans that are strangers, and therefore have no veneration for it, that are the wicked of the earth, and therefore have an antipathy to it, shall have it for a prey, and for a spoil; all the ornaments and treasures of it shall fall into their hands, who will make no difference between that and other plunder. This was a grief to the saints in Zion, who complained of nothing so much as of that which "the enemies did wickedly in the sanctuary," Ps. lxxiv. 3. But it was the punishment of the sinners in Zion, who, by profaning the temple with strange gods, provoked God to suffer it to be profaned by strange nations, and to turn his face from them that did it, as if he had not seen them and their crimes; and from them that deprecated it, as not regarding them and their prayers. Let the soldiers do as they will,—let them enter into the secret place, into the holy of holies, as robbers,—let them strip it, let them pollute it, its defence is departed, and then farewell all its glory. Note, Those are unworthy to be honoured with the form of godliness that will not be governed by the power of godliness.

23 Make a chain:
For the land is full of bloody crimes,
And the city is full of violence.
24 Wherefore I will bring the worst of the heathen,
And they shall possess their houses:
I will also make the pomp of the strong to cease;
And their holy places shall be defiled.
25 Destruction cometh;
And they shall seek peace, and there shall be none.
26 Mischief shall come upon mischief, and rumour shall be upon rumour;
Then shall they seek a vision of the prophet;
But the law shall perish from the priest,
And counsel from the ancients.
27 The king shall mourn,
And the prince shall be clothed with desolation,
And the hands of the people of the land shall be troubled:
I will do unto them after their way,
And according to their deserts will I judge them;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

Here is, First. The prisoner arraigned. "Make a chain," in which to drag the criminal to the bar, and set him before the tribunal of Divine justice: let him stand in fetters,—as a notorious malefactor,—stand pinioned to receive his doom. Note, Those that break the bands of God's law asunder, and cast away those cords from them, will find themselves bound, and held by the chains of his judgments, which they cannot break or cast from them. The chain signified the siege of Jerusalem, or the slavery of those that were carried into captivity, or that they were all bound over to the righteous judgment of God,—reserved in chains.

Secondly. The indictment drawn up against the prisoner. "The land is full of bloody crimes," full of 'the judgments of blood,' so the word is; that is, of the guilt of blood which they had shed under colour of justice, and by forms of law, with the solemnity of a judgment. The innocent blood which Manasseh shed, it is probable thus shed by the judgment of blood, was the measure-filling sin of Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4; or it is full of such crimes as by the law were to be punished with death, the judgment of blood. Idolatry, blasphemy, witchcraft, sodomy, and the like, were bloody crimes, for which particular sinners were to die; and therefore, when they were become national, there was no remedy, but the nation must be cut off. Note, Bloody crimes will be punished with bloody judgments. The city, the city of David, the holy city, that should have been the pattern of righteousness, the protector of it, and the punisher of wrong, is now full of violence. The rulers of that city having greater power and reputation, are greater oppressors than any other. This was sadly to be lamented. "How is the faithful city become a harlot!"

Thirdly. Judgment given upon this indictment. God will reckon with them not only for the profaning of his sanctuary, but for the perverting of justice between man and man; for, as "holiness becomes his house," so the "righteous Lord loveth righteousness," and is the avenger of unrighteousness. Now the judgment given is,

1. That since they had walked in the way of the heathen, and done worse than they, God would "bring the worst of the heathen upon them," to destroy them and lay them waste, the most barbarous and outrageous, that have the least compassion to mankind, and the greatest antipathy to the Jews. Note, Of the heathen some are worse than other, and God sometimes picks out the worst to be a scourge to his own people, because he intends them for the fire when the work is done.

2. That since they had filled their houses with goods unjustly got, and used their pomp and power for the crushing and oppressing of the weak, God would give their houses to be possessed, and all the furniture of them to be enjoyed, by strangers, and "make the pomp of the strong to cease," so that their great men should not dazzle the eyes of the weak-sighted with their pomp, nor with their might at any time prevail against right, as they had done.

3. That since they had "defiled the holy places" with their idolatries, God would defile them with his judgments; since they had set up the images of other gods in the temple, God would remove thence the tokens of the presence of their own God. When the holy places are deserted by their God, they will soon be defiled by their enemies.

4. Since they had followed one sin with another, God would pursue them with one judgment upon another. "Destruction cometh," utter destruction, ver. 25, for there shall come mischief upon mischief to ruin you, and rumour upon rumour to frighten you, like the waves in a storm, one upon the neck of another. Note, Sinners that are marked for ruin shall be prosecuted to it, for God will overcome when he judgeth.

5. Since they had disappointed God's expectations from them, he would disappoint their expectations from him. For, 1st. They shall not have the "deliverance out of the troubles" that they expect. They shall "see peace," that is, they shall desire it and pray for it, they shall endeavour it and expect it, but "there shall be none;" their attempts both to court their enemies and to conquer them shall be in vain, and their troubles shall grow worse and worse. 2nd. They shall not have the direction in the trouble that they expect; ver. 26, "They shall seek a vision of the prophets," shall desire, for their support under their troubles, to be assured of a happy issue out of them. They did not desire a vision to reprove them for their sin, or to warn them of danger, but to promise them deliverance,—such messages they longed to hear; but "the law shall perish from the priest," he shall have no words either of counsel or comfort to say to them. They would not hear what God had to say to them by way of conviction, and therefore he has nothing to say to them by way of encouragement. Counsel shall "perish from the ancients;" the elders of the people, that should advise them what to do in this difficult juncture, shall be infatuated, and at their wit's end. It is bad with a people when those that should be their counsellors know not how to consider within themselves, consult with one another, or counsel them.

6. Since they had animated and encouraged one another to sin, God would dispirit and dishearten them all, so that they should not be able to make head against the judgments of God that were breaking in upon them. All orders and degrees of men shall lie down by consent under the load, ver. 27. The king that should inspire life into them, and the prince that should lead them on to attack the enemy, they shall mourn, and be clothed with desolation; their heads and hearts shall fail, their politics and their courage, and then no wonder if the hands of the people of the land that should fight for them be troubled, none of the men of might shall find their hands. What can men contrive or do for themselves when God is departed from them, and appears against them? All must needs be in tears, all in trouble, when God comes to "judge them according to their deserts," and so make them know, to their cost, that he is the Lord, the God to whom vengeance belongs.

CHAPTER VIII.

God, having given the prophet a clear foresight of the people's miseries that were hastening on, here gives him a clear insight into the people's wickedness, by which God was provoked to bring those miseries upon them; that he might justify God in all his judgments, might the more particularly reprove the sins of the people, and with the more satisfaction foretell their ruin. Here God in vision brings him to Jerusalem, to shew him the sins that were committed there, though God had begun to contend with them, ver. 1—4, and there he sees, I. The image of jealousy set up at the gate of the altar, ver. 5, 6. II. The elders of Israel worshipping all manner of images in a secret chamber, ver. 7—12. III. The women weeping for Tammuz, ver. 13, 14. IV. The men worshipping the sun, ver. 15, 16. And then appeals to him, whether such a provoking people should have any pity shewed them, ver. 17, 18.

AND it came to pass in the sixth year, in the sixth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I sat in mine house, and the elders of Judah sat before me, that the hand of the Lord GOD fell there upon me. 2 Then I beheld, and lo a likeness as the appearance of fire: from the appearance of his loins even downward, fire; and from his loins even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the colour of amber. 3 And he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head; and the spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem, to the door of the inner gate that looketh toward the north; where was the seat of the image of jealousy, which provoketh to jealousy. 4 And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there, according to the vision that I saw in the plain. 5 Then said he unto me, Son of man, lift up thine eyes now the way toward the north. So I lifted up mine eyes the way toward the north, and behold northward at the gate of the altar this image of jealousy in the entry. 6 He said furthermore unto me, Son of man, seest thou what they do? even the great abominations that the house of Israel committeth here, that I should go far off from my sanctuary? but turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations.

Ezekiel was now in Babylon, but the messages of wrath he had delivered in the foregoing chapters concerned Jerusalem, for in the peace or trouble thereof the captives looked upon themselves to have peace or trouble; and therefore here he has a vision of what was done at Jerusalem, and this vision is continued to the close of the eleventh chapter.

First. Here is the date of this vision. The first vision he had was in the fifth year of the captivity, in the fourth month, and the fifth day of the month, ch. i. 1. This was just fourteen months after. Perhaps it was after he had lain three hundred and ninety days on his left side to bear the iniquity of Israel, and before he began the forty days on his right side to bear that of Judah, for now he was sitting in his house, not lying. Note, God keeps a particular account of the messages he sends to us, because he will shortly call us to account about them.

Secondly. The opportunity is taken notice of as well as the time.

1. The prophet was himself sitting in his house, in a sedate, composed frame, deep, perhaps, in contemplation. Note, The more we retreat from the world, and retire into our own hearts, the better frame we are in for communion with God; they that sit down to consider what they have learned shall be taught more. Or, he sat in his house ready to preach to the company that resorted to him, but waiting for instructions what to say. God will communicate more knowledge to those who are communicative of what they do know.

2. The elders of Judah, that were now in captivity with him, sat before him. It is probable it was on the sabbath day, and that it was usual for them to attend on the prophet every sabbath day, both to hear the word from him and to join with him in prayer and praise; and how could they spend the sabbath better, now they had neither temple nor synagogue, priest nor altar? It was a great mercy that they had opportunity to spend it so well, as the good people in Elisha's time, 2 Kin. iv. 23. But some think it was on some extraordinary occasion that they attended him to inquire of the Lord, and sat down at his feet to hear his word. Observe here, 1st. When the law was perished from the priests at Jerusalem, whose lips should keep knowledge, ch. vii. 26, they in Babylon had a prophet to consult. God is not tied to places or persons. 2nd. Now the elders of Judah were in captivity, they paid more respect to God's prophets, and his word in their mouth, than they did when they lived in peace in their own land. When God brings men into the cords of affliction, then he opens their ear to discipline, Job xxxvi. 8, 10; Ps. cxli. 6. Those that despised vision in the valley of vision prized it now the word of the Lord was precious, and there was no open vision. 3rd. When our teachers are driven into corners, and are forced to preach in private houses, we must diligently attend them there. A minister's house should be a church for all his neighbours. St. Paul preached in his own hired house at Rome, and God owned him there, and no man forbade him.

Thirdly. The Divine influence and impression that the prophet was now under: "The hand of the Lord fell there upon me." God's hand took hold of him, and arrested him, as it were, to employ him in this vision, but at the same time supported him to bear it.

Fourthly. The vision that the prophet saw, ver. 2. He beheld a likeness, of a man we may suppose, for that was the likeness he saw before; but it was all brightness above the girdle, and all fire below, fire and flame. This agrees with the description we had before of the apparition he saw, ch. i. 27, and it is likely it was the same person, the man Christ Jesus. It is likely the elders that sat with him, as the men that journeyed with Paul, saw a light and were afraid, and this happy sight they gained by attending the prophet in a private meeting; but they had no distinct view of him that spake to him, Acts xxii. 9.

Fifthly. The prophet's remove in vision to Jerusalem. The apparition he saw "put forth the form of a hand," which took him by a lock of his head; and the Spirit was that hand which was put forth, for the Spirit of God is called the finger of God. Or, the Spirit within him lifted him up, so that he was borne up and carried on by an internal principle, not an external violence. A faithful, ready servant of God will be drawn by a hair, by the least intimation of the Divine will, to his duty, for he has that within him which inclines him to a compliance with it, Ps. xxvii. 8. He was miraculously lifted up between heaven and earth, as if he were to fly away upon eagles' wings. This, it is probable, so Grotius thinks, the elders that sat with him saw; they were witnesses of the hand taking him by the lock of hair and lifting him up, and then, perhaps, laying him down again in a trance or extacy, while he had the following visions; whether in the body or out of the body, we may suppose he could not tell, no more than Paul in a like case; much less can we. Note, Those are best prepared for communion with God, and the communications of Divine light, that by Divine grace are raised up above the earth and the things of it, to be out of their attractive force.

But, being lifted up towards heaven, he was carried in vision to Jerusalem, and to God's sanctuary there; for those that would go to heaven must take that in their way. The Spirit represented to his mind the city and temple as plainly as if he had been there in person. O that by faith we could thus enter into the Jerusalem, the holy city above, and see the things that are invisible!

Sixthly. The discoveries that were made to him there.

1. There he saw the glory of God; ver. 4, "Behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there," the same appearance of the living creatures, and the wheels, and the throne he had seen ch. i. Note, God's servants, wherever they are and whithersoever they go, ought to carry about with them a believing regard to the glory of God, and to set that always before them; and those that have seen "God's power and glory in the sanctuary" should desire to see it again as they have seen it, Ps. lxiii. 2. Ezekiel has this repeated vision of the glory of God, both to give credit to and to put honour upon the following discoveries. But it seems to have a farther intention here; it was to aggravate this sin of Israel in changing their own God, the God of Israel, who is a God of so much glory as here he appears to be, for dunghill gods, scandalous gods, false gods, and indeed no gods. Note, The more glorious we see God to be, the more odious we shall see sin to be, especially idolatry, which turns his truth into a lie, his glory into shame. It was also to aggravate their approaching misery, when this glory of the Lord shall remove from them, ch. xi. 23, and leave the house and city desolate.

2. There he saw the reproach of Israel, and that was the image of jealousy, set northward, at the gate of the altar, ver. 3, 5. What image this was is uncertain; probably, an image of Baal, or of the grove, which Manasseh made and set in the temple, 2 Kin. xxi. 7; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 3; which Josiah removed, but his successors it seems replaced there, as probably they did the chariots of the sun, which he found "at the entering in of the house of the Lord," 2 Kin. xxxiii. 11, and this is here said to be in the entry. But the prophet, instead of telling us what image it was, which might gratify our curiosity, tells us it was "the image of jealousy," to convince our consciences that, whatever image it was, it was in the highest degree offensive to God, and provoked him to jealousy. He resented it as a husband would resent the whoredoms of his wife, and would certainly revenge it, for "God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth," Na. i. 2. The very setting up of this image in the house of the Lord was enough to provoke him to jealousy, for it is in the matters of his worship that we are particularly told, "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God." They that placed this image at "the door of the inner gate," where the people assembled, called the "gate of the altar," ver. 5, thereby plainly intended, 1st. To affront God, to provoke him to his face, by advancing an idol to be a rival with him for the adorations of his people, in contempt of his law, and in defiance of his justice. 2nd. To debauch the people, and pick them up as they were entering into the courts of the Lord's house to bring their offerings to him, and to tempt them to offer them to this image. Like the adulteress Solomon describes, that "sitteth at the door of her house, to call passengers who go right on their ways, Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither," Pr. ix. 14—16. With good reason therefore is this called the "image of jealousy."

We may well imagine what a surprise and what a grief it was to Ezekiel to see this image in the house of God, when he was in hopes that the judgments they were under had by this time wrought some reformation among them; but there is more wickedness in the world, in the church, than good men think there is. And now, 1st. God appeals to him whether this was not bad enough, and a sufficient ground for God to go upon in casting off this people, and abandoning them to ruin? Could he, or any one else, expect any other, but "that God should go far from his sanctuary," when there were such abominations committed there, in that very place; nay, was he not perfectly driven thence? They did these things designedly, and on purpose that he should leave his sanctuary, and "so shall their doom be." They have hereby, in effect, like the Gadarenes, desired him "to depart out of their coasts," and therefore he will depart; he will no more dignify and protect his sanctuary as he has done, but will give it up to reproach and ruin. But, 2nd. Though this is bad enough, and serves abundantly to justify God in all that he brings upon them, yet the matter will appear to be much worse. "But turn thee yet again," and thou wilt be amazed to "see greater abominations" than these. Where there is one abomination, it will be found there are many more. Sins do not go alone.

7 And he brought me to the door of the court; and when I looked, behold a hole in the wall. 8 Then said he unto me, Son of man, dig now in the wall: and when I had digged in the wall, behold a door. 9 And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here. 10 So I went in and saw; and behold every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, pourtrayed upon the wall round about. 11 And there stood before them seventy men of the ancients of the house of Israel, and in the midst of them stood Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan, with every man his censer in his hand; and a thick cloud of incense went up. 12 Then said he unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery? for they say, The LORD seeth us not; the LORD hath forsaken the earth.

We have here a farther discovery of the abominations that were committed at Jerusalem, and within the confines of the temple too. Now observe,

First. How this discovery is made. God in vision brought him to "the door of the court," the outer court, along the sides of which the priests' lodgings were. God could have introduced him at first into "the chambers of imagery," but he brings him to them by degrees, partly to employ his own industry in searching out these mysteries of iniquity, and partly to make him sensible with what care and caution those idolaters concealed their idolatries. Before the priests' apartments they had run up a wall to make them the more private, that they might not lie open to the observation of those who passed by, a shrewd sign they did something that they had reason to be ashamed of. "He that doth evil hates the light." They were not willing that those who saw them in God's house should see them in their own, lest they should see them contradict themselves, and undo in private what they did in public. But behold "a hole in the wall," ver. 7, a spy-hole, by which you might see that which would give cause to suspect them. When hypocrites screen themselves behind the wall of an external profession, and with it think to conceal their wickedness from the eye of the world, and carry on their designs the more successfully, it is hard for them to manage it with so much art, but that there is some hole or other left in the wall, something that betrays them to those who look diligently not to be what they pretend to be. The ass's ears, in the fable, appeared from under the lion's skin. This hole in the wall Ezekiel made wider, and "Behold, a door," ver. 8. This door he goes in by into the treasury, or some of the apartments of the priests, and sees "the wicked abominations that they do there," ver. 9. Note, Those that would discover the mystery of iniquity in others, or in themselves, must accomplish a diligent search; for Satan hath his wiles, and depths, and devices, which we should not be ignorant of, and "the heart is deceitful above all things;" in the examining of it therefore we are concerned to be very strict.

Secondly. What the discovery is. It is a very melancholy one.

1. He sees a chamber set round with idolatrous pictures; ver. 10, "All the idols of the house of Israel," which they had borrowed from the neighbour nations, were "pourtrayed upon the wall round about," even the vilest of them; the forms of creeping things which they worshipped, and beasts, even abominable ones, that are poisonous and venomous; at least they were abominable when they were worshipped. This was a sort of a pantheon, a collection of all the idols together, which they paid their devotions to. Though the second commandment, in the letter of it, forbids only graven images, yet painted ones are as bad, and as dangerous.

2. He sees this chamber filled with idolatrous worshippers, ver. 14. There were seventy men of the elders of Israel offering incense to these painted idols. Here was a great number of idolaters, strengthening one another's hands in this wickedness; though it was in a private chamber, and the meeting industriously concealed, yet here were seventy men engaged in it. I doubt these elders were many more than those in Babylon, that sat before the prophet in his house, ver. 1. They were seventy men, the number of the great Sanhedrim, or chief council of the nation, and, we have reason to fear, the same men; for they were the ancients of the house of Israel, not only in age, but in office, who were bound by the duty of their place to restrain and punish idolatry, and to destroy and abolish all superstitious images wherever they found them. Yet these were they that did themselves worship them in private; so undermining that religion which in public they professed to own and promote, only because by it they held their preferments. They had "every man his censer in his hand;" so fond were they of the idolatrous service, that they would all be their own priests. And very prodigal they were of their perfumes in honour of these images, for "a thick cloud of incense went up," that filled the room. O that the zeal of these idolaters might shame the worshippers of the true God out of their indifferency to his service! The prophet took particular notice of one that he knew, who stood in the midst of these idolaters, as chief among them: being, perhaps, president of the great council at this time, or most forward in this wickedness. No wonder the people were corrupt, when the elders were so. The sins of leaders are leading sins.

Thirdly. What the remark is that is made upon it; ver. 12, "Son of man, hast thou seen this?" Couldst thou have imagined that there was such wickedness committed? It is here observed concerning it, 1. That it was done in the dark, for sinful works are works of darkness. They concealed it, lest they should lose their places, or at least their credit. There is a great deal of secret wickedness in the world, which the day will declare; the "day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God." 2. That this one idolatrous chapel was but a specimen of many the like. Here they met together to worship their images in concert, but it should seem they had every man the chamber of his imagery besides, a room in his own house for this purpose, in which every man gratified his own fancy with such pictures as he liked best. Idolaters had their household gods, and their family worship of them in private; which is a shame to those who call themselves Christians, and yet have no church in their house, no worship of God in their family. Had they chambers of imagery, and shall not we have chambers of devotion? 3. That atheism was at the bottom of their idolatry. They worship images in the dark, the images of the gods of other nations; and they say, Jehovah, the God of Israel, whom we should serve, "seeth us not, Jehovah hath forsaken the earth," and we may worship what god we will, he regards us not. 1st. They think themselves out of God's sight; "They say, The Lord seeth us not." They imagined, because the matter was carried on so closely, that men could not discover it, nor did any of their neighbours suspect them to be idolaters, that therefore it was hid from the eye of God; as if there were any "darkness, or shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves." Note, A practical disbelief of God's omniscience is at the bottom of our treacherous departure from him. But the church argues right as to this very sin of idolatry; Ps. xliv. 20, "If we have forgotten the name of our God, and stretched forth our hand to a strange god, shall not God search this out?" No doubt he shall. 2nd. They think themselves out of God's care. "The Lord hath forsaken the earth," and looks not after the affairs of it, and then we had as good worship any other god as him. Or, he hath forsaken our land, and left it to be a prey to its enemies: and therefore it is time for us to look out for some other god, to whom to commit the protection of it; our one God cannot or will not deliver us, and therefore let us have many. This was a blasphemous reflection upon God, as if he had forsaken them first, else they would not have forsaken him. Note, Those are ripe indeed for ruin, who are arrived to such a pitch of impudence as to lay the blame of their sins upon God himself.

13 He said also unto me, Turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations that they do. 14 Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the LORD's house which was toward the north; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz. 15 Then said he unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations than these. 16 And he brought me into the inner court of the LORD's house, and, behold, at the door of the temple of the LORD, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs toward the temple of the LORD, and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east. 17 Then he said unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? Is it a light thing to the house of Judah that they commit the abominations which they commit here? for they have filled the land with violence, and have returned to provoke me to anger: and, lo, they put the branch to their nose. 18 Therefore will I also deal in fury: mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity: and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them.

Here we have,

First. More and greater abominations discovered to the prophet. He thought what he had seen was bad enough, and yet, ver. 13, "Turn thee again, and thou shalt see greater abominations," and greater still, ver. 15, as before, ver. 6. There are those who live in retirement, that do not think what wickedness there is in this world; and the more we converse with it, and the farther we go abroad into it, the more corrupt we see it. When we have seen that which is bad, we may have our wonder at it made to cease, by the discovery of that which upon some account or other is a great deal worse. We shall find it so in examining our own hearts, and searching into them; there is a world of iniquity in them, a great abundance, and variety of abominations; and when we have found out much amiss, still we shall find more; for the heart is desperately wicked, who can know it perfectly? Now the abominations here discovered were,

1. "Women weeping for Tammuz," ver. 14. An abominable thing indeed, that any should choose rather to serve an idol in tears than to serve the true God "with joyfulness and gladness of heart;" yet such absurdities as these are they guilty of who "follow after lying vanities," and "forsake their own mercies." Some think it was for Adonis, an idol among the Greeks; others for Osiris, an idol of the Egyptians, that they shed these tears. The image, they say, was made to weep, and then the worshippers wept with it. They bewailed the death of this Tammuz, and anon rejoiced in its returning to life again. These mourning women sat at the door of the gate of the Lord's house, and there shed their idolatrous tears, as it were in defiance of God, and the sacred rites of his worship; and some think, with their idolatry, prostrating themselves also to corporeal whoredom; for these two commonly went together, and they that dishonoured the Divine nature by the one were justly "given up to vile affections," and a reprobate sense, to dishonour the human nature, which nowhere ever sunk so far below itself as in these idolatrous rites.

2. Men worshipping the sun," ver. 16. And this was so much the greater an abomination, that it was practised "in the inner court of the Lord's house, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar;" there, where the most sacred rites of their holy religion used to be performed, was this abominable wickedness committed. Justly might God in jealousy say to those who thus affronted him at his own door, as the king to Haman, "Will he force the queen also before me in the house?" Here were about twenty-five men giving that honour to the sun which is due to God only. Some think they were the king and his princes. It should rather seem that they were priests, for this was the court of the priests, and the proper place to find them in. They that were intrusted with the true religion had it committed to their care, and were charged with the custody of it, they were the men that betrayed it. 1st. They "turned their backs towards the temple of the Lord," resolvedly forgetting it, and designedly slighting it, and putting contempt upon it. Note, When men turn their backs upon God's institutions, and despise them, it is no marvel if they wander endlessly after their own inventions. Impiety is the beginning of idolatry and all iniquity. 2nd. They turned "their faces towards the east, and worshipped the sun," the rising sun. This was an ancient instance of idolatry. It is mentioned in Job's time, Job xxxi. 26, and had been generally practised among the nations, some worshipping the sun under one name, and others under another. These priests finding it had antiquity, and general consent and usage on its side, (the two pleas which the papists use at this day, in defence of their superstitious rites, and particularly this of worshipping towards the east,) practised it in the court of the temple, thinking it an omission that it was not inserted in their ritual. See the folly of idolaters, in worshipping that as a god, and calling it Baal, 'a lord,' which God made to be a servant to the universe, (for so the sun is, and so his name Shemesh signifies, Deu. iv. 19;) and in adoring the borrowed light, and despising the Father of lights.

Secondly. The inference drawn from these discoveries; ver. 17, "Hast thou seen this, O son of man?" And couldst thou have thought ever to see such things done in the temple of the Lord? Now,

1. He appeals to the prophet himself concerning the heinousness of the crime. Can he think it is a "light thing to the house of Judah," who know and profess better things, and are dignified with so many privileges above other nations? Is it an excusable thing in them that have God's oracles and ordinances, "that they commit the abominations which they commit here?" Do not they deserve to suffer that thus sin? Should not such abominations as these make desolate? Dan. ix. 27.

2. He aggravates it from the fraud and oppression that were to be found in all parts of the nation; "They have filled the land with violence." It is not strange if they that wrong God thus make no conscience of wronging one another, and with all that is sacred trample likewise upon all that is just. And their wickedness in their conversations made even the worship they paid to their own God an abomination, Isa. i. 11, &c.: "They fill the land with violence," and then they return to the temple "to provoke me to anger" there; for even their sacrifices, instead of making an atonement, do but add to their guilt. They "return to provoke me;" that is, they repeat the provocation; do it, and do it again. And "lo, they put the branch to their nose," a proverbial expression, noting perhaps their scoffing at God, and having him in derision; they snuffed at his service, as men do when they put a branch to their nose. Or, it was some custom used by idolaters in honour of the idols they served. We read of garlands used in their idolatrous worship, Acts xiv. 13, out of which every zealot took a branch, which they smelled to as a nosegay. Dr. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Jno. xv. 6, gives another sense of this place: 'They put the branch to their wrath,' or to 'his wrath,' as the Masorites read it; that is, they are still bringing more fuel (such as the withered branches of the vine) to the fire of Divine wrath, which they have already kindled, as if that wrath did not burn hot enough already. Or, 'putting the branch to the nose,' may signify the giving of a very great affront and provocation either to God or man; they are an abusive generation of men.

3. He passeth sentence upon them, that they shall be utterly cut off. Therefore, because they are thus furiously bent upon sin, I will also deal in fury with them, ver. 18. They filled the land with their violence, and God will fill it with the violence of their enemies; and he will not lend a favourable ear to the suggestions either, 1st. Of his own pity; "Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity." Repentance shall be hid from his eyes. Or, 2nd. Of their prayers; "Though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them," for still their sins cry louder for vengeance than their prayers cry for mercy. God will now be as deaf to their prayers as their own idols were, on whom they cried aloud, but in vain, 1 Kin. xviii. 26. Time was when God was ready to have heard, even "before they cried," and to "answer while they were yet speaking;" but now "they shall seek me early, and not find me," Pr. i. 28. It is not the loud voice, but the upright heart, that God will regard.

CHAPTER IX.

The prophet had, in vision, seen the wickedness that was committed at Jerusalem, in the foregoing chapter, and we may be sure it was not represented to him worse than really it was. Now here follows, of course, a representation of their ruin approaching; for when sin goes before judgments come next. Here is, I. Preparation made of instruments that were to be employed in the destruction of the city, ver. 1, 2. II. The removal of the Shechinah from the cherubim to the threshold of the temple, ver. 3. III. Orders given to one of the persons employed, who is distinguished from the rest, for the marking of a remnant to be preserved from the common destruction, ver. 3, 4. IV. The warrant signed for the execution of those that were not marked, and the execution begun accordingly, ver. 5—7. V. The prophet's intercession for the mitigation of the sentence, and the denial of any mitigation, the decree being now gone forth, ver. 8—10. VI. The report made by him that was to mark the pious remnant of what he had done in that matter, ver. 11. And this shews an usual method of providence in the government of the world.

HE cried also in mine ears with a loud voice, saying, Cause them that have charge over the city to draw near, even every man with his destroying weapon in his hand. 2 And, behold, six men came from the way of the higher gate, which lieth toward the north, and every man a slaughter weapon in his hand; and one man among them was clothed with linen, with a writer's inkhorn by his side: and they went in, and stood beside the brasen altar. 3 And the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, whereupon he was, to the threshold of the house. And he called to the man clothed with linen, which had the writer's inkhorn by his side; 4 And the LORD said unto him, Go through the midst of the city, through the midst of Jerusalem, and set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and that cry for all the abominations that be done in the midst thereof.

In these verses we have,

First. The summons given to Jerusalem's destroyers to come forth and give their attendance. He that appeared to the prophet, ch. viii. 2, that had brought him to Jerusalem, and had shewed the wickedness that was done there, "he cried, Cause them that have charge over the city to draw near," ver. 1. Or, as it might better be read, and nearer the original, 'They that have charge over the city are drawing near.' He had said, ch. viii. 18, I will deal in fury; now, saith he to the prophet, thou shalt see who are to be employed as the instruments of my wrath. Appropinquaverunt visitationes civitatis,—'The visitations,' or 'visitors, of the city are at hand.' They would not know the day of their visitation in mercy, and now they are to be visited in wrath. Observe,

1. How the notice of this is given to the prophet. "He cried it in mine ear with a loud voice," which intimates the vehemency of him that spoke. When men are highly provoked, and threaten in anger, they speak loud. They that regard not the counsels God gives them in a still small voice shall be made to hear the threatenings, to hear and tremble. It notes also the prophet's unwillingness to be told this; he was deaf on that ear, but there is no remedy, their sin will not admit an excuse, and therefore their judgment will not admit a delay. "He cried in mine ears with a loud voice," he made me hear it, and I heard it with a sad heart.

2. What this notice is. There are those that "have charge over the city" to destroy it; not the Chaldean armies,—they are to be indeed employed in this work, but they are not the visitors, they are only the servants, or tools rather. God's angels have received a charge now to lay that city waste which they had long had a charge to protect and watch over. They are at hand as destroying angels, as ministers of wrath; for "every man hath his destroying weapon in his hand," as the angel that kept the way of the tree of life with a flaming sword. Note, Those that have by sin made God their enemy have made the good angels their enemies too. These visitors are called, and caused to draw near. Note, God has ministers of wrath always within call, always at command; invisible powers, by whom he accomplisheth his purposes. The prophet is made to see this in vision, that he might with the greater assurance in his preaching denounce these judgments. God told it him with a loud voice, "taught it him with a strong hand," Isa. viii. 11, that it might make the deeper impression upon him, and that he might thus proclaim it in the people's ears.

Secondly. Their appearance upon these summons is recorded. Presently "six men came," ver. 2, one for each of the principal gates of Jerusalem. Two destroying angels were sent against Sodom, but six against Jerusalem; for Jerusalem's doom in the judgment will be thrice as heavy as that of Sodom. There is an angel watching at every gate to destroy, to bring in judgments from every quarter, and to take heed that none escape. One angel served to destroy the firstborn of Egypt, and the camp of the Assyrians; but here are six. In the Revelation we find seven that were to pour out the vials of God's wrath, Rev. xv. 6. They came with every one a slaughter weapon in his hand, prepared for the work to which they were called. The nations of which the king of Babylon's army was composed, which some reckon to be six, and the commanders of his army, of whom six are named as principal, Jer. xxxix. 3, may be called the slaughter weapons in the hands of the angels. The angels are thoroughly furnished for every service. Observe,

1. From whence they came. "From the way of the higher gate, which lieth toward the north," ver. 2, either because the Chaldeans came from the north; (Jer. i. 14, "Out of the north an evil shall break forth,") or because the image of jealousy was set up "at the door of the inner gate that looks towards the north," ch. viii. 3, 5. At that gate of the temple the destroying angels entered, to shew what it was that opened the door to them. Note, That way that sin lies judgments may be expected to come.

2. Observe where they placed themselves. "They went in and stood beside the brazen altar," on which sacrifices were wont to be offered, and atonement made. When they acted as destroyers, they acted as sacrificers, not from any personal revenge or ill-will, but with a pure and sincere regard to the glory of God; for to his justice all they slew were offered up as victims. They "stood by the altar," as it were to protect and vindicate that, and plead its righteous cause, and avenge the horrid profanation of it. At the altar they were to receive their commission to destroy, to intimate that the iniquity of Jerusalem, like that of Eli's house, was "not to be purged by sacrifice."

Thirdly. The notice taken of one among the destroying angels, distinguished in his habit from the rest, from whom some favour might be expected. It should seem he was not one of the six, but "among them," to see that mercy be mixed with judgment, ver. 2. This man was "clothed with linen," as the priests were, and he had a writer's inkhorn hanging at his side, as anciently attorneys and lawyers' clerks had, which he was to make use of, as the other six were to make use of their destroying weapons. Here the honours of the pen exceeded those of the sword; they were angels that bore the sword, but he was the Lord of angels that made use of the writer's inkhorn; for it is generally agreed among the best interpreters that this man represented Christ as Mediator, saving those that are his from the flaming sword of Divine justice. He is our high priest clothed with holiness; for that was signified by the fine linen, Rev. xix. 8. As prophet he wears the writer's inkhorn; the Book of Life is the Lamb's book. The great things of the law and Gospel which God has written to us are of his writing; for it is the Spirit of Christ in the writers of the Scripture that testifies to us, and the Bible is the revelation of Jesus Christ. Note, It is matter of great comfort to all good Christians, that in the midst of the destroyers and the destructions that are abroad there is a Mediator, a great High Priest, who has an interest in heaven and whom saints on earth have an interest in.

Fourthly. The removal of the appearance of the Divine glory from over the cherubim. Some think this was that usual display of the Divine glory which was between the cherubim over the mercy-seat, in the most holy place, that took leave of them now, and never returned; for it is supposed it was not in the second temple. Others think it was that display of the Divine glory which the prophet now saw over the cherub in vision; and this is more probable, because this is called the glory of the God of Israel, ch. viii. 4; and this is it which he had now his eye upon. This was gone to the threshold of the house, as it were to call to the servants that attended without the door to send them on their errand and give them their instructions. And the removal of this as well as the former might be significant of God's departure from them, and leaving them their house desolate. And when God goes all good goes; but he goes from none till they first drive him from them. He went at first no farther than the threshold, that he might shew how loath he was to depart, and might give them both time and encouragement to invite his return to them, and his stay with them. Note, God's departures from a people are gradual; but gracious souls are soon aware of the first step he takes towards a remove. Ezekiel presently observed that "the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub;" and what is a vision of angels if God be gone?

Fifthly. The charge given to the man clothed in linen to secure the pious remnant from the general desolation. We do not read that this Saviour was summoned and sent for, as the destroyers were; for he is always ready, appearing in the presence of God for us; and to him, as the most proper person, the care of those that are marked for salvation is committed, ver. 4. Now observe,

1. The distinguishing character of this remnant that is to be saved. "They are such as sigh and cry;" sigh in themselves as men in pain and distress, cry to God in prayer, as men in earnest, "because of all the abominations that are committed in Jerusalem." It was not only the idolatries they were guilty of, but all their other enormities that were abominations to God. These pious few had witnessed against those abominations, and had done what they could in their places to suppress them; but, finding all their attempts for the reformation of manners fruitless, they sat down and sighed and cried, wept in secret, and complained to God because of the dishonour done to his name by their wickedness, and the ruin it was bringing upon their church and nation. Note, It is not enough that we do not delight in the sins of others, and that we have not fellowship with them, but we must mourn for them, and lay them to heart; must grieve for that which we cannot help, as those that hate sin for its own sake, and have a tender concern for the souls of others; as David, Ps. cxix. 136, and Lot, who vexed his righteous soul with the wicked conversation of his neighbours. The abominations committed in Jerusalem are to be in a special manner lamented, because they are in a particular manner offensive to God.

2. The distinguishing care taken of them. Orders are given to find them all out that are of such a pious, public spirit; "Go through the midst of the city" in quest of them; and, though they are never so much dispersed, and never so closely hid from the fury of their persecutors, yet see that you discover them, and "set a mark upon their foreheads." 1st. To signify that God owns them for his, and he will confess them another day. A work of grace in the soul is to God "a mark upon the forehead," which he will acknowledge as his mark, and by which he knows them that are his. 2nd. To give to them who are thus marked an assurance of God's favour, that they may know it themselves; and the comfort of knowing it will be the most powerful support and cordial in calamitous times. What need we perplex ourselves about this temporal life, if we know by the mark that we have eternal life? 3rd. To be a direction to the destroyers whom to pass by; as the blood upon the door-posts was an indication that that was an Israelite's house, and the firstborn there must not be slain. Note, Those who keep themselves pure in times of common iniquity, God will keep them safe in times of common calamity. They that distinguish themselves shall be distinguished; that cry for other men's sins shall not need to cry for their own afflictions; for they shall be either delivered from them or comforted under them. God will set a mark upon his mourners; will book their sighs, and bottle their tears. The "sealing of the servants of God in their foreheads," Rev. vii. 3, was the same token of the care God has of his own people with this here; only this was to secure them from being destroyed, that from being seduced, which is equivalent.

5 And to the others he said in mine hearing, Go ye after him through the city, and smite: let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity: 6 Slay utterly old and young, both maids, and little children, and women: but come not near any man upon whom is the mark; and begin at my sanctuary. Then they began at the ancient men which were before the house. 7 And he said unto them, Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain: go ye forth. And they went forth, and slew in the city. 8 And it came to pass, while they were slaying them, and I was left, that I fell upon my face, and cried, and said, Ah Lord GOD! wilt thou destroy all the residue of Israel in thy pouring out of thy fury upon Jerusalem? 9 Then said he unto me, The iniquity of the house of Israel and Judah is exceeding great, and the land is full of blood, and the city full of perverseness: for they say, The LORD hath forsaken the earth, and the LORD seeth not. 10 And as for me also, mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity, but I will recompense their way upon their head. 11 And, behold, the man clothed with linen, which had the inkhorn by his side, reported the matter, saying, I have done as thou hast commanded me.

In these verses we have,

First. A command given to the destroyers to do execution according to their commission. They "stood by the brazen altar" waiting for orders, and orders are here given them to cut off and destroy all that were either guilty of, or accessary to, the abominations of Jerusalem, and that did not sigh and cry for them. Note, When God has gathered his wheat into his garner, nothing remains but to burn up the chaff, Mat. iii. 12.

1. They are ordered to destroy all, 1st. Without exception. They must "go through the city and smite;" they must slay utterly, slay to destruction, give them their death's wound, they must make no distinction of age or sex, but cut off old and young; neither the beauty of the virgins nor the innocency of the babes shall secure them. This was fulfilled in the death of multitudes by famine and pestilence, especially by the sword of the Chaldeans, as far as the military execution went. Sometimes even such bloody work as this has been God's work. But what an evil thing is sin then, which provokes the God of infinite mercy to such severity! 2nd. Without compassion. "Let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity," ver. 5; you must not save any whom God has doomed to destruction, as Saul did Agag and the Amalekites; that is doing the work of God deceitfully, Jer. xlviii. 10. None needs to be more merciful than God is, and he had said, ch. viii. 18, "Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity." Note, Those that live in sin, and hate to be reformed, will perish in sin, and deserve not to be pitied; for they might easily have prevented the ruin, and would not.

2. They are warned not to do the least hurt to them that were marked for salvation. "Come not near any man upon whom is the mark;" do not so much as threaten or frighten any of them. It is promised them that there shall no evil come nigh them, and therefore you must keep at a distance from them. The king of Babylon gave particular orders that Jeremiah should be protected; Baruch and Ebed-melech were secured, and it is likely others of Jeremiah's friends for his sake. God had promised that it should "go well with his remnant," and they should be well treated, Jer. xv. 11. And we have reason to think none of the mourning, praying remnant fell by the sword of the Chaldeans, but God found out some way or other to secure them all; as in the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, the Christians were all secured in a city called Pella, and none of them perished with the unbelieving Jews. Note, None of those shall be lost whom God has marked for life and salvation, for the foundation of God stands sure.

3. They are directed to "begin at the sanctuary," ver. 6; that sanctuary which in the chapter before he had seen the horrid profanation of. They must begin there, because there the wickedness began which provoked God to send these judgments. The debaucheries of the priests were the poisoning of the springs, to which all the corruption of the streams was owing. The wickedness of the sanctuary was of all other most offensive to God, and therefore there the slaughter must begin. Begin there, to try if the people will take warning by the judgments of God upon their priests, and will repent and reform. Begin there, that all the world may see and know that the Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God, and hates sin most in those that are nearest to him. Note, When judgments are abroad they commonly begin at the house of God, 1 Pet. ii. 17. "You only have I known, and therefore I will punish you." Am. iii. 2. God's temple is a sanctuary, a refuge and protection for penitent sinners; but not for any that "go on still in their trespasses;" neither the sacredness of the place nor the eminency of their place in it will be their security.

It should seem the destroyers made some difficulty of putting men to death in the temple; but God bids them not boggle at that, but, ver. 7, "Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain." They will not be "taken from the altar," as was appointed by the law, Ex. xxi. 14, but think to secure themselves by keeping hold of the horns of it, like Joab; and therefore, like him, let them die there, 1 Kin. ii. 30, 31. There the blood of one of God's prophets had been shed, Mat. xxiii. 35, and therefore there let their blood be shed. Note, If the servants of God's house defile it with their idolatries, God will justly suffer the enemies of it to defile it with their violences, Ps. lxxix. 1. But these acts of necessary justice were really, whatever they were ceremonially, rather a purification than a pollution of the sanctuary; it was putting away evil from among them.

4. They are appointed to go forth into the city, ver. 6, 7. Note, Wherever sin has gone before, judgment will follow after; and though judgment begins at the house of God, yet it shall not end there. The holy city shall be no more a protection to the wicked people than the holy house was to the wicked priests.

Secondly. Here is execution done accordingly. They observed their orders, and, 1. They began at the elders, "the ancient men that were before the house," and slew them first; either those seventy ancients that worshipped idols in their chambers, ch. viii. 12, or those twenty-five that worshipped the sun "between the porch and the altar," who might more properly be said to be before the house. Note, Ringleaders in sin may expect to be first met with by the judgments of God; and the sins of those who are in the most eminent and public stations call for the most exemplary punishments. 2. They proceeded to the common people; they "went forth and slew in the city," for when the decree is gone forth there shall be no delay. If God begin, he will make an end.

Thirdly. Here is the prophet's intercession for a mitigation of the judgment, and a reprieve for some; ver. 8, "While they were slaying them, and I was left, I fell upon my face." Observe here,

1. How sensible the prophet was of God's mercy to him, in that he was spared when so many round about him were cut off. Thousands fell on his right hand and on his left, and yet the destruction did not "come nigh him, only with his eyes did he behold the just reward of the wicked," Ps. xci. 7, 8. He speaks as one that narrowly escaped the destruction, attributing it to God's goodness, not his own deserts. Note, The best saints must acknowledge themselves indebted to sparing mercy that they are not consumed. And when desolating judgments are abroad, and multitudes fall by them, it ought to be accounted a great favour if we have our "lives given us for a prey," for we might justly have perished with them that perish.

2. Observe how he improved this mercy. He looked upon it that therefore he was left that he might stand in the gap to turn away the wrath of God. Note, We must look upon it that for this reason we are spared, that we may do good in our places, may do good by our prayers. Ezekiel did not triumph in the slaughter made, but "his flesh trembled for fear of God," as David's, Ps. cxix. 120, "He fell on his face and cried," not in fear for himself, he was one of them that were marked, but in compassion to his fellow-creatures. They that sigh and cry for the sins of sinners cannot but sigh and cry for their miseries too; yet the day is coming when all this concern will be entirely swallowed up in a full satisfaction in this, that God is glorified; and they that now fall on their faces, and cry, "Ah, Lord God," will lift up their heads and sing Hallelujah, Rev. xix. 1, 3. The prophet humbly expostulates with God, "Wilt thou destroy all the residue of Israel," and shall there be none left but the few that are marked? Shall the Israel of God be destroyed, utterly destroyed? When there are but a few left shall those few be cut off who might have been the seed of another generation? And will the God of Israel be himself their destroyer? Wilt thou now destroy Israel, who wast wont to protect and deliver Israel? Wilt thou so "pour out thy fury upon Jerusalem," as by the total destruction of the city to ruin the whole country too? surely thou wilt not. Note, Though we acknowledge that God is righteous, yet we have leave to "plead with him concerning his judgments," Jer. xii. 1.

Fourthly. Here is God's denial of the prophet's request for a mitigation of the judgment, and his justification of himself in that denial, ver. 9, 10.

1. Nothing could be said in extenuation of this sin. God was as willing to shew mercy as the prophet could desire; he always is so, but here the case will not admit it. It is such as that mercy cannot be granted without wrong to justice; and it is not fit that one attribute of God should be glorified at the expense of another. Is it any pleasure to the Almighty that he should destroy, especially that he should destroy Israel? By no means; but the truth is, their crimes are so flagrant that the reprieve of the sinners would be a connivance at the sin. "The iniquity of the house of Judah and Israel is exceeding great," there is no suffering them to go on at this rate; "the land is filled with" innocent "blood," and when the city courts are appealed to for the defence of injured innocency, the remedy is as bad as the disease, for the city is full of perverseness, or wresting of judgment; and that which they support themselves with in this iniquity is the same atheistical, profane principle with which they flattered themselves in their idolatry; ch. viii. 12, "The Lord hath forsaken the earth," and left it to us to do what we will in it; he will not intermeddle in the affairs of it, and whatever wrong we do he sees not, either knows it not or will not take cognizance of it. Now, how can these expect benefit by the mercy of God, who thus bid defiance to his justice? No, nothing can be offered by an advocate in excuse for the crimes while the criminal puts in such a plea as this in his own vindication; and therefore,

2. Nothing can be done to mitigate the sentence, ver. 10. Whatever thou thinkest of it, as for me, "mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity." I have borne with them as long as it was fit such impudent sinners should be borne with, and therefore now "I will recompense their way on their head." Note, Sinners sink and perish under the weight of their own sins. It is their own way, which they deliberately chose rather than the way of God, and which they obstinately persisted in, in contempt of the word of God, that is recompensed on them. And great iniquities justify God in great severities; nay, he is ready to justify himself as he doth here to the prophet, for he will be clear when he judgeth.

Fifthly. Here is a return made of the writ of protection, which was issued out for the securing of them that mourned in Zion; ver. 11, "The man clothed with linen reported the matter," gave an account of what he had done in pursuance of his commission. He had found out all that mourned in secret for the sins of the land, and cried out against them by a public testimony, and had marked them all in the forehead: Lord, "I have done as thou hast commanded me." We do not find that those who were commissioned to destroy reported what destruction they had made; but he who was appointed to protect reported his matter, for it would be more pleasing both to God and to the prophet to hear of those that were saved than of those that perished. Or, this report was made now because the thing was finished, whereas the destroying work would be a work of time, and when it was brought to an end then the report should be made. See how faithful Christ is to the trust reposed in him. Is he commanded to secure eternal life to the chosen remnant? He has done as was commanded him: "Of all that thou hast given me I have lost none."

CHAPTER X.

The prophet had observed to us, ch. viii. 5, that when he was in vision at Jerusalem he saw the same appearance of the glory of God there that he had seen by the river Chebar. Now in this chapter he gives us some account of the appearance there, as far as was requisite for the clearing up of two farther indications of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, which God here gave the prophet. I. The scattering of the coals of fire upon the city, which were taken from between the cherubims, ver. 1—7. II. The removal of the glory of God from the temple, and its being upon the wing to be gone, ver. 8—22. When God goes out from a people all judgments break in upon them.

THEN I looked, and, behold, in the firmament that was above the head of the cherubims there appeared over them as it were a sapphire stone, as the appearance of the likeness of a throne. 2 And he spake unto the man clothed with linen, and said, Go in between the wheels, even under the cherub, and fill thine hand with coals of fire from between the cherubims, and scatter them over the city. And he went in in my sight. 3 Now the cherubims stood on the right side of the house, when the man went in; and the cloud filled the inner court. 4 Then the glory of the LORD went up from the cherub, and stood over the threshold of the house; and the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the LORD's glory. 5 And the sound of the cherubims' wings was heard even to the outer court, as the voice of the Almighty God when he speaketh. 6 And it came to pass, that when he had commanded the man clothed with linen, saying, Take fire from between the wheels, from between the cherubims; then he went in, and stood beside the wheels. 7 And one cherub stretched forth his hand from between the cherubims unto the fire that was between the cherubims, and took thereof, and put it into the hands of him that was clothed with linen: who took it, and went out.

To possess us with a holy awe and dread of God, and to fill us with his fear, we may observe in this part of the vision which the prophet had,

First. The glorious appearance of his majesty. Something of the invisible world is here made visible; some faint representations of its brightness and beauty, some shadows, but such as are no more to be compared with the truth and substance than a picture with the life; yet here is enough to oblige us all to the utmost reverence in our thoughts of God, and approaches to him, if we will but admit the impressions this discovery of him will make.

1. He is here "in the firmament above the head of the cherubims," ver. 1. He manifests his glory in the upper world, where purity and brightness are both in perfection; and the vast expanse of the firmament aims to speak the God that dwells there infinite. It is the firmament of his power, and of his prospect too, for from thence he beholds all the children of men. The Divine nature infinitely transcends the angelical nature, and God is "above the head of the cherubims," in respect not only of his dignity above them, but his dominion over them. Cherubims have great power, and wisdom, and influence, but they are all subject to God and Christ.

2. He is here upon the throne; or, that which had "the appearance of the likeness of a throne," (for God's glory and government infinitely transcends all the brightest ideas our minds can either form or receive concerning them,) and it was "as it were a sapphire-stone," pure and sparkling; such a throne hath God prepared in the heavens, far exceeding the thrones of any earthly potentates.

3. He is here attended with a glorious train of holy angels. When God came into his temple, the "cherubims stood on the right side of the house," ver. 3, as the prince's lifeguard attending the gate of his palace. Christ has angels at command: the orders given to all the angels of God are to worship him. Some observe that they "stood on the right side of the house," that is, the south side, because on the north side the image of jealousy was, and other instances of idolatry, from which they would place themselves at as great a distance as might be.

4. The appearance of his glory is veiled with a cloud, and yet out of that cloud darts forth a dazzling lustre. In the house and inner court there was a cloud and darkness which filled them; and yet either the outer court or the same court, after some time was "full of the brightness of the Lord's glory," ver. 3, 4. There was a darting forth of light and brightness; but if any over-curious eye pried into it, it would find itself lost in a cloud. His righteousness is conspicuous as the great mountains, and the brightness of it fills the court; but his judgments are a great deep which we cannot fathom, a cloud which we cannot see through. The brightness discovers enough to awe and direct our consciences, but the cloud forbids us to expect the gratifying of our curiosity; for we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness. Thus, Hab. iii. 4, "He had beams coming out of his hand, and" yet "there was the hiding of his power." Nothing more clear than that God is, nothing more dark than what he is; God covers himself with light, and yet as to us makes darkness his pavilion. God took possession of the tabernacle and temple in a cloud, which was always the symbol of his presence. In the temple above there will be no cloud, but we shall see face to face.

5. The cherubims made a dreadful sound with their wings, ver. 5. The vibration of them, as of the strings of musical instruments, made a curious melody. Bees, and other winged insects, make a noise with their wings. Probably this intimated their preparing to remove, by stretching forth, and lifting up their wings, which made this noise as it were to give warning of it. This noise is said to be "as the voice of the Almighty God when he speaks;" that is, as the thunder, which is called "the voice of the Lord," Ps. xxix. 3. Or, as the voice of the Lord when he spake to Israel on mount Sinai; and, therefore, he then gave the law with abundance of terror, to signify with what terror he would reckon for the violation of it, which he was now about to do. This noise of their wings was heard even "to the outer court," the court of the people; for the Lord's voice in his judgments cries in the city, which those may hear that do not, as Ezekiel, see the visions of them.

Secondly. The terrible directions of his wrath. This vision has a farther tendency than merely to set forth the Divine grandeur; farther orders are to be given for the destruction of Jerusalem. The greatest devastations are made by fire and sword. For a general slaughter of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, orders were given in the foregoing chapter; now here we have a command to lay the city in ashes, by scattering coals of fire upon it, which in the vision were fetched from between the cherubims.

1. For the issuing out of orders to do this, "the glory of the Lord was lifted up from the cherub," (as in the chapter before, for the giving of orders there, ver. 3,) and "stood upon the threshold of the house in imitation of the courts of judgment, which they kept in the gates of their cities. The people would not hear the oracles which God delivered to them from his holy temple, and therefore from thence they shall be made to hear their doom.

2. The man clothed in linen, who had marked those that were to be preserved, is to be employed in this service; for the same Jesus that is the Protector and Saviour of them who believe, having "all judgment committed to him," that of condemnation as well as that of absolution, will come in flaming fire to take vengeance on those that obey not his Gospel. He that sits on the throne, calls to the man clothed in linen to "go in between the wheels, and fill his hand with coals of fire from between the cherubims, and scatter them over the city." This intimates, 1st. That the burning of the city and temple by the Chaldeans was a consumption determined; and therein they executed God's counsel. They did what he designed before should be done. 2nd. That the fire of Divine wrath, which kindles judgment upon a people, is just and holy; for it is fire fetched "from between the cherubims." The fire on God's altar, where atonement was made, had been slighted; to avenge which, fire is here fetched from heaven, like that by which Nadab and Abihu were killed for offering strange fire. If a city, or town, or house be burned, whether by design or accident, if we trace it in its original, we shall find the coals that kindled the fire came from between the wheels; for there is not any evil of that kind in the city but the Lord has done it. 3rd. That Jesus Christ acts by commission from the Father, for from him he "receives authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man." Christ came to "send fire on the earth," Lu. xii. 49; and in the great day will speak this world into ashes. By fire from his hand, the earth and all the works that are therein will be burnt up.

3. This man clothed with linen readily attended to this service. Though being clothed with linen he was very unfit to go among the burning coals, yet being called, he said, "Lo, I come." This commandment he had received of his Father, and he complied with it. The prophet saw him go in; ver. 2, "He went in and stood beside the wheels;" expecting to be furnished there with the coals he was to scatter, for what Christ was to give he first received, whether for mercy or judgment. He was directed to take fire, but he stayed till he had it given to him, to shew how slow he is to execute judgment, and how long-suffering to usward.

4. One of the cherubims reached him a handful of fire from the midst of the living creatures. The prophet, when he first saw this vision, observed that there were "burning coals of fire," and "lamps that went up and down among the living creatures," ch. i. 13; from thence this fire was taken, ver. 7. The spirit of burning, the refiner's fire, by which Christ purifies his church, is of a Divine original. It is by a celestial fire, fire from between the cherubims, that wonders are wrought. The cherubim "put it into his hand," for the angels are ready to be employed by the Lord Jesus, and to serve all his purposes.

5. When he had taken the fire he went out, no doubt to scatter it up and down upon the city, as he was directed. "And who can abide the day of his coming?" Who can stand before him when he goes out in anger?

8 And there appeared in the cherubims the form of a man's hand under their wings. 9 And when I looked, behold the four wheels by the cherubims, one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub: and the appearance of the wheels was as the colour of a beryl stone. 10 And as for their appearances, they four had one likeness, as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel. 11 When they went, they went upon their four sides; they turned not as they went, but to the place whither the head looked they followed it; they turned not as they went. 12 And their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels, were full of eyes round about, even the wheels that they four had. 13 As for the weeels, it was cried unto them in my hearing, O wheel. 14 And every one had four faces: the first face was the face of a cherub, and the second face was the face of a man, and the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle. 15 And the cherubims were lifted up. This is the living creature that I saw by the river of Chebar. 16 And when the cherubims went, the wheels went by them: and when the cherubims lifted up their wings to mount up from the earth, the same wheels also turned not from beside them. 17 When they stood, these stood; and when they were lifted up, these lifted up themselves also: for the spirit of the living creature was in them. 18 Then the glory of the LORD departed from off the threshold of the house, and stood over the cherubims. 19 And the cherubims lifted up their wings, and mounted up from the earth in my sight: when they went out, the wheels also were beside them, and every one stood at the door of the east gate of the LORD's house; and the glory of the God of Israel was over them above. 20 This is the living creature that I saw under the God of Israel by the river of Chebar; and I knew that they were the cherubims. 21 Every one had four faces apiece, and every one four wings; and the likeness of the hands of a man was under their wings. 22 And the likeness of their faces was the same faces which I saw by the river of Chebar, their appearances and themselves: they went every one straight forward.

We have here a farther account of the vision of God's glory which Ezekiel saw, here intended to introduce that direful omen of the departure of that glory from them which would open the door for ruin to break in.

First. Ezekiel sees the glory of God shining in the sanctuary, so as he had seen it by the river of Chebar; and gives an account of it, that they who had by their wickedness provoked God to depart from them might know what they had lost, and might lament after the Lord, groaning out their Ichabod, "Where is the glory?" Ezekiel here sees the operations of Divine providence in the government of the lower world, and the affairs of it, represented by the four wheels; and the perfections of the holy angels, the inhabitants of the upper world; and their ministrations, represented by the four living creatures, every one of which had four faces. The agency of the angels in directing the affairs of this world is represented by the close communication that was between the living creatures and the wheels; the wheels being guided by them in all their motions, as the chariot is by him that drives it, but the same spirit being both in the living creatures and in the wheels, speaks that Infinite Wisdom which serves its own purposes by the ministration of angels, and all the occurrences of this lower world. So that this vision gives our faith a view of that throne which the Lord has prepared in the heavens, and that kingdom of his which ruleth over all, Ps. ciii. 19. The prophet observes that this was the same vision with that he saw by the river of Chebar, ver. 15, 22; and yet in one thing there seems to be a material difference, that that which was there the face of an ox, and was on the left side, ch. i. 10, is here the face of a cherub, and is the first face, ver. 14; whence some have concluded, that the peculiar face of a cherub was that of an ox, which the Israelites had an eye to when they made the golden calf. I rather think that in this latter vision the first face was the proper appearance or figure of a cherub, which Ezekiel knew very well, being a priest, by what he had seen in the temple of the Lord, 1 Kin. vi. 29; but which we now have no certainty of at all; and by this Ezekiel knew assuredly, whereas before he only conjectured it, that they were all cherubims, though putting on different faces, ver. 20. And this first appearing in the proper figure of a cherub, and yet it being needful to retain the number of four, that of the ox is left out and dropped, because that face of the cherubim had been most abused by the worship of an ox. As sometimes when God appeared to deliver his people, so now, when he appeared to depart from them, "he rode upon a cherub, and did fly." Now observe here,

1. That this world is subject to turns and changes, and various revolutions. The course of affairs in it is represented by wheels, ver. 9; sometimes one spoke is uppermost, and sometimes another; they are still ebbing and flowing like the sea, waxing and waning like the moon, 1 Sam. ii. 4, &c. Nay, their appearance is as if there were "a wheel in the midst of a wheel," ver. 10; which intimates the mutual references of providences to each other, and their dependencies on each other; and the joint tendency of all to one common end, while their motions as to us are intricate and perplexed, and seemingly contrary.

2. That there is an admirable harmony and uniformity in the various occurrences of providence, ver. 13. As for the wheels, though they moved several ways, yet it was cried to them, "O wheel;" they were all as one, being guided by one Spirit to one end, for God works all according to the counsel of his own will, which is one; for his own glory, which is one. And this makes the disposals of providence truly admirable, and to be looked upon with wonder. As the works of his creation considered separately were good, but all together very good, so the wheels of providence considered by themselves are wonderful, but put them together and they are very wonderful: "O wheel."

3. That the motions of providence are steady and regular, and whatever the Lord pleaseth that he doth, and is never put upon new counsels. "The wheels turned not as they went," ver. 11; and the living creatures "went every one straight forward," ver. 22. Whatever difficulties lay in their way, they were sure to get over them, and were never obliged to stand still, turn aside, or go back. So perfectly known to God are all his works, that he is never put upon new counsels.

4. That God makes more use of the ministration of angels in the government of this lower world than we are aware of. "The four wheels were by the cherubims, one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub," ver. 9. What has been imagined by some concerning the spheres above, that every orb has its intelligence to guide it, is here intimated concerning the wheels below, that every wheel has its cherub to guide it. We think it a satisfaction to us, if under the wise God there are wise men employed in managing the affairs of kingdoms and churches; whether there be so or no, it appears by this, there are wise angels employed, "a cherub to every wheel."

5. That all the motions of providence, and all the ministrations of angels, are under the government of the great God. They were all full of eyes; those eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the earth, and which the angels have always an eye to, ver. 12. The living creatures and the wheels concur in their motions and rests, ver. 17; for the Spirit of life, as it may be read, or, the spirit of the living creatures, is in the wheels. The Spirit of God directs all the creatures, both upper and lower, so as to make them serve the Divine purpose. Events are not determined by the wheel of fortune, which is blind, but by the wheels of providence, which are full of eyes.

Secondly. Ezekiel sees the glory of God removing out of the sanctuary, the place where God's honour had long dwelt; and this sight is as sad as the other was grateful. It was pleasant to see that God had not forsaken the earth, as the idolaters suggested, ch. ix. 9; but sad to see that he was forsaking his sanctuary. The glory of the Lord "stood over the threshold," ver. 4. But now it departed from off the threshold, having thence given the necessary orders for the destruction of the city, and it stood over the cherubims; not those in the most holy place, but those that Ezekiel now saw in vision, ver. 18. It ascended that stately chariot, as the judge, when he comes off the bench, goes into his coach and is gone. And immediately "the cherubims lift up their wings," (ver. 19,) as they were directed; and they "mounted up from the earth," as birds upon the wing. And when they went out, the wheels of this chariot were not drawn, but went by instinct beside them, by which it appeared that the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels. Thus, when God is leaving a people in displeasure, angels above and all events here below shall concur to further his departure. But observe here, in the courts of the temple where the people of Israel had dishonoured their God, had cast off his yoke, and withdrawn the shoulder from it, blessed angels appear very ready to serve him, to draw in his chariot, and to mount upwards with it. God had shewn the prophet how the will of God was disobeyed by men on earth, ch. viii.; here he shews him how readily it is obeyed by angels and inferior creatures. And it is a comfort to us, when we grieve for the wickedness of the wicked, to think how his angels "do his commandments, hearkening to the voice of his word," Ps. ciii. 20.

Let us now, 1. Take a view of this chariot, in which the glory of the God of Israel rides triumphantly. He that is the God of Israel is the God of heaven and earth, and has the command of all the powers of both. Let the faithful Israelites comfort themselves with this, that he that is their God is above the cherubims, (their Redeemer is so, 1 Pet. iii. 22,) and has the sole and sovereign disposal of all events; the living creatures and the wheels agree to serve him, so that he is "head over all things to the church." The rabbins call this vision that Ezekiel had, Mercabah,—'the vision of the chariot;' and from thence they call the more abstruse part of divinity, which treats concerning God and spirits, Opus currus,—'the work of the chariot,' as they do the other part that is more plain and familiar, Opus bereshith,—'the work of the creation.' 2. Let us attend the motion of this chariot. The cherubim, and the glory of God above them, "stood at the door of the east gate of the Lord's house," ready to depart and leave the house, ver. 19. But observe with how many stops and pauses God departs, as loath to go, and seeing if there be any that will intercede with him to return. None of the priests in the inner court, between the temple and the altar, would court his stay; therefore he leaves their court, and stands at the east gate, which led into the court of the people, to see if any of them would yet at length stand in the gap. Note, God removes by degrees from a provoking people; and, when he is ready to depart, would return to them if they were but a repenting, praying people.

CHAPTER XI.

This chapter concludes the vision which Ezekiel saw, and this part of it furnisheth him with two messages: I. A message of wrath against those who continued still at Jerusalem, and were there in the height of presumption, thinking they should never fall, ver. 1—13. II. A message of comfort to those who were carried captives into Babylon, and were there in the depth of despondency, thinking they should never rise. And, as the former are assured that God has judgments in store for them notwithstanding their present security, so the latter are assured that God has mercy in store for them notwithstanding their present distress, ver. 14—21. And so the glory of God removes farther, ver. 22, 23; the vision disappears, ver. 24; and Ezekiel faithfully gives his hearers an account of it, ver. 25.

MOREOVER the spirit lifted me up, and brought me unto the east gate of the LORD's house, which looketh eastward: and behold at the door of the gate five and twenty men; among whom I saw Jaazaniah the son of Azur, and Pelatiah the son of Benaiah, princes of the people. 2 Then said he unto me, Son of man, these are the men that devise mischief, and give wicked counsel in this city: 3 Which say, It is not near; let us build houses: this city is the caldron, and we be the flesh. 4 Therefore prophesy against them, prophesy, O son of man. 5 And the Spirit of the LORD fell upon me, and said unto me, Speak;

Thus saith the LORD;
Thus have ye said, O house of Israel:
For I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them.
6 Ye have multiplied your slain in this city,
And ye have filled the streets thereof with the slain.
7 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Your slain whom ye have laid in the midst of it,
They are the flesh, and this city is the caldron:
But I will bring you forth out of the midst of it.
8 Ye have feared the sword;
And I will bring a sword upon you, saith the Lord GOD.
9 And I will bring you out of the midst thereof,
And deliver you into the hands of strangers,
And will execute judgments among you.
10 Ye shall fall by the sword;
I will judge you in the border of Israel;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
11 This city shall not be your caldron,
Neither shall ye be the flesh in the midst thereof;
But I will judge you in the border of Israel:
12 And ye shall know that I am the LORD:
For ye have not walked in my statutes,
Neither executed my judgments,
But have done after the manners of the heathen that are round about you.

13 And it came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah died. Then fell I down upon my face, and cried with a loud voice, and said, Ah Lord GOD! wilt thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel?

We have here,

First. The great security of the princes at Jerusalem, notwithstanding the judgments of God that were upon them. The prophet was brought in vision to the gate of the temple where these princes sat in council, upon the present arduous affairs of the city; "The spirit lift me up, and brought me to the east gate of the Lord's house, and behold," twenty-five men were there. See how obsequious the prophet was to the Spirit's orders, and how observant of all the discoveries that were made to him. It should seem these twenty-five men were not the same with those twenty-five whom he saw at the door of the temple worshipping towards the east, ch. viii. 16. Those seem to have been priests or Levites, for they were between the porch and the altar; but these were princes, sitting in the gate of the Lord's house to try causes, Jer. xxvi. 10; and these here are charged, not with corruptions in worship, but maladministration of the government. Two of them are named, because they were the most leading active men, and perhaps because the prophet knew them, though he had been some years absent; Jaazaniah, not that mentioned ch. viii. 11; for he was the son of Shaphan, this the son of Azur. Some tell us, that Jerusalem was divided into twenty-four wards, and that these were the governors or aldermen of those wards, with their mayor, or president. Now observe,

1. The general character which God gives of these men to the prophet; ver. 2, "These are the men that devise mischief." Under pretence of concerting measures for the public safety, they harden the people in their sins, and take off their fear of God's judgments which they are threatened with by the prophets; they "give wicked counsel in this city," counselling them to restrain and silence the prophets to rebel against the king of Babylon, and to resolve upon holding the city out to the last extremity. Note, It is bad with a people when the things that belong to their peace are hid from the eyes of those who are intrusted with their counsels; and when mischief is done God knows at whose door to lay it, and in the discovery and recompence will be sure to lay it at the right door, and will say, These are the men that devised it, though they are great men, and pass for wise men, and must not now be contradicted or controlled.

2. The particular charge exhibited against them in proof of this character. They are indicted for words spoken at their council-board, which he that stands in the congregation of the mighty would take cognizance of, ver. 3. They said to this effect, "It is not near;" the destruction of our city that has been so often threatened by the prophets is not near; not so near as they talk of. They are conscious to themselves of such an enmity to reformation, that they cannot but conclude it will come at last; but they have such an opinion of God's patience, (though they have long abused it,) that they are willing to hope it will not come this great while. Note, Where Satan cannot persuade men to look upon the judgment to come as a thing doubtful and uncertain, yet he gains his point by persuading them to look upon it as a thing at a distance, so that it loses its force. If it be sure, yet "it is not near;" whereas in truth, "the Judge stands before the door."

Now, if the destruction is not near, they conclude, "let us build houses;" let us count upon a continuance, for "this city is the caldron, and we are the flesh." This seems to be a proverbial expression, signifying no more but this, We are as safe in this city as flesh in the boiling pot. The walls of the city shall be to us as walls of brass, and shall receive no more damage by the besiegers about it than the caldron doth by the fire under it. Those that think to force us out of our city into captivity, it will be as much at their peril as it would be to take the flesh out of a boiling pot with their hands. This appears to be the meaning of it, by the answer God gives to it; ver. 9, "I will bring you out of the midst of the city," where you think yourselves safe; and then it will appear, ver. 11, that "this is not your caldron, neither are ye the flesh." Perhaps it has a particular reference to the flesh of the peace offering, which it was so great an offence for the priests themselves to take out of the caldron while it was in seething, as we find, 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14; and then it intimates, that they were the more secure, because Jerusalem was the holy city, and they thought themselves a holy people in it, not to be meddled with. Some think this was a banter upon Jeremiah, who in one of his first visions saw Jerusalem represented by a seething-pot, Jer. i. 13; Now, say they in a way of jest and ridicule, if it be a seething-pot, we are as the flesh in it, and who dares meddle with us? Thus they continued mocking the messengers of the Lord, even while they suffered for so doing; but "be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong." Those hearts are hard indeed, which are made more secure by those words of God which were designed for warning to them.

Secondly. The method taken to awaken them out of their security. One would think the providences of God that were concerning them, were enough to startle them; but, to help them to understand and improve those, the word of God is sent them, to give warning; ver. 4, "Therefore prophesy against them," and try to undeceive them; "Prophesy, O son of man," upon these dead and dry bones. Note, The greatest kindness ministers can do to secure sinners is to preach against them, and to shew them their misery and danger, though they are never so unwilling to see it. We then act most for them when we appear most against them; but the prophet, being at a loss what to say to men that were hardened in sin, and bade defiance to the judgments of God, the Spirit of the Lord fell upon him, to make him full of power and courage, and said to him, Speak. Note, When sinners are flattering themselves into their own ruin, it is time to speak, and to tell them they shall not have peace if they go on. Ministers are sometimes so bashful and timorous, and so much at a loss, that they must be put on to speak, and to speak boldly. But he that commands the prophet to speak gives him instructions what to say; and he must address himself to them as the house of Israel, ver. 5; for not the princes only, but all the people are concerned to know the truth of their case, to know the worst of it. They are the house of Israel, and therefore the God of Israel is concerned in kindness to them to give them warning, and they are concerned in duty to him to take the warning. And what is it he must say to them in God's name?

1. Let them know that the God of heaven takes notice of their vain confidences, with which they support themselves; ver. 5, "I know the things that come into your mind every one of them;" what secret reasons you have for these resolutions, and what you aim at in putting so good a face upon a matter you know to be bad. Note, God perfectly knows, not only the things that come out of our mouths, but the things that come into our minds; not only all we say, but all we think; even those thoughts that are most suddenly darted into our minds, and as suddenly slip out of them again, so that we ourselves are scarcely aware of them; yet God knows them. He knows us better than we know ourselves; "he understands our thought afar off;" the consideration whereof should oblige us to keep our hearts with all diligence, that no vain thoughts come into them, or lodge within them.

2. Let them know that all that had fallen and should yet fall in Jerusalem by the sword of the Chaldeans, they that advised them to stand it out should be accounted before God the murderers of them; and those slain were the only ones that should remain in the city as the flesh in the caldron; ver. 6, "You have multiplied your slain in this city," not only those whom you have by the sword of justice unjustly put to death, under colour of law; but those whom you have by your wilfulness and pride unwisely exposed to the sword of war, though you were told by the prophets you should certainly go by the worst. Thus you with your stubborn humour have filled the streets of Jerusalem with the slain. Note, Those who are either unrighteous or imprudent in beginning or carrying on a war bring upon themselves a great deal of the guilt of blood; and those who are slain in the battles or sieges which they, by such a reasonable peace as the war aimed at, might have prevented, will be called their slain. Now these slain are the only flesh that shall be left in this caldron, ver. 7. There shall none remain to keep possession of the city but those that are buried in it. There shall be no inhabitants of Jerusalem but the inhabitants of the graves there; no freemen of the city but the free among the dead.

3. Let them know that, how impregnable soever they thought their city to be, they should be forced out of it, either driven to flight or dragged into captivity. "I will bring you forth out of the midst of it," whether you will or no, ver. 7; and again, ver. 9. They had provoked God to forsake the city, and thought they should do well enough by their own policy and strength when he was gone; but God will make them know that there is no peace to them that have left their God. If they have by their sins driven God from his house, he will soon by his judgments drive them from theirs; and it will be found that those are least safe that are most secure. "This city shall not be your caldron, neither shall ye be the flesh;" you shall not soak away in it, as you promise yourselves, and die in your nest; you think yourselves safe in the midst thereof, but you shall not be long there.

4. Let them know that, when God has got them out of the midst of Jerusalem, he will pursue them with his judgments wherever he finds them; the judgments which they thought to shelter themselves from by keeping close in Jerusalem. They feared the sword if they should go out to the Chaldeans, and therefore would abide in their caldron; but, saith God, "I will bring a sword upon you," ver. 8; "and you shall fall by the sword," ver. 10. Note, The fear of the wicked it shall come upon him; and there is no fence against the judgments of God when they come with commission, no, not in walls of brass. They were afraid of trusting to the mercy of strangers; but, saith God, "I will deliver you into the hands of strangers," whose resentments you shall feel, since you were not willing to lie at their mercy: see Jer. xxxviii. 17, 18. They thought to escape the judgments of God; but God saith he will execute judgments upon them; and whereas they resolved, if they must be judged, it should be in Jerusalem, God tells them, ver. 10, and again, ver. 11, he will judge them in the borders of Israel, which was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar slew all the nobles of Judah at Riblah in the land of Hamath, on the utmost border of the land of Canaan. Note, Those who have taken never so deep root in the place where they live, yet cannot be sure that in that place they shall die.

5. Let them know, that all this is the due punishment of their sin, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God against them. "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," ver. 10, and again, ver. 12. Those shall be made to know by the sword of the Lord that would not be taught by his word, what a hatred he has to sin, and what a fearful thing it is for impenitent sinners to fall into his hands. I will execute judgments, and then you shall know that I am the Lord; for the Lord is known by the judgments which he executeth upon those that have not walked in his statutes. Hereby it is known that he made the law, because he punisheth the breach of it. "I will execute judgments among you," saith God, "because you have not executed my judgments," ver. 12. Note, The executing of the judgments of God's mouth by us, in an uniform, steady course of obedience to his law, is the only way to prevent the executing of the judgments of his hand upon us in our ruin and confusion. One way or other God's judgments will be executed; the law will take place either in its precept or in its penalty. If we do not give honour to God by executing his judgments as he has commanded, he will get him honour upon us by executing his judgments as he has threatened; and thus we shall know that he is the Lord, the sovereign Lord of all, that will not be mocked. And observe, when they cast off God's statutes, and walked not in them, they did "after the manners of the heathens that were round about them," and introduced into their worship all their impure, ridiculous, and barbarous usages. When men leave the settled rule of Divine institutions, they wander endlessly; justly therefore was this made the reason why they should keep God's ordinances, that they might not commit the abominable customs of the heathen, Lev. xviii. 30.

Thirdly. This awakening word is here immediately followed by an awakening providence, ver. 13; where we may observe,

1. With what power Ezekiel prophesied, or rather, what a Divine power went along with it. "It came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah died," who was mentioned, ver. 1, as a principal man among the twenty-five princes that made all the mischief in Jerusalem. It should seem this was done in vision now, as the slaying of the ancient men, ch. ix. 6, upon occasion of which Ezekiel prayed, ver. 8, as he did here; but it was an assurance, that when this prophecy should be published it should be done in fact. The death of Pelatiah was an earnest of the complete accomplishment of this prophecy. Note, God is pleased oftentimes to single out some sinners, and to make them monuments of his justice, for warning to others of what is coming; and some that thought themselves very safe are snatched away suddenly, and drop down dead in an instant, as Ananias and Sapphira at Peter's feet when he prophesied.

2. With what pity Ezekiel prayed. Though the sudden death of Pelatiah was a confirmation of Ezekiel's prophecy, and really an honour to him, yet he was in a mighty concern about it, and laid it to heart as if he had been his relation or friend. "He fell upon his face, and cried with a loud voice," as one in earnest, "Ah Lord God! wilt thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel?" Many are swept away by the judgments we have been under, and shall the remnant which have escaped the sword die thus by the immediate hand of heaven? Then thou wilt indeed make a full end. Perhaps it was Ezekiel's infirmity to bewail the death of this wicked prince thus, as it was Samuel's to mourn so long for Saul; but thus he shewed how far he was from desiring the woful day he foretold. David lamented the sickness of those that hated and persecuted him; and we ought to be much affected with the sudden death of others, yea, though they are wicked.

14 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 15 Son of man, thy brethren, even thy brethren, the men of thy kindred, and all the house of Israel wholly, are they unto whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem have said, Get you far from the LORD: unto us is this land given in possession.

16 Therefore say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Although I have cast them far off among the heathen,
And although I have scattered them among the countries,
Yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary
In the countries where they shall come.

17 Therefore say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will even gather you from the people,
And assemble you out of the countries where ye have been scattered,
And I will give you the land of Israel.

18 And they shall come thither,
And they shall take away all the detestable things thereof
And all the abominations thereof from thence.

19 And I will give them one heart,
And I will put a new spirit within you;
And I will take the stony heart out of their flesh,
And will give them an heart of flesh:

20 That they may walk in my statutes,
And keep mine ordinances, and do them:
And they shall be my people, and I will be their God.

21 But as for them whose heart walketh after [tions,
The heart of their detestable things and their abomina-
I will recompense their way upon their own heads,
Saith the Lord GOD.

Prophecy was designed that by it every valley might be exalted, as well as every mountain and hill brought low, Isa. xl. 4; and prophets were to speak not only conviction to the presumptuous and secure, but comfort to the despised and desponding that trembled at God's word. The prophet having in the former part of this chapter received instructions for the awakening of those that were at ease in Zion, is in these verses furnished with comfortable words for those that mourned in Babylon, and by the rivers there sat weeping when they remembered Zion. Observe,

First. How the pious captives were trampled upon and insulted over by those who continued in Jerusalem, ver. 15. God tells the prophet what the inhabitants of Jerusalem said of him and the rest of them that were already carried away to Babylon. God had owned them as good figs, and declared it was for their good that he had sent them into Babylon; but the inhabitants of Jerusalem abandoned them, supposing them that were really the best saints to be the greatest sinners of all men that dwelt in Jerusalem. Observe, 1. How they are described. They are thy brethren, saith God to the prophet, whom thou hast a concern and affection for; they are the men of thy kindred, the men of thy redemption, (so the word is,) thy next of kin, to whom the right of redeeming the alienated possession doth belong, but who are so far from being able to do it, that they are themselves gone into captivity; they are the whole house of Israel. God so accounts of them because they only have retained their integrity, and are bettered by their captivity. They are not only of the same family and nation with Ezekiel, but of the same spirit; they were his hearers, and he had communion with them in holy ordinances, and perhaps upon that account they are called his brethren, and the men of his kindred. 2. How they were disowned by the inhabitants of Jerusalem. They said of them, "Get ye far from the Lord." They that were at ease and proud themselves scorned their brethren that were humbled under humbling providences. 1st. They cut them off from being members of their church, because they had separated themselves from their rulers, and in compliance with the will of God had surrendered themselves to the king of Babylon. They excommunicated them, and said, "Get ye far from the Lord," we will have nothing to do with you. Those that were superstitious were very willing to shake off those that were conscientious, and were severe in their censures of them and sentences against them, as if they were forsaken and forgotten of the Lord, and were cut off from the communion of the faithful. 2nd. They cut them off from being members of the commonwealth too, as if they had no longer any part or lot in the matter; "Unto us is the land given in possession," and you have forfeited your estates by surrendering to the king of Babylon, and we are thereby become entitled to them. God takes notice of, and is much displeased with, the contempt which those that are in prosperity put upon their brethren that are in affliction.

Secondly. The gracious promises which God made to them in consideration of the insolent carriage of their brethren towards them. They that hated them and cast them out said, "Let the Lord be glorified," but he shall appear to their joy, Isa. lxvi. 5. God owns that his hand was gone out against them, which had given occasion to their brethren to triumph over them, ver. 16. It is true, "I have cast them far off among the heathen, and scattered them among the countries;" they look as if they were an abandoned people, and so mingled with the nations as that they would be lost among them; but I have mercy in store for them. Note, God takes occasion, from the contempts which are put upon his people, to speak comfort to them, as David hoped God would reward him good for Shimei's cursing. His time to support his people's hopes is when their enemies are endeavouring to drive them to despair. Now God promiseth,

1. That he will make up to them the want of the temple and the privileges of it; ver. 16, "I will be to them as a little sanctuary, in the countries where they shall come." They at Jerusalem have the temple, but without God; they in Babylon have God, though without the temple. 1st. God will be a sanctuary to them, that is, a place of refuge; to him they shall flee, and in him they shall be safe, as he was that took hold on the horns of the altar. Or, rather, They shall have such communion with God in the land of their captivity as it was thought could be had nowhere but in the temple. They shall there see God's power and his glory, so as they used to see it in the sanctuary; they shall have the tokens of God's presence with them, and his grace in their hearts shall sanctify their prayers and praises as well as ever the altar sanctified the gift, so that they shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock. 2nd. He will be a little sanctuary, not seen or observed by their enemies, who looked with an envious and evil eye upon that house at Jerusalem which was high and great, 1 Kin. ix. 8. They were but few and mean, and a little sanctuary was fittest for them; God regards the low estate of his people, and suits his favours to their circumstances. Observe the condescensions of Divine grace; the great God will be to his people a little sanctuary. Note, They that are deprived of the benefit of public ordinances, if it be not their own fault, may have the want of them abundantly made up in the immediate communications of Divine grace and comforts.

2. That God would in due time put an end to their afflictions, bring them out of the land of their captivity, and settle them again, them or their children, in their own land, ver. 17. I will gather even you that are thus dispersed, thus despised and given over for lost by your own countrymen; "I will gather you from the people," distinguish you from those with whom you are mingled, deliver you from those by whom you are held captives, "and assemble you," in a body, "out of the countries where you have been scattered;" you shall not come back one by one, but all together, which will make your return more honourable, safe, and comfortable; and then "I will give you the land of Israel," which now your brethren look upon you as for ever shut out from. Note, It is well for us that men's severe censures cannot cut us off from God's gracious promises. There are many that will be found to have a place in the holy land whom uncharitable men, by their monopolies of it to themselves, had secluded from it. "I will give you the land of Israel," give it you again by a new grant, "and they shall come thither." If there be any thing in the change of the person from "you" to "them," it may signify the posterity of those to whom the promise is made. You shall have the title, as the patriarchs had; and they that come after shall have the possession.

3. That God, by his grace, would part between them and their sins, ver. 18. Their captivity shall effectually cure them of their idolatry; when they come thither to their own land again they shall take away all the detestable things thereof. Their idols, that had been their delectable things, should now be looked upon with detestation, (not only the idols of Babylon, where they were captives, but the idols of Canaan, where they were natives;) they should not only not worship them as they had done, but they should not suffer any monuments of them to remain; "they shall take all the abominations thereof from thence." Note, Then it is in mercy that we return to a prosperous state, when we return not to the sins and follies of that state. "What have I to do any more with idols?"

4. That God would powerfully dispose them to their duty. They shall not only cease to do evil, but they shall learn to do well, because there shall be not only an end of their troubles, but a return to their peace.

1st. God will plant good principles in them. He will make the tree good, ver. 19. This is a Gospel promise, and is made good to all those whom God designs for the heavenly Canaan; for God prepares all for heaven whom he has prepared heaven for. It is promised, First. That God will give them one heart, that is, a heart entire for the true God, and not divided, as it had been, among many gods; a heart firmly fixed and resolved for God, and not wavering; steady and uniform, and not inconstant with itself. One heart is a sincere and upright heart, its intentions of a piece with its professions. Secondly. That he will "put a new spirit within them," a temper of mind agreeable to the new circumstances which God in his providence would bring them into. All that are sanctified have a new spirit, quite different from what it was; they act from new principles, walk by new rules, and aim at new ends. A new name or a new face will not serve without a new spirit; "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." Thirdly. That he will "take away the stony heart out of their flesh," out of their corrupt nature. Their hearts shall no longer be as they have been, dead, and dry, and hard, and heavy as a stone; no longer incapable of bearing good fruit, so that the good seed is lost upon it, as it was on the stony ground. Fourthly. That he will give them a heart of flesh; not dead or proud flesh, but living flesh. He will make their hearts sensible of spiritual pains and spiritual pleasures, will make them tender, and apt to receive impressions. This is God's work; it is his gift, his gift by promise; and a wonderful and happy change it is that is wrought by it, from death to life. This is promised to those whom God would bring back to their own land, for then such a change of the condition is for the better indeed, when it is accompanied with such a change of the heart; and such a change must be wrought in all those that shall be brought to the better country, that is, the heavenly.

2nd. Their practices shall be consonant to those principles. "I will give them a new spirit," not that they may be able to discourse well on religion, and to dispute for it, but that "they may walk in my statutes" in their whole conversation, "and keep mine ordinances" in all acts of religious worship, ver. 20. These two must go together, and those to whom God has given a new heart and a new spirit will make conscience of both; and then "they shall be my people, and I will be their God." The ancient covenant, which seemed to have been broken and forgotten, shall be renewed. By their idolatry, it should seem, they had cast God off; by their captivity, it should seem, God had cast them off: but when they were cured of their idolatry and delivered out of their captivity, God and his Israel own one another again. God, by his good work in them, will make them his people, and then by the tokens of his good-will towards them, he will shew that he is their God.

Thirdly. Here is a threatening of wrath against those who hated to be reformed. As, when judgments are threatened, the righteous are distinguished so as not to share in the evil of those judgments, so, when favours are promised, the wicked are distinguished so as not to share in the comfort of those favours; they have no part or lot in the matter, ver. 21. But as for them that have no grace, what have they to do with peace? Observe, 1. Their description. Their "heart walks after the heart of their detestable things." They have as great a mind to worship devils as devils have to be worshipped. Or, in opposition to the new heart which God gives his people, which is a heart after his own heart, they have a heart after the heart of their idols; that is, in their temper and practice they conformed themselves to the characters and accounts given them of their idols, and the ideas they have of them; and of them they learned lewdness and cruelty. Here lies the root of all their wickedness, the corruption of the heart; as the root of their reformation is laid in the renovation of the heart. The heart has its walks, and according as those are the man is. 2. Their doom. It carries both justice and terror in it; "I will recompense their way upon their own heads," that is, I will deal with them as they deserve. There needs no more than this to speak God righteous, that he doth but render to men according to their deserts; and yet, such are the deserts of sin, that there needs no more than this to speak the sinner miserable.

22 Then did the cherubims lift up their wings, and the wheels beside them; and the glory of the God of Israel was over them above. 23 And the glory of the LORD went up from the midst of the city, and stood upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city. 24 Afterwards the spirit took me up, and brought me in a vision by the Spirit of God into Chaldea, to them of the captivity. So the vision that I had seen went up from me. 25 Then I spake unto them of the captivity all the things that the LORD had shewed me.

Here is, First. The departure of God's presence from the city and temple. When the message was committed to the prophet, and he was fully apprised of it, fully instructed how to separate between the precious and the vile, then "the cherubims lift up their wings, and the wheels beside them," ver. 22, as before ch. x. 19. Angels, when they have done their errands in this lower world, are upon the wing to be gone, for they lose no time. We left the glory of the Lord last at the east gate of the temple, ch. x. 19, which is here said to be in the midst of the city; now here we are told that, finding and wondering that there was none to intercede, none to uphold, none to invite its return, it removed next to the mountain which is on the east side of the city, ver. 23. That was the mount of Olives. On that mountain they had set up their idols to confront God in his temple when he dwelt there, 1 Kin. xi. 7, and thence it was called the mount of corruption, 2 Kin. xxiii. 13; therefore there God doth, as it were, set up his standard, his tribunal, as it were to confront them who thought to keep possession of the temple for themselves now God had left it. From that mountain there was a full prospect of the city; thither God removed, to make good what he had said, Deu. xxxii. 20, "I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be." It was from this mountain that Christ beheld the city and wept over it, in the foresight of its last destruction by the Romans. The glory of the Lord removed thither, to be, as it were, yet within call, and ready to return, if now at length, in this their day, they would have understood the things that belonged to their peace. Loath to depart bids oft farewell. God, by going away thus slowly, thus gradually, intimated that he left them with reluctancy, and would not have gone if they had not perfectly forced him from them. He did now in effect say, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel?" But though he bear long he will not bear always, but will at length forsake those, and cast them off for ever, who have forsaken him and cast him off.

Secondly. The departure of this vision from the prophet. At length it went up from him, ver. 24. He saw it mount upwards till it went out of sight, which would be a confirmation to his faith that it was a heavenly vision, that it descended from above, for thitherwards it returned. Note, The visions which the saints have of the glory of God will not be constant till they come to heaven. They have glimpses of that glory which they soon lose again, visions which go up from them; tastes of Divine pleasures, but not a continual feast. It was from the mount of Olives that the vision went up, typifying the ascension of Christ to heaven from that very mountain, when those that had seen him manifested in the flesh saw him no more; it was foretold, Zec. xiv. 4, that his feet should stand upon the mount of Olives, stand last there.

Thirdly. The prophet's return to them of the captivity. The same spirit that had carried him in a trance or ecstacy to Jerusalem brought him back to Chaldea, for there the bounds of his habitation are at present appointed, and that is the place of his service. The Spirit came to him, not to deliver him out of captivity, but, which was equivalent, to support and comfort him in his captivity.

Fourthly. The account which he gave to his hearers of all he had seen and heard, ver. 25. He received that he might give, and he was faithful to him that appointed him. He delivered his message very honestly; he spake all that and that only which God had shewed him. He told them of the great wickedness he had seen at Jerusalem, and the ruin that was hastening towards that city, that they might not repent of their surrendering themselves to the king of Babylon, as Jeremiah advised them, and blame themselves for it, nor envy those that stayed behind and laughed at them for going when they did, nor wish themselves there again, but be content in their captivity. Who would covet to be in a city so full of sin, and so near to ruin? It is better to be in Babylon under the favour of God than in Jerusalem under his wrath and curse. But, though this was delivered immediately to them of the captivity, yet we may suppose they sent the contents of it to them at Jerusalem, with whom they kept up a correspondence. And well had it been for Jerusalem if she had taken the warning hereby given.

CHAPTER XII.

Though the vision of God's glory be gone up from the prophet, yet his word comes to him still, and is by him sent to the people, and to the same purpose with that which was discovered to him in the vision, namely, to set forth the terrible judgments that were coming upon Jerusalem, by which the city and temple should be entirely laid waste. In this chapter, I. The prophet, by removing his stuff, and quitting his lodgings, must be a sign to set forth Zedekiah's flight out of Jerusalem in the utmost confusion, when the Chaldeans took the city, ver. 1—16. II. The prophet, by eating his meat with trembling, must be a sign to set forth the famine in the city during the siege, and the consternation that the inhabitants should be in, ver. 17—20. III. A message is sent from God to the people to assure them that all these predictions should have their accomplishment very shortly, and not be deferred, as they flattered themselves with hopes they would, ver. 21—28.

THE word of the LORD also came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not: for they are a rebellious house. 3 Therefore, thou son of man, prepare thee stuff for removing, and remove by day in their sight; and thou shalt remove from thy place to another place in their sight: it may be they will consider, though they be a rebellious house. 4 Then shalt thou bring forth thy stuff by day in their sight, as stuff for removing: and thou shalt go forth at even in their sight, as they that go forth into captivity. 5 Dig thou through the wall in their sight, and carry out thereby. 6 In their sight shalt thou bear it upon thy shoulders, and carry it forth in the twilight: thou shalt cover thy face, that thou see not the ground: for I have set thee for a sign unto the house of Israel. 7 And I did so as I was commanded: I brought forth my stuff by day, as stuff for captivity, and in the even I digged through the wall with mine hand; I brought it forth in the twilight, and I bare it upon my shoulder in their sight. 8 And in the morning came the word of the LORD unto me, saying, 9 Son of man, hath not the house of Israel, the rebellious house, said unto thee, What doest thou? 10 Say thou unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; This burden concerneth the prince in Jerusalem, and all the house of Israel that are among them.

11 Say, I am your sign:
Like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them:
They shall remove and go into captivity.
12 And the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder
In the twilight, and shall go forth:
They shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby:
He shall cover his face, that he see not the ground with his eyes.
13 My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare:
And I will bring him to Babylon to the land of the Chaldeans;
Yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there.
14 And I will scatter toward every wind
All that are about him to help him, and all his bands;
And I will draw out the sword after them.
15 And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall scatter them among the nations,
And disperse them in the countries.
16 But I will leave a few men of them
From the sword, from the famine, and from the pestilence;
That they may declare all their abominations
Among the heathen whither they come;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

Perhaps Ezekiel reflected with so much pleasure upon the vision he had had of the glory of God, that often, since it went up from him, he was wishing it might come down to him again; and he having seen it once, and a second time, was willing to hope he might be a third time so favoured; but we do not find that ever he saw it any more. And yet the word of the Lord comes to him, for God did in divers manners speak to the fathers, Heb. i. 1; and they often heard the words of God, when they did not see the visions of the Almighty. Faith comes by hearing, that word of prophecy which is more sure than vision. We may keep up our communion with God without raptures and ecstasies. In these verses the prophet is directed,

First. By what signs and actions to express the approaching captivity of Zedekiah king of Judah. That was the thing to be foretold; and it is foretold to them that are already in captivity, because as long as Zedekiah was upon the throne they flattered themselves with hopes that he would make his part good with the king of Babylon, whose yoke he was now projecting to shake off; from which it is probable these poor captives promised themselves mighty matters. And it may be, when he was forming that design, he privately sent encouragement to them to hope that he would rescue them shortly, or procure their liberty by exchange of prisoners; and while they were fed with these vain hopes they could not set themselves either to submit to their affliction or to get good by their affliction. It was therefore necessary, but very difficult, to convince them, that Zedekiah, instead of being their deliverer, should very shortly be their fellow-sufferer. Now one would have thought it might have been sufficient if the prophet had only told them this in God's name, as he doth afterwards, ver. 10; but to prepare them for the prophecy of it he must first give them a sign of it, must speak it to their eyes first and then their ears. And here we have,

1. The reason why he must take this method; ver. 2, it is because they are a stupid, dull, unthinking people, that will not heed, or will soon forget, or at least will not be at all affected with what they only hear of, it will make no impression at all upon them; "Thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house," whom it is next to impossible to work any good upon. They have eyes and ears, they have intellectual powers and faculties, but they see not, they hear not; they were idolaters, whose character it was that they were like the idols they worshipped, which have eyes and see not, ears and hear not, Ps. cxv. 5, 8. Note, Those are to be reckoned rebellious that shut their eyes against the Divine light, and stop their ears to the Divine law. They that are wilfully ignorant, that have faculties and means and will not use them, their ignorance is so far from being their excuse, that it adds rebellion to their sin. None so blind, so deaf, as those that will not hear, that will not see; they see not, they hear not, for they are a rebellious house. The cause is all from themselves; the darkness of the understanding is owing to the stubbornness of the will. Now this is the reason why he must speak to them by signs, as deaf people are taught, that they might be either instructed or ashamed. Note, Ministers must accommodate themselves, not only to the weakness, but to the wilfulness of those they deal with, and deal with them accordingly. If they dwell among those that are rebellious, they must speak to them the more plainly and pressingly, and take that course that is most likely to work upon them, that they may be left inexcusable.

2. The method he must take to awaken and affect them. He must furnish himself with all necessaries for removing, ver. 3; provide for a journey, clothes and money; he must remove from one place to another, as one unsettled and forced to shift. This he must do by day in the sight of the people. He must bring out all his household goods, to be packed up and sent away, ver. 4; and, because all the doors and gates were either locked up that they could not pass through them, or so guarded by the enemy that they durst not, he must therefore dig through the wall, and convey his goods away clandestinely through that breach in the wall, ver. 5. He must carry his goods away himself upon his own shoulders, for want of a servant to attend him. He must do this in the twilight, that he might not be discovered; and when he has made what shift he can to secure some of the best of his effects, he must himself steal away at even in their sight, with fear and trembling, and must go as they that go forth into captivity, ver. 4; that is, he must cover his face, ver. 6, as being ashamed to be seen, and afraid to be known, or in token of very great sorrow and concern. He must go away as a poor broken tradesman, that, when he is forced to shut shop, hides his head, or runs his country.

Thus Ezekiel must be himself a sign to them. And when, perhaps, he seemed somewhat backward to put himself to all this trouble, and to expose himself to be bantered and ridiculed for it, to reconcile him to it, God saith, ver. 3, "It may be they will consider," and will by it be taken off from their vain confidences, "though they be a rebellious house." Note, We must not despair even of the worst, but that yet they may be brought to bethink themselves and repent; and, therefore, must continue the use of proper means for their conviction and conversion, because while there is life there is hope. And ministers must be willing to go through the most difficult and inconvenient offices, (for such was this of Ezekiel's removing,) though there be but the "it may be" of success. If but one soul be awakened to consider, our care and pains will be well bestowed.

3. Ezekiel's ready and punctual obedience to the orders God gave him; ver. 7, "I did so as I was commanded." Hereby he teaches us all, and ministers especially, 1st. To obey with cheerfulness every command of God, even the most difficult. Christ himself learned obedience; and so we must all. 2nd. To do all we can for the good of the souls of others, to put ourselves to any trouble or pains for the conviction of those that are unconvinced. "We do all things," that is, we are willing to do any thing, "dearly beloved, for your edifying." 3rd. To be ourselves affected with those things wherewith we desire to affect others. When Ezekiel would give his hearers a melancholy prospect, he doth himself put on a melancholy aspect. 4th. To sit loose to this world, and prepare to leave it; to carry out our stuff for removing, because we have here no continuing city. "Arise, depart, this is not your rest, for it is polluted;" "Thou dwellest in a rebellious house," therefore prepare for removing. For who would not be willing to leave such a house, such a wicked world, as this is?

Secondly. He is directed by what words to explain those signs and actions; as Agabus, when he bound his own hands and feet, told whose binding was thereby signified. But observe, it was not till morning that God gave him an exposition of the sign,—till the next morning, to keep up in him a continual dependence upon God for instruction. As what God doth, so what he directs us to do, perhaps we know not now, but shall know hereafter.

1. It was supposed that the people would ask the meaning of this sign, or at least they should; ver. 9, "Hath not the house of Israel said unto thee, What dost thou?" Yes, I know they have; though they are a rebellious house, yet they are inquisitive concerning the mind of God, as those, Isa. lviii. 2, who sought God daily. Therefore the prophet must do such an odd, uncouth thing, that they might inquire what it meant; and then it may be hoped people will take notice of what is told them, and profit by it when it comes to them in answer to their inquiries. But some understand it as an intimation that they had not made any such inquiries; Hath not this rebellious house so much as asked thee, What dost thou? No; they take no notice of it, but tell them the meaning of it though they do not ask. Note, When God sends to us by his ministers, he observes what entertainment we give to the messages he sends us; he hearkens and hears what we say to them, and what inquiries we make upon them, and is much displeased if we pass them by without taking any notice of them. When we have heard the word, we should apply ourselves to our ministers for farther instruction, and then we shall know, if we thus follow on to know.

2. The prophet is to tell them the meaning of it. In general, ver. 10, "This burthen concerns the prince in Jerusalem;" they knew who that was, and gloried in it now they were in captivity, that they had a prince of their own in Jerusalem; and that the house of Israel was yet entire there, and therefore doubted not but in time to do well enough. But tell them, saith God, that in what thou hast done, they may read the doom of their friends at Jerusalem; "Say, I am your sign," ver. 11. As the conversation of ministers should teach the people what they should do, so the providences of God concerning them are sometimes intended to tell them what they must expect. The unsettlements and removes of ministers give warning to people what they must expect in this world; no continuance, but constant changes. When times of trouble are coming on, Christ tells his disciples, "they shall first lay their hands on you," Lu. xxi. 12.

1st. The people shall be led away into captivity; ver. 11, "As I have done, so shall it be done unto them." They shall be forced away from their own houses, no more to return to them, neither shall their place know them any more. We cannot say concerning our dwelling-place that it is our resting-place, for how far we may be tossed from it before we die we cannot foresee.

2nd. The prince shall in vain attempt to make his escape, for he also shall go into captivity. Jeremiah had told Zedekiah the same to his face, Jer. xxxiv. 3, "Thou shalt not escape, but shalt surely be taken." Ezekiel here foretells it to those who made him their confidence, and promised themselves relief from him.

First. That he shall himself carry away his own goods; "He shall bear upon his shoulder" some of his most valuable effects. Note, The judgments of God can turn a prince into a porter. He that was wont to have the regalia carried before him, and to march through the city at noonday, shall now himself carry his goods on his back, and steal away out of the city in the twilight. See what a change sin makes with men. All the avenues to the palace being carefully watched by the enemy, they shall dig through the wall, to carry out thereby. Men shall be their own housebreakers, and steal away their own goods; so it is when the sword of war has cancelled all right and property.

Secondly. That he shall attempt to escape in a disguise; with a mask or vizor on, which shall cover his face, so that he shall be able only to look before him, and shall not see the ground with his eyes. He that when he was in pomp affected to be seen now he is in his flight is afraid to be seen. Let none, therefore, either be proud of being looked at or overmuch pleased with looking about them, when they see a king with his face covered that he cannot see the ground.

Thirdly. That he shall be made a prisoner, and carried captive into Babylon; ver. 13, "My net will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare." It seemed to be the Chaldeans' net, and their snare, but God owns it for his. Those that think to outrun the sword of the Lord will find themselves taken in his net. Jeremiah had said that king Zedekiah should see the king of Babylon, and that he should go to Babylon. Ezekiel saith he shall be brought to Babylon, yet he shall not see it, though he shall die there. Those that were disposed to cavil would perhaps object, that these two prophets contradicted one another, for one said he should see the king of Babylon, the other said he should not see Babylon; and yet both proved true. He did see the king of Babylon at Riblah, where he passed sentence upon him for his rebellion, but there he had his eyes put out, so that he did not see Babylon when he was brought thither. These captives expected to see their prince come to Babylon a conqueror, to bring them out of their troubles; but he shall come thither a prisoner, and his disgrace will be a great addition to their troubles. Little joy could they have in seeing him, when he could not see them.

Fourthly. That all his guards should be dispersed and utterly disabled to do him any service; ver. 14, "I will scatter all that are about him to help him," so that he shall be left helpless; I "will scatter them among the nations, and disperse them in the countries," ver. 15; to be monuments of Divine justice wherever they go. But is there not hopes that they may rally again? He that flies one time may fight another time. No; "I will draw out the sword after them," which shall cut them off wherever it finds them. For the sword that God draws out will be sure to do the execution designed. Yet of Zedekiah's scattered troops some shall escape; ver. 16, "I will leave a few men of them." Though they shall all be scattered, yet they shall not all be cut off; some shall have their lives given them for a prey. And it is very observable for what end they are thus remarkably spared; "That they may declare all their abominations among the heathen whither they come." The troubles they are brought into will bring them to themselves, and to their right mind, and then they will acknowledge the justice of God in all that is brought upon them; and will make an ingenuous confession of their sins, which provoked God thus to contend with them; and as by this it shall appear that they were spared in mercy, so hereby they will make a suitable, grateful return to God for his favours to them in sparing them. Note, When God has remarkably delivered us from the deaths wherewith we were surrounded, we must look upon it that for this end, among others, we were spared, that we might glorify God, and edify others by making a penitent acknowledgment of our sins. And those that by their afflictions are brought to this are then made to know that God is the Lord, and may help to bring others to the knowledge of him. See how God brings good out of evil. The dispersion of sinners that had done God much dishonour and disservice in their own country proves the dispersion of penitents that shall do him much honour and service in other countries. The Levites are by a curse divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel, yet it is turned into a blessing, for thereby they have the fairest opportunity to teach Jacob God's laws.

17 Moreover the word of the LORD came to me, saying,
18 Son of man, eat thy bread with quaking,
And drink thy water with trembling and with carefulness;
19 And say unto the people of the land,
Thus saith the Lord GOD
Of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of the land of Israel;
They shall eat their bread with carefulness,
And drink their water with astonishment,
That her land may be desolate from all that is therein,
Because of the violence of all them that dwell therein.
20 And the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste,
And the land shall be desolate;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

Here again the prophet is made a sign to them of the desolations that were coming on Judah and Jerusalem.

First. He must himself eat and drink in care and fear, especially when he was in company, ver. 17, 18. Though he was under no apprehension of danger to himself, but lived in safety and plenty, yet he must "eat his bread with quaking," the bread of sorrows, Ps. cxxvii. 2, "and drink his water with trembling, and with carefulness," that he might express the calamitous condition of those that should be in Jerusalem during the siege. Not that he must dissemble, and pretend to be in fear and care when really he was not; but, being to foretell this judgment, to shew that he firmly believed it himself, and yet was far from desiring it, in the prospect of it he was himself affected with grief and fear. Note, When ministers speak of the ruin coming upon impenitent sinners, they must endeavour to speak feelingly, as those that know the terrors of the Lord. And they must be content to endure hardness, so they may but do good.

Secondly. He must tell them that the inhabitants of Jerusalem should in like manner eat and drink with care and fear, ver. 19, 20. Both those that have their home in Jerusalem and those of the land of Israel that come to shelter themselves there, "They shall eat their bread with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment;" either because they are afraid it will not hold out, but they shall want shortly, or because they are continually expecting the alarms of the enemy, "their life hanging in doubt before them," Deu. xxviii. 66; so that what they have they shall have no enjoyment of, nor will it do them any good. Note, Care and fear, if they prevail, are enough to embitter all our comforts, and are themselves very sore judgments. They shall be reduced to these straits that thus, by degrees, and by the hand of those that do thus straiten them, both city and country may be laid in ruins; for it is no less than an utter destruction of both that is aimed at in these judgments; "that her land may be desolate from all the fulness thereof," may be stript of all its ornaments, and robbed of all its fruits; and then of course "the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste," for they are served by the field. This universal desolation was coming upon them, and then no wonder that they ate their bread with care and fear. Now we are here told, 1. How bad the cause of this judgment was. It is "because of the violence of all them that dwell therein;" their injustice and oppression, and the mischief they did one another, for which God would reckon with them, as well as for the affronts put upon him in his worship. Note, The decay of virtue in a nation brings on a decay of every thing else; and when neighbours devour one another it is just with God to bring enemies upon them to devour them all. 2. How good the effect of this judgment should be; "Ye shall know that I am the Lord." And, if by these judgments they learn to know him aright, that will make up the loss of all they are deprived of by these desolations. Those are happy afflictions, how grievous soever to flesh and blood, that help to introduce us into, and improve us in, an acquaintance with God.

21 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 22 Son of man, what is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth? 23 Tell them therefore,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will make this proverb to cease,
And they shall no more use it as a proverb in Israel;
But say unto them, The days are at hand,
And the effect of every vision.
24 For there shall be no more any vain vision
Nor flattering divination within the house of Israel.
25 For I am the LORD: I will speak,
And the word that I shall speak shall come to pass;
It shall be no more prolonged:
For in your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word,
And will perform it, saith the Lord GOD.
26 Again the word of the LORD came to me, saying,
27 Son of man, behold, they of the house of Israel say,
The vision that he seeth is for many days to come,
And he prophesieth of the times that are far off.
28 Therefore say unto them,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
There shall none of my words be prolonged any more,
But the word which I have spoken shall be done,
Saith the Lord GOD.

Various methods have been used to awaken this secure and careless people to an expectation of the judgments coming, that they might be stirred up by repentance and reformation to prevent them. The prophecies of their ruin were confirmed by visions, and illustrated by signs, and all with such evidence and power that one would think they must needs be wrought upon. But here we are told how they evaded the conviction, and guarded against it, namely, by telling themselves and one another that, though these judgments threatened should come at last, yet they would not come of a long time. This suggestion with which they bolstered themselves up in their security is here answered, and shewed to be vain and groundless, in two several messages which God sent to them by the prophet at several times, both to the same purpose; such care, such pains, must the prophet take to undeceive them, ver. 21, 26. Observe,

First. How they flattered themselves with hopes that the judgments should be delayed. One saying they had, which was become proverbial in the land of Israel; ver. 22, they said, "The days are prolonged," the judgments are not come when they were expected to come, but seem to be still put off de die in diem,—'from day to day,' and therefore we may conclude that every vision fails, because it should seem that some do; that because the destruction is not come yet, it will never come; we will never trust prophet again, for we have been worse frighted than hurt. And another saying they had, which, if it would not conquer their convictions, yet would cool their affections and abate their concern, and that was, that "the vision was for a great while to come;" it refers to events at a mighty distance, and he prophesies of things which, though they may be true, yet are very far off, so that we need not trouble our heads about them, ver. 27; we may die in honour and peace before these troubles come. And if, indeed, the troubles had been thus adjourned, they might have made themselves easy, as Hezekiah did, "Is it not well if peace and truth shall be in my days?" But it was a great mistake, and they did but deceive themselves into their own ruin. And God is here much displeased at it; for, 1. It was a wretched abuse of the patience of God, who, because for a time he kept silence, was thought to be altogether such a one as themselves, Ps. l. 21. That forbearance of God which should have led them to repentance hardened them in sin. They were willing to think their works were not evil, because sentence against them was not executed speedily, and therefore concluded the vision itself failed because the days were prolonged. 2. It received countenance from the false prophets that were among them, as should seem from the notice God takes (ver. 24) of the vain visions and flattering divinations, even within the house of Israel, to whom were committed the oracles of God. They that deceived themselves by worshipping pretended deities, no marvel if they deceived themselves by crediting pretended prophecies, to which strong delusions God justly gave them up for their idolatries. 3. These sayings were become proverbial, they were industriously spread among the people, so that they were got into every one's mouth; and not only so, but were generally assented to, as proverbs used to be, not only the proverbs of the ancients, but those of the moderns too. Note, It is a token of universal degeneracy in a nation when corrupt and wicked sayings are grown proverbial; and it is an artifice of Satan by them to confirm men in their prejudices against the word and ways of God, and a great offence to the God of heaven. It will not serve for an excuse in saying ill, to plead that it is a common saying.

Secondly. How they are assured that they do but deceive themselves, for the judgments shall be hastened. These profane proverbs shall be confronted; "Tell them, therefore, the days are at hand," ver. 23; and again, ver. 28, "There shall none of my words be prolonged any more." Their putting the evil day far from them doth but provoke God to bring it the sooner upon them; and it will be so much the sorer, so much the heavier, so much the more a surprise and terror to them when it doth come. He must tell them,

1. That God will certainly silence the lying proverbs, and the lying prophecies with which they buoyed up their vain hopes, and make them ashamed of both. 1st. "I will make this proverb to cease;" for when they find the days of vengeance are come, and not one iota or tittle of the prediction falls to the ground, they will be ashamed to use it as a proverb in Israel, "The days are prolonged," and the vision fails. Note, Those that will not have their eyes opened and their mistakes rectified by the word of God shall be undeceived by his judgments; for every mouth that speaks perverse things shall be stopped. 2. "There shall be no more any vain vision," ver. 24. The false prophets, who told the people they should have peace, and should soon see an end of their troubles, shall be disproved by the event, and then shall be ashamed of their pretensions, and shall hide their heads, and impose silence upon themselves. Note, As truth was elder than error, so it will survive it; it got the start, and it will get the race. The true prophets' visions and predictions stand, and be in full force, power, and virtue; they give law and receive credit, when the vain visions and the flattering divinations are lost and forgotten, and shall be no more in the house of Israel; for great is the truth, and will prevail.

2. That God will certainly and very shortly accomplish every word that he has spoken. With what majesty doth he say it, ver. 25, "I am the Lord, I am Jehovah!" That glorious name of his speaks him a God giving being to his word by the performance of it; and, therefore, to the patriarchs, who lived by faith in a promise not yet performed, he was not known by his name Jehovah, Ex. vi. 3. But as he is Jehovah in making good his promise, so he is in making good his threatenings. Let them know then that God, with whom they have to do, is the great Jehovah; and therefore,

1st. He will speak, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear; "I am the Lord, I will speak." God will have his saying whoever gainsays it. God's oracles are called lively ones, for they still speak when the pagan oracles are long ago struck dumb. There has been and shall be a succession of God's ministers to the end of the world, by whom he will speak; and, though contempt may be put upon them, that shall not put a period to their ministration. "In your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word." Even in the worst ages of the church God left not himself without witness, but raised up men that spoke for him, that spoke from him. I will say the word, the word that shall stand.

2nd. The word that he speaks shall come to pass; it shall infallibly be accomplished, according to the true intent and meaning of it, and according to the full extent and compass of it. "I will say the word, and will perform it," ver. 25; for his mind is never changed, nor his arm shortened, nor his infinite wisdom ever nonplussed. With men, saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God; with him it is dictum, factum,—'said, and done.' In the works of providence, as in that of creation, he speaks and it is done, for he said, Let there be light, and there was light; let there be a firmament, and there was a firmament, Num. xiii. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 29. Whereas they had said, "Every vision fails," ver. 22, God saith, No, there shall be the effect of every vision, ver. 23. It shall not return void, but every sign shall be answered by the thing signified. They that see the visions of the Almighty do not see vain visions. God confirmeth the word of his servants by performing it.

3rd. It shall be accomplished very shortly. "The days are at hand" when you shall see "the effect of every vision," ver. 23. It is said, it is sworn, that delay shall be no longer, Rev. x. 6. The year of God's patience is now just expired, and he will no longer defer the execution of the sentence. "It shall be no more prolonged," ver. 25. He hath borne with you a great while, but he will not bear always. "In your days, O rebellious house," shall the word that is said be performed, and you shall see the threatened judgments and share them. "Behold, the Judge standeth at the door." The righteous are taken away from the evil to come, but this rebellious house shall not be so quietly taken away; no, they shall live to be hurried away, to be chased out of the world. This is repeated again, ver. 28, "There shall none of my words be prolonged any more," but judgment shall now hasten on apace; and the longer the bow has been in the drawing the deeper shall the arrow pierce. When we tell sinners of death and judgment, heaven and hell, and think by them to persuade them to a holy life, though we do not find them downright infidels, they will own that they do believe there is a state of rewards and punishments in the other world, yet they put by the force of those great truths, and avoid the impressions of them, by looking upon the things of the other world as very remote. They tell us, "The vision we see is for many days to come, and we prophesy of the times that are very far off;" it will be time enough to think of them when they come nearer; whereas really there is but a step between us and death, between us and an awful eternity,—yet a little while and the vision shall speak, and not lie. And therefore it concerns us to redeem time, and get ready with all speed for a future state; for though it is future it is very near, and while impenitent sinners slumber their damnation slumbers not.

CHAPTER XIII.

Mention had been made in the chapter before of the vain visions and flattering divinations with which the people of Israel suffered themselves to be imposed upon, ver. 24. Now this whole chapter is levelled against them. God's faithful prophets are nowhere so sharp upon any sort of sinners as upon the false prophets; not because they were the most spiteful enemies to them, but because they put the highest affront upon God, and did the greatest mischief to his people. The prophet here shews the sin and punishment, I. Of the false prophets, ver. 1—16. II. Of the false prophetesses, ver. 17—23. Both agreed to soothe men up in their sins, and, under pretence of comforting God's people, to flatter them with hopes that they should yet have peace; but the prophets shall be proved liars, their prophecies mere shams, and the expectations of the people illusion; for God will let them know that "the deceived and deceiver are his," are both accountable to him, Job xii. 16.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, prophesy against the prophets of Israel that prophesy, and say thou unto them that prophesy out of their own hearts,

Hear ye the word of the LORD;

3 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Woe unto the foolish prophets,
That follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing!

4 O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes in the deserts.

5 Ye have not gone up into the gaps,
Neither made up the hedge for the house of Israel
To stand in the battle in the day of the LORD.

6 They have seen vanity and lying divination, saying,
The LORD saith: and the LORD hath not sent them:
And they have made others to hope
That they would confirm the word.

7 Have ye not seen a vain vision,
And have ye not spoken a lying divination,
Whereas ye say, The LORD saith it;
Albeit I have not spoken?

8 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because ye have spoken vanity, and seen lies,
Therefore, behold, I am against you,
Saith the Lord GOD.

9 And mine hand shall be upon the prophets
That see vanity, and that divine lies:
They shall not be in the assembly of my people,
Neither shall they be written in the writing of the house of Israel,
Neither shall they enter into the land of Israel;
And ye shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

The false prophets, which are here prophesied against, were some of them at Jerusalem; Jer. xxiii. 14, "I have seen in the prophets at Jerusalem a horrible thing;" some of them among the captives in Babylon, for to them Jeremiah writes, Jer. xxix. 8, "Let not your diviners that be in the midst of you deceive you." And as God's prophets, though at a distance from each other in place or time, yet preached the same truths, which was an evidence that they were guided by one and the same good Spirit; so the false prophets prophesied the same lies, being actuated by one and the same spirit of error. There was little hopes of bringing them to repentance, they were so hardened in their sin, yet Ezekiel must prophesy against them, in hopes the people might be cautioned not to hearken to them; and thus a testimony will be left upon record against them, and they thereby left inexcusable. Ezekiel had express orders to "prophesy against the prophets of Israel," so they called themselves, as if none but they had been worthy of the name of Israel's prophets, who were indeed Israel's deceivers. But it is observable that Israel was never imposed upon by pretenders to prophecy till after they had rejected and abused the true prophets, as afterwards they were never deluded by counterfeit Messiahs, till after they had refused the true Messiah, and rejected him. These false prophets must be required to hear the word of the Lord. They took upon them to speak what concerned others, as from God; let them now hear what concerned themselves as from him. And two things the prophet is directed to do.

First. To discover their sin to them, and to convince them of that if possible, or thereby to prevent their proceeding any farther, by making manifest their folly unto all men, 2 Tim. iii. 9. They are here called foolish prophets, ver. 3; men that did not at all understand the business they pretended to. To make fools of the people they made fools of themselves, and put the greatest cheat upon their own souls. Let us see what is here laid to their charge.

1. They pretend to have a commission from God, whereas he never sent them. They thrust themselves into the prophetical office without warrant from him who is the Lord God of the holy prophets, which was a foolish thing; for how could they expect God should own them in a work to which he never called them? They are prophets out of their own hearts, so the margin reads it, ver. 2, prophets of their own making; ver. 6, "They say, The Lord saith," they pretend to be his messengers, "but the Lord hath not sent them," has not given them any orders. They counterfeit the broad seal of heaven, than which they cannot do a greater indignity to mankind, for hereby they put a reproach upon Divine revelation, lessen its credit, and weaken its credibility. When these pretenders are found to be deceivers, atheists and infidels will thence infer they are all so. "The Lord has not sent them," for, though crafty enough in other things, like the foxes, and very wise for the world, yet they are foolish prophets, and have no experimental acquaintance with the things of God. Note, Foolish prophets are not of God's sending; for whom he sends he either finds fit or makes fit. Where he gives warrant, he gives wisdom.

2. They pretend to have instructions from God, whereas he never made himself and his mind known to them. "They follow their own spirit," ver. 3. They deliver that as a message from God which is the product either of their subtle invention, to serve a turn for themselves, or of their own crazed and heated imagination, to give vent to a fancy, for they have seen nothing; that is, they have not really had any heavenly vision. They pretend that what they say, "the Lord saith it;" but God disowns it. "I have not spoken it," I never said, never meant any such thing. What they delivered was not what they had seen or heard, as that is which the ministers of Christ deliver, 1 Jno. i. 1; but either what they had dreamed or what they thought would please those they coveted to make an interest in. This is called their seeing "vanity and lying divination," ver. 6. They pretend to have seen that which they did not see, and produced that as a Divine truth which they knew to be false. To the same purpose, ver. 7, "Ye have seen a vain vision, and spoken a lying divination," which had no Divine original, and would have no effect, but would certainly be disproved by the event. And, ver. 8, the words are changed, "Ye have spoken vanity, and seen lies." What they saw and what they said was all alike, a mere sham. They saw nothing, they said nothing to the purpose, nothing that could be relied on, or deserved regard. Again, ver. 9, "They see vanity, and divine lies." They pretend to have had visions, as the true prophets had, whereas really they had none; but either it was the creature of their own fancy, they thought they had a vision, as men in a delirium do, (that was seeing vanity,) or it was a fiction of their own politics, and they knew they had none, and then they saw lies, and divined lies: see Jer. xxiii. 16, &c. Note, Since the devil is universally known to be the father of lies, those put the highest affront imaginable upon God who tell lies, and then father them upon him. But they that had put God's character upon Satan, in worshipping devils, arrived at length to that pitch of impiety as to put Satan's character upon God.

3. They took no care to prevent the judgments of God that were breaking in upon the kingdom. They were "like the foxes in the deserts," running to and fro, and seeming to be in a mighty hurry; but it was to get away and shift for their own safety, not to do any good. "The hireling flees and leaves the sheep." They are like foxes that are greedy of prey for themselves, crafty and cruel to feed themselves. But, ver. 5, "Ye have not gone up into the gaps, nor made up the hedge for the house of Israel." A breach is made in their fences at which judgments are ready to pour in upon them, and then, if ever, is a time to do them service; but ye have done nothing to help them. They should have made intercession for them to turn away the wrath of God; but they were not praying prophets, had no interest in heaven, nor intercourse with heaven, as prophets used to have, Gen. xx. 7, and so could do them no service that way. They should have made it their business, by preaching and advice, to bring people to repentance and reformation, and so have made up a hedge, and put a stop to the judgments of God; but this was none of their care,—they contrived how to please people, not how to profit them. They saw a deluge of profaneness and impiety breaking in upon the land, waging war with virtue and holiness, and threatening to crush them and bear them down; and then they should have come in "to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty," by witnessing against the wickedness of the time and place they lived in; but they thought that would be as dangerous a piece of service as standing in a breach to make it good against the besiegers, and therefore they declined it, did nothing to stem the tide, stood not in the battle against vice and immorality, but basely deserted the cause of religion and reformation in the day of the Lord, when it was proclaimed, "Who is on the Lord's side? Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers?" Ps. xciv. 16. Those were unworthy the name of prophets that could think so favourably of sin, and had so little zeal for God and the public welfare.

4. They flattered people into a vain hope that the judgments God had threatened should never come, whereby they hardened those in sin whom they should have endeavoured to turn from sin; ver. 6, They have made others to hope that all should be well, and they should have peace though they went on still in their trespasses, and that the event would confirm the word. They were still ready to say, We will warrant you these troubles will be at an end presently, and we shall be in prosperity again, as if their warrants would confirm false prophecies in defiance of God himself.

Secondly. He is directed to denounce the judgments of God against them for these sins, from which their pretending to the character of prophets would not exempt them.

1. In general, here is a woe against them, ver. 3; and what that woe is we are told, ver. 8, "Behold I am against you, saith the Lord God." Note, Those are in a woful condition that have God against them. Woe, and a thousand woes, to them that have made him their enemy.

2. In particular, they are sentenced to be excluded from all the privileges of the commonwealth of Israel, for they are adjudged to have forfeited them all; ver. 9, God's hand shall be upon them, to seize them and bring them to his bar, to shut them out from his presence; and they will find it a fearful thing to fall into his hands. They pretend to be prophets, particular favourites of heaven, and authorised to preside in the congregation of his church on earth; but, by pretending to the honours they were not entitled to, they lost those that otherwise they might have enjoyed, Mat. v. 19. Their doom is, 1st. To be expelled out of the communion of saints, and not to be looked upon as belonging to it. "They shall not be in the secret of my people;" their folly shall be so clearly manifested that they shall never be consulted, nor their advice asked; they shall not be present at any debates about public affairs. Or, rather, they shall not be in the assembly of God's people for religious worship, for they shall be ashamed to shew their heads there, when they are proved by the events to be false prophets, and, like Cain, shall go out from the presence of the Lord. The people that are deceived by them shall abandon them, and resolve to have no more to do with them. They that usurped Moses' chair shall not be allowed so much as a doorkeeper's place. In the great day they shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous, Ps. i. 5, when God gathers his saints together to him, Ps. l. 5, 16, to be for ever with him. 2nd. To be expunged out of the book of the living. They shall die in their captivity, and shall die childless, shall leave no posterity to take their denomination from them, and so their names shall not be found among those who either themselves or their posterity returned out of Babylon; of whom a particular account was kept in a public register, which was called the writing of the house of Israel, such as we have Ezr. ii. They shall not be found among the living in Jerusalem, Isa. iv. 3. Or, they shall not be found written among those whom God has from eternity chosen to be vessels of his mercy to eternity. We read of those who prophesied in Christ's name, and yet he will tell them he never knew them, Mat. vii. 22, 23, because they were not among those that were given to him. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, 'They shall not be written in the writing of eternal life, which is written for the righteous of the house of Israel;' see Ps. lxix. 28. 3rd. To be for ever excluded out of the land of Israel. God hath sworn in his wrath concerning them that they shall never enter with the returning captives into the land of Canaan, which a second time remains a rest for them. Note, Those who oppose the design of God's threatenings, and will not be awed and influenced by them, forfeit the benefit of his promises, and cannot expect to be comforted and encouraged by them.

10 Because, even because they have seduced my people,
Saying, Peace; and there was no peace;
And one built up a wall,
And, lo, others daubed it with untempered morter:
11 Say unto them which daub it with untempered morter,
that it shall fall:

HOUSES BUILT WITH UNTEMPERED MORTAR.

There shall be an overflowing shower;
And ye, O great hailstones, shall fall;
And a stormy wind shall rend it.
12 Lo, when the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you,
Where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed it?
13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will even rend it with a stormy wind in my fury;
And there shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger,
And great hailstones in my fury to consume it.
14 So will I break down the wall
That ye have daubed with untempered morter,
And bring it down to the ground,
So that the foundation thereof shall be discovered,
And it shall fall, and ye shall be consumed in the midst [thereof:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
15 Thus will I accomplish my wrath upon the wall,
And upon them that have daubed it with untempered morter,
And will say unto you, The wall is no more,
Neither they that daubed it;
16 To wit, the prophets of Israel which prophesy concerning Jerusalem,
And which see visions of peace for her,
And there is no peace, saith the Lord GOD.

We have here more plain dealing with the false prophets, and some farther articles of their doom. We have seen the people made ashamed of the false prophets, (though sometimes they had been fond of them,) and casting them away, as they shall do their false gods with indignation. Now here we find them as much ashamed of their false prophecies, which they had sometimes depended upon with much assurance. Observe,

First. How the people are deceived by the false prophets. Those flatterers seduce them, saying, "Peace, and there was no peace," ver. 10. They pretended to have seen "visions of peace," ver. 16; but that could not be, for "there was no peace, saith the Lord God." There was no prosperity designed for them, and therefore there could be no ground for their security: yet they told them God was at peace with them, and had mercy in reserve for them; and the war they were engaged in with the Chaldeans should soon end in an honourable peace, and their land should enjoy a happy repose and tranquillity. They told the idolaters, and other sinners, there was neither harm nor danger in the way they were in. Thus they seduced God's people, they put a cheat upon them, led them into mistakes, and drew them aside out of that way of repentance and reformation which the other prophets were endeavouring to bring them into. Note, Those are the most dangerous seducers who suggest to sinners that which tends to lessen their dread of sin, and their fear of God. Now this is compared to the building of a slight rotten wall, or, according to our Saviour's similitude, which is to the same purpose with this, (Mat. vii. 26,) the building of a house upon the sand, which seems to be a shelter and protection for a while, but will fall when a storm comes. One false prophet built the wall, set up the notion that God was not at all displeased with Jerusalem, but the city should be confirmed in its flourishing estate, and be victorious over the powers that now threatened it. This notion was very pleasing, and he that started it made himself very acceptable by it, and was caressed by every body; which invited others to say the same. They made the matter look yet more plausible and promising, they daubed the wall which the first had built, but it was with untempered mortar, sorry stuff that will not bind nor hold the bricks together; they had no ground for what they said, nor had it any consistency with itself, but was like ropes of sand. They did not strengthen the wall, were in no care to make it firm, to see that they went upon sure grounds; they only daubed it, to hide the cracks and make it look well to the eye. And the wall thus built, when it comes to any stress, much more to any distress, will bulge and totter, and come down by degrees. Note, Doctrines that are groundless, though never so grateful, that are not built upon a Scripture foundation, nor fastened with a Scripture cement, though never so plausible, never so pleasing, are not of any worth, nor will stand men in any stead. And those hopes of peace and happiness which are not warranted by the word of God will but cheat men, like a wall that is well daubed indeed, but ill built.

Secondly. How they will be soon undeceived by the judgment of God, which we are sure is according to truth.

1. God will in anger bring a terrible storm, that shall beat fiercely and furiously upon the wall. The descent which the Chaldean army shall make upon Judah, and the siege they shall lay to Jerusalem, will be as "an overflowing shower," or inundation, such as Solomon calls "a sweeping rain that leaves no food," Pr. xxviii. 3; will bear down all before it as the deluge did in Noah's time; "Ye, O great hailstones, shall fall," the artillery of heaven, every hailstone like a cannon ball battering this wall; and with these a stormy wind, which is sometimes so strong as to rend the rocks, 1 Kin. xix. 11, much more an ill-built wall, ver. 11. But that which makes this rain, and hail, and wind most terrible is that they arise from the wrath of God, and are enforced by that; that is it that sends them, that is it that gives them the setting on; ver. 13, it is "a stormy wind in my fury, and an overflowing shower in my anger, and great hailstones in my fury." The fury of Nebuchadnezzar and his princes, who highly resented Zedekiah's treachery, made the invasion very formidable, but that was nothing in comparison with God's displeasure. "The staff in their hand is mine indignation," Isa. x. 5. Note, An angry God has winds and storms at command wherewith to alarm secure sinners; and his wrath makes them frightful and forcible indeed; for who can stand before him when he is angry?

2. This storm shall overturn the wall; "It shall fall," and the wind shall rent it, ver. 11. "The hailstones shall consume it," ver. 13. "I will break it down," ver. 14, "and bring it to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered;" it will appear how false, how rotten it was, to the prophetical reproach of the builders. When the Chaldean army has made Judah and Jerusalem desolate, then this credit of the prophets and the hopes of the people will both sink together; the former will be found false in flattering the people, and the latter foolish in suffering themselves to be imposed upon by them, and so exposed to so much the greater confusion, when the judgment should surprise them in their security. Note, Whatever men think to shelter themselves with against the judgments of God, while they continue unreformed, will prove but a refuge of lies, and will not profit them in the day of wrath: see Isa. xxviii. 17. Men's anger cannot shake that which God has built, for the blast of the terrible ones is but as a storm against the wall, which makes a great noise but never stirs the wall, (see Isa. xxv. 4;) but God's anger will overthrow that which men have built in opposition to him. They and all their attempts, they and all the securities wherein they entrench themselves, shall be "as a bowing wall, and as a tottering fence," Ps. lxii. 10. And when their vain predictions are disproved, and their vain expectations disappointed, then it will be discovered that there was no ground for either, Hab. iii. 13. The day will declare what every man's work is, and the fire will try it, 1 Cor. iii. 13.

3. The builders of the wall, and those that daubed it, will themselves be buried in the ruins of it. "It shall fall, and ye shall be consumed in the midst thereof," ver. 14. And thus the threatenings of God's wrath, and all the just intentions of it, shall be accomplished to the uttermost, both upon the wall and upon them that have daubed it, ver. 15. The same judgments that will prove the false prophets to be false will punish them for their falsehood; and they themselves shall be involved in the calamity which they made the people believe there was no danger of, and become monuments of that justice which they bid defiance to. Thus, if the blind lead the blind, both the blind leaders and the blind followers will fall together into the ditch. Note, Those that deceive others will in the end prove to have deceived themselves; and no doom will be more fearful than that of unfaithful ministers, that flattered sinners in their sins.

4. Both the deceivers and the deceived, when they thus perish together, will justly be ridiculed and triumphed over; ver. 12, "When the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you," by those that gave credit to the true prophets, and feared the word of the Lord, Now, "where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed the wall?" What is gone with all the fine soft words and fair promises wherewith you flattered your wicked neighbours, and all the assurances you gave them, that the troubles of the nation should soon be at an end. "The righteous shall laugh at them;" the righteous God shall, righteous men shall, saying, "Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength," Ps. lii. 6, 7; "I also will laugh at your calamity," Pr. i. 26. They will say unto you, ver. 15, "The wall is no more, neither he that daubed it;" your hopes are vanished, and them that supported them, even the prophets of Israel, ver. 16. Note, Those that usurp the honours that do not belong to them will shortly be filled with the shame that doth.

17 Likewise, thou son of man,
Set thy face against the daughters of thy people,
Which prophesy out of their own heart;
And prophesy thou against them,
18 And say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Woe to the women that sew pillows to all armholes,
And make kerchiefs upon the head of every stature to
Will ye hunt the souls of my people, [hunt souls!
And will ye save the souls alive that come unto you?
19 And will ye pollute me among my people
For handfuls of barley and for pieces of bread,
To slay the souls that should not die,
And to save the souls alive that should not live,
By your lying to my people that hear your lies?
20 Wherefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against your pillows,
Wherewith ye there hunt the souls to make them fly,
And I will tear them from your arms,
And will let the souls go,
Even the souls that ye hunt to make them fly.
21 Your kerchiefs also will I tear,
And deliver my people out of your hand,
And they shall be no more in your hand to be hunted;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD. [sad,
22 Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous
Whom I have not made sad;
And strengthened the hands of the wicked,
That he should not return from his wicked way,
By promising him life: [tions:
23 Therefore ye shall see no more vanity, nor divine divina-
For I will deliver my people out of your hand:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

EASTERN WOMEN EMBROIDERING WITH THE NEEDLE.—ver. 18.

As God has promised that, when he pours out his Spirit upon his people, both their sons and their daughters shall prophesy, so the devil, when he acts as a spirit of lies and falsehood, is so not only in the mouth of false prophets, but of false prophetesses too; and those are the deceivers whom the prophet is here directed to prophesy against: for they are not such despicable enemies to God's truths as deserve not to be taken notice of, nor yet will either the weakness of their sex excuse their sin nor the tenderness and respect that is owing to it exempt them from the reproaches and threatenings of the word of God. No; "Son of man, set thy face against the daughters of thy people," ver. 17. God takes no pleasure in owning them for his people: They are "thy people," as Ex. xxxii. 7; and the women pretend to a spirit of prophecy, and are in the same song with the men, as Ahab's prophets were: Go on and prosper. They prophesy out of their own heart too; they say what comes uppermost, and what they know nothing of; therefore prophesy against them from God's own mouth. The prophet must set his face against them, and try if they can look him in the face, and stand to what they say. Note, When sinners grow very impudent, it is time for reprovers to be very bold. Now observe,

First. How the sin of these false prophetesses is described, and what are the particulars of it.

1. They told deliberate lies to those who consulted them, and came to them to be advised, and to be told their fortune. You do mischief "by your lying to my people that hear your lies," ver. 19. They come to be told the truth, but you tell them lies; and because you humour them in their sins they are willing to hear you. Note, It is ill with those people that can better hear pleasing lies than unpleasing truths; and it is a temptation to them who lie in wait to deceive, to tell lies, when they find people willing to hear them, and to excuse themselves with this, Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur,—'If the people will be deceived, let them be deceived.'

2. They profaned the name of God, by pretending to have received those lies from him; ver. 19, "Ye pollute my name among my people," and make use of that for the patronising of your lies, and the gaining of credit to them. Note, Those greatly pollute God's holy name that make use of it to give countenance to falsehood and wickedness. Yet this they did "for handfuls of barley and pieces of bread." They did it for gain; they cared not what dishonour they did to God's name by their lying, so they could but make a hand of it for themselves. There is nothing so sacred which men of mercenary spirits, in whom the love of this world reigns, will not profane and prostitute, if they can out get money by the bargain. But they did it for poor gain. If they could get no more for it, rather than break, they would sell you a false prophecy that should please you to a nicety, for the beggar's dole, a piece of bread, or a handful of barley, and yet that was more than it was worth. Had they asked it as an alms for God's sake, sure they might have had it, and God would have been honoured; but, taking it as a fee for a false prophecy, God's name is polluted, and the smallness of the reward greatens the offence; "for a piece of bread that man will transgress," Pr. xxviii. 21. Had their poverty been their temptation to steal, "and so take the name of the Lord in vain," it had been nothing so bad as when it tempted them to prophesy lies in his name, and so to profane it.

3. They perfectly kept people in awe, and terrified them with their pretensions. "Ye hunt the souls of my people," ver. 18; "hunt them to make them flee," ver. 20; 'hunt them into gardens,' so the margin reads it. You use all the arts you have to court or compel them into those places where you deliver your pretended predictions. Or, you have got such an influence upon them that you make them do just as you would have them do, and tyrannise over them. It was indeed the people's fault that they did regard them, but it was their fault by lies and falsehoods to command that regard. They pretended to save the souls alive that came to them, ver. 18. If they would but be hearers of them, and contributors to them, they might be sure of salvation. Thus they beguiled unstable souls that had a concern about salvation as their end, but did not rightly understand the way, and therefore hearkened to those who were most confident in promising it them; but will you pretend to save souls, or secure salvation to your party? Those are justly suspected that make such pretensions.

4. They discouraged those that were honest and good, and encouraged those that were wicked and profane. You "slay the souls that should not die, and save those alive that should not live," ver. 19, which is explained, ver. 22, "You have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad." Because they would not, they durst not, countenance your pretensions, you thundered out the judgments of God against them, to their great grief and trouble; you put them under invidious characters, to make them either despicable or odious to the people; and pretended to do it in God's name, which made them go many a time with a sad heart; whereas it was the will of God that they should be comforted, and by having respect put upon them should have encouragement given them. But on the other side, which is still worse, you have "strengthened the hands of the wicked," and emboldened them to go on in their wicked ways, and not to return from them, which was the thing the true prophets with earnestness called them to. You have promised sinners life in their sinful ways, have told them they shall have peace though they go on, by which their hands have been strengthened and their hearts hardened. Some think this here refers to the severe censures they passed upon those that were already gone into captivity, who were humbled under their affliction, by which their hearts were made sad; and the commendations they gave to those that rebelled against the king of Babylon, who were hardened in their impieties, by which their hands were strengthened. Or, by their polluting of the name of God they saddened the hearts of good people, who have a value and veneration for the word of God, and confirmed atheists and infidels in their contempt of Divine revelation, and furnished them with arguments against it. Note, Those have a great deal to answer for that grieve the spirits and weaken the hands of good people, and that gratify the lusts of sinners, and animate them in their opposition to God and religion. Nor can any thing strengthen the hands of sinners more than to tell them that they may be saved in their sins without repentance; or that there may be repentance though they do not return from their wicked ways.

6. They mimicked the true prophets by giving signs for the illustrating of their false predictions, as Hananiah did, Jer. xxviii. 10. And they were signs agreeable to their sex. They sewed little pillows to people's armholes, to signify that they might be easy and repose themselves, and needed not be disquieted with the apprehensions of trouble approaching. And they "made kerchiefs upon the head of every stature;" that is, of persons of every age, young and old, distinguishable by their stature, ver. 18. These kerchiefs were badges of liberty or triumph, intimating that they should not only be delivered from the Chaldeans, but be victorious over them. Some think these were some superstitious rites which they used with those to whom they delivered their divinations; preparing them for the reception of them by putting enchanted pillows under their arms, and handkerchiefs on their heads, to raise their fancies and their expectations of something great. Or, perhaps the expressions are figurative: they did all they could to make people secure, which is signified by laying them easy; and to make people proud, which is signified by dressing them fine with handkerchiefs, perhaps laid, or embroidered on their heads.

Secondly. How the wrath of God against them is expressed. Here is a woe to them, ver. 8; and God declares himself against the methods they took to delude and deceive, ver. 20; but what course will God take with them?

1. They shall be confounded in their attempts, and shall proceed no farther; ver. 23, "Ye shall see no more vanity, nor divine divinations;" not that they shall themselves lay down their pretensions in a way of repentance, but when the event gives them the lie they shall be silent for shame. Or, their fancies and imaginations shall not be disposed to receive impressions which assist them in their divinations as they have been. Or, they themselves shall be cut off.

2. God's people shall be delivered out of their hands when they see themselves deluded by them into a false peace and a fool's paradise; and that, though they would not leave their sin, their sin has left them, and they "see no more vanity, nor divine divinations." They shall turn their back upon them, shall slight their predictions; the righteous shall no more be saddened by them, no, nor the wicked strengthened. The pillows shall be torn from their arms, and the kerchiefs from their heads; the fallacies shall be discovered, their frauds detected, and the people of God shall no more be in their hand, to be hunted as they have been. Note, It is a great mercy to be delivered from a servile regard to, and fear of, those that, under colour of a Divine authority, impose upon and tyrannize over the consciences of men, and say to their souls, "Bow down that we may go over." But it is a sore grief to those who delight in such usurpations to have their power broken and the prey delivered; such was the reformation to the church of Rome. And when God doth this he makes it to appear that he is the Lord, that it is his prerogative to give law to souls.

CHAPTER XIV.

Hearing the word and prayer are two great ordinances of God in which we are to give honour to him, and may hope to find favour and acceptance with him. And yet in this chapter, to our great surprise, we find some waiting upon God in the one and some in the other, and yet not meeting with success, as they expected. I. The elders of Israel come to hear the word and inquire of the prophet; but because they are not duly qualified they meet with a rebuke instead of acceptance, ver. 1—5, and are called upon to repent of their sins, and reform their lives, else it is at their peril to inquire of God, ver. 6—11. II. Noah, Daniel, and Job are supposed to pray for this people, and yet, because the decree is gone forth, and the destruction of them is determined by a variety of judgments, their prayers shall not be answered, ver. 12—21. And yet it is promised in the close, that a remnant shall escape, ver. 22, 23.

THEN came certain of the elders of Israel unto me, and sat before me. 2 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 3 Son of man, these men have set up their idols in their heart, and put the stumblingblock of their iniquity before their face: should I be enquired of at all by them? 4 Therefore speak unto them, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Every man of the house of Israel that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet; I the LORD will answer him that cometh according to the multitude of his idols; 5 That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are all estranged from me through their idols. 6 Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Repent, and turn yourselves from your idols; and turn away your faces from all your abominations. 7 For every one of the house of Israel, or of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to a prophet to enquire of him concerning me; I the LORD will answer him by myself: 8 And I will set my face against that man, and will make him a sign and a proverb, and I will cut him off from the midst of my people; and ye shall know that I am the LORD. 9 And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the LORD have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. 10 And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity: the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him; 11 That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, neither be polluted any more with all their transgressions; but that they may be my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord GOD.

Here is, First. The address which some of the elders of Israel made to the prophet, as an oracle, to inquire of the Lord by him. They came and sat before him, ver. 1. It is probable they were not of those that were now his fellow-captives, and constantly attended his ministry, such as those we read of, ch. viii. 1, but some occasional hearers; some of the grandees of Jerusalem that were come upon business to Babylon, perhaps public business, or an embassy from the king, and in their way called on the prophet, having heard much of him, and being desirous to know if he had any message from God, which might be some guide to them in their negotiation. By the severe answer given them, one would suspect they had an ill design to ensnare the prophet, or to try if they could catch hold of any thing that might look like a contradiction to Jeremiah's prophecies, and so they might have occasion to reproach them both. However, they feigned themselves just men, complimenting the prophet, and sat before him gravely enough, as God's people used to sit. Note, It is no new thing for bad men to be found employed in the external performances of religion.

Secondly. The account which God gave the prophet privately concerning them. They were strangers to him, he only knew that they were elders of Israel,—that was the character they wore, and as such he received them with respect, and it is likely was glad to see them so well disposed; but God gives him their real character, ver. 3. They were idolaters, and did only consult Ezekiel as they would any oracle of a pretended deity, to gratify their curiosity; and therefore he appeals to the prophet himself whether they deserve to have any countenance or encouragement given them. "Should I be inquired of at all by them?" Should I accept their inquiries as an honour to myself, or answer them for satisfaction to them? No, they have no reason to expect it. For, 1. They have "set up their idols in their heart." They not only have idols, but they are in love with them; they doat upon them, are wedded to them, and have laid them so near their hearts, and have given them so great a room in their affections, that there is no parting them. The idols they have set up in their houses, though they are now at a distance from the chambers of their imagery, yet they have them in their hearts, and they are ever and anon worshipping them in their fancies and imaginations. 'They have made their idols to ascend upon their hearts,' so the word is; that is, they have subjected their hearts to their idols, they are upon the throne there. Or, when they came to inquire of the prophet, they pretended to put away their idols, but it was in pretence only; they still had a secret reserve for them. They kept them up in their hearts; and, if they left them for awhile, it was cum animo revertendi,—with an intention to return to them,' not a final farewell. Or, it may be understood of spiritual idolatry, those whose affections are placed upon the wealth of the world and the pleasures of sense, whose god is their money, whose god is their belly; "They set up their idols in their hearts." Many that have no idols in their sanctuary yet have idols in their hearts, which is no less an usurpation of God's throne, and a profanation of his name. Little children keep yourselves from those idols. 2. "They put the stumblingblock of their iniquity before their face." Their silver and gold was called "the stumblingblock of their iniquity," ch. vii. 19; their idols of silver and gold, by the beauty of which they were allured to idolatry, and so it was the block at which they stumbled and fell into that sin. Or, their iniquity is their stumbling-block which throws them down, so that they fall into ruin. Note, Sinners are their own tempters. Every man is tempted when he is drawn aside of his own lust; and so they are their own destroyers. "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." And thus they put the stumblingblock of their iniquity before their own faces, and stumble upon it, though they see it before their eyes. It intimates that they are resolved to go on in sin, whatever comes of it. "I have loved strangers, and after them I will go;" that is the language of their hearts. And should God be inquired of by such wretches? Do they not hereby rather put an affront upon him than do him any honour, as those did that bowed the knee to Christ in mockery? Can they expect an answer of peace from God who thus continue their acts of hostility against him? Ezekiel, what thinkest thou of it?

Thirdly. The answer which God in just displeasure orders Ezekiel to give them, ver. 4. Let them know, that it is not out of any disrespect to their persons that God refuseth to give them an answer; but it is laid down as a rule for every man of the house of Israel, whoever he be, that if he continue in love and league with his idols, and come to inquire of God, God will resent it as an indignity done to him, and will answer him according to his real iniquity, not according to his pretended piety. He comes to the prophet, who he expects will be civil to him; but God will give him his answer by punishing him for his impudence. "I the Lord," who speak and it is done, "I will answer him that cometh according to the multitude of his idols." Observe, Those that set up idols in their hearts, and set their hearts upon their idols, commonly have a multitude of them. Humble worshippers God uses to answer according to the multitude of his mercies; but bold intruders he answers according to the multitude of their idols; that is, 1. According to the desire of their idols. He will give them up to their own heart's lusts, and leave them to themselves to be as bad as they have a mind to be, till they have filled up the measure of their iniquity. Men's corruptions are idols in their hearts, and they are of their own setting up. Their temptations are the "stumblingblock of their iniquity," and they are of their own putting, and God will answer them accordingly; let them take their course. 2. According to the desert of their idols. They shall have such an answer as it is just such idolaters should have. God will punish them as he useth to punish idolaters; that is, when they stand in need of his help, he will send them to the gods whom they have chosen, Jud. x. 13, 14. Note, The judgment of God will deal with men according to what they are really, that is, according to what their hearts are, not according to what they are in shew and profession. And what will be the end of this? What will this threatened answer amount to? He tells them, ver. 5, "That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart," may lay them open to the world, that they may be ashamed; nay, lay them open to the curse, that they may be ruined. Note, The sin and shame, and pain and ruin of sinners, is all from themselves, and their own hearts are the snares in which they are taken; they seduce them, they betray them; their own consciences witness against them, condemn them, and are a terror to them. If God take them, if he discover them, if he convict them, if he bind them over to his judgment, it is all by their own hearts. "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." The house of Israel is ruined by its own hands, "because they are all estranged from me through their idols." Note, 1st. The ruin of sinners is owing to their estrangement from God. 2nd. It is through some idol or other that the hearts of men are estranged from God; some creature has gained that place and dominion in the heart that God should have.

Fourthly. The extent of this answer God had given them. To all the house of Israel, ver. 7, 8. The same thing is repeated, which intimates God's just displeasure against hypocrites, who mock him with the shows and forms of devotion, while their hearts are estranged from him, and at war with him. Observe, 1. To whom this declaration belongs. It concerns not only "every one of the house of Israel," as before, ver. 4, but "the stranger that sojourns in Israel." Let him not think it will be an excuse for him in his idolatries that he is but a stranger and a sojourner in Israel, and doth but worship the gods that his father served, and that he himself was bred up in the service of; no, let him not expect any benefit by Israel's oracles or prophets unless he thoroughly renounce his idolatry. Note, Even proselytes shall not be countenanced if they be not sincere. A dissembled conversion is no conversion. 2. The description here given of hypocrites. They separate themselves from God. By their fellowship with idols they cut themselves off from their relation to God, and their interest in him; they break off their acquaintance and intercourse with him, and set themselves at a distance from him. Note, Those that join themselves to idols separate themselves from God. Nor shall any be for ever separated from the vision and fruition of God but such as now separate themselves from his service, and wilfully withdraw their allegiance from him. But there are those who thus separate themselves from God, and yet come to his prophets with a seeming respect and deference to their office, to inquire of them concerning God; either to satisfy a vain curiosity, or stop the mouth of a clamorous conscience, or to get or save a reputation among men, but without any desire to be acquainted with God, or any design to be ruled by him. 3. The doom of those that thus trifle with God and think to impose upon him. "I the Lord will answer him by myself." Let me alone to deal with him, I will give him an answer that shall fill him with confusion, that shall make him repent of his daring impiety. He shall have his answer, not by the words of the prophet, but by the judgments of God. "And I will set my face against that man;" which notes great displeasure against him, and a fixed resolution to ruin him. God can outface the most impenitent sinner. The hypocrite thought to save his credit, nay, and to gain applause; but, on the contrary, God will make him a sign and a proverb, that is, will inflict such judgments upon him as shall make him remarkable and contemptible in the eyes of all about him. His misery shall be made use of to express the greatest misery; as when the worst of sinners are said to have their portion appointed them with hypocrites, Mat. xxiv. 51. God will make him an example; his judgments upon him shall be for a warning to others to take heed of mocking God; for thus shall it be done to the man that separates himself from God, and yet pretends to inquire concerning him. The hypocrite thought to have passed for one of God's people, and to have crowded into heaven among them; but God will "cut him off from the midst of his people," will discover him, and pluck him out from the thickest of them. And by this, saith God, "ye shall know that I am the Lord." By the discovery of hypocrites it appears that God is omniscient. Ministers know not how people stand affected when they come to hear the word, but God doth. And by the punishment of hypocrites it appears he is a jealous God, and one that cannot, that will not, be imposed upon.

Fifthly. The doom of those pretenders to prophecy, who give countenance to those pretenders to piety, ver. 9, 10. These hypocritical inquirers—though Ezekiel will give them no comfortable answer—yet hope to meet with some other prophets that will; and if they do, as perhaps they may, let them know that God permits those lying prophets to deceive them in part of punishment. "If the prophet" that flatters them "be deceived," and gives them hopes which there is no ground for, "I the Lord have deceived that prophet," have suffered the temptation to be laid before him, and suffered him to yield to it, and overruled it for the hardening those in their wicked courses that were resolved to go on in them. We are sure that God is not the author of sin; but we are as sure that he is the Lord of all, and the Judge of sinners, and often makes use of one wicked man to destroy another, and so of one wicked man to deceive another. Both are sins in him who doth them, and so they are not from God. Both are punishments to him to whom they are done, and so they are from God. We have a full instance of this in the story of Ahab's prophets, who were deceived by a lying spirit which God put into their mouths, 1 Kin. xxii. 23; and another in those whom God gives "up to strong delusions to believe a lie, because they receive not the love of the truth," 2 Thes. ii. 11. But read the fearful doom of the lying prophet: "I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him." When God hath served his own righteous purposes by him he shall be reckoned with for his unrighteous purposes; as when God had made use of the Chaldeans for the wasting of a sinful people, he justly punished them for their rage, so when he had made use of false prophets, and afterwards of false Christs, for the deceiving of a sinful people, he justly punished them for their falsehood. But herein we must acknowledge—as Calvin upon this place minds us—that God's judgments are a great deep, that we are incompetent judges of them; and though we cannot account for the equity of God's proceedings in the satisfying and silencing of every caviller, yet there is a day coming when he will be justified before all the world; and particularly in this instance, when the punishment of the prophet that flattered the hypocrite in his evil way shall be as the punishment of the hypocrite that seeketh to him, and bespeaks smooth things only, Isa. xxx. 10. The ditch shall be the same to the blind leader and the blind followers.

Sixthly. The good counsel that is given them for the preventing of this fearful doom; ver. 6, "Therefore repent, and turn yourselves from your idols." Let this separate between you and them, that they separate between you and God. Because they set God's face against you, do you turn away your faces from them? which notes not only forsaking them, but forsaking them with loathing and detestation. Turn from them as from abominations that you are sick of! And then you will be welcome to inquire of the Lord: "Come now, and let us reason together."

Seventhly. The good issue of all this, as to the house of Israel. Therefore the pretending prophets and the pretending saints shall perish together by the judgments of God, that, some being made examples, the body of the people may be reformed. "That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me," ver. 11. Note, The punishments of some are designed for the prevention of sin, that others may hear, and fear, and take warning. When we see what comes of those that go astray from God, we should thereby be engaged to keep close to him; and if the house of Israel go not astray, they will not be polluted any more. Note, Sin is a polluting thing; it renders the sinner odious in the eyes of the pure and holy God, and in his own eyes too whenever conscience is awakened. And therefore they shall "no more be polluted, that they may be my people, and I may be their God." Note, Those whom God takes into covenant with himself, must first be cleansed from the pollutions of sin; and those who are so cleansed shall not only be saved from ruin, but be entitled to all the privileges of God's people.

12 The word of the LORD came again to me, saying, 13 Son of man, when the land sinneth against me by trespassing grievously, then will I stretch out mine hand upon it, and will break the staff of the bread thereof, and will send famine upon it, and will cut off man and beast from it: 14 Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord GOD. 15 If I cause noisome beasts to pass through the land, and they spoil it, so that it be desolate, that no man may pass through because of the beasts: 16 Though these three men were in it, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters; they only shall be delivered, but the land shall be desolate. 17 Or if I bring a sword upon that land, and say, Sword, go through the land; so that I cut off man and beast from it: 18 Though these three men were in it, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters, but they only shall be delivered themselves. 19 Or if I send a pestilence into that land, and pour out my fury upon it in blood, to cut off from it man and beast: 20 Though Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their righteousness. 21 For thus saith the Lord GOD; How much more when I send my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem, the sword, and the famine, and the noisome beast, and the pestilence, to cut off from it man and beast? 22 Yet, behold, therein shall be left a remnant that shall be brought forth, both sons and daughters: behold, they shall come forth unto you, and ye shall see their way and their doings: and ye shall be comforted concerning the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, even concerning all that I have brought upon it. 23 And they shall comfort you, when ye see their ways and their doings: and ye shall know that I have not done without cause all that I have done in it, saith the Lord GOD.

The scope of these verses is to shew,

First. That national sins bring national judgments. When virtue is ruined and laid waste, every thing else will soon be ruined and laid waste too; ver. 13, "When the land sinneth against me," when vice and wickedness become epidemical,—when the land sinneth by trespassing grievously, when the sinners are become very numerous, and their sins very heinous, when gross impieties and immoralities universally prevail,—then will I stretch forth mine hand upon it, for the punishment of it. The Divine power shall be vigorously and openly exerted; the judgments shall be extended and stretched forth to all the corners of the land, to all the concerns and interests of the nation: grievous sins bring grievous plagues.

Secondly. That God has variety of sore judgments wherewith to punish sinful nations, and he has them all at command, and inflicts which he pleaseth. He did indeed refer it to David what judgment he would be punished with for his sin in numbering the people; for any of them would serve to answer the end, which was to lessen the numbers he was proud of. But David in effect referred it to God again: "Let us fall into the hands of the Lord;" let him choose with what rod we shall be beaten. But he useth a variety of judgments, that it may appear he hath a universal dominion, and that in all our concerns we may see our dependence on him. Four sore judgments are here instanced in: 1. Famine. The denying and withholding of common mercies is itself judgment enough; there needs no more to make a people miserable. God needs not bring the staff of oppression; it is but breaking the staff of bread, and the work is soon done. He cuts off man and beast by cutting off the provisions which nature makes for both in the annual products of the earth. God breaks the staff of bread when, though we have bread, yet we are not nourished and strengthened by it; Hag. i. 6, "Ye eat, but ye have not enough." 2. Hurtful beasts, noisome and noxious, either as poisonous or as ravenous. God can make these to pass through the land, to increase in all parts of it, and to bereave it, not only of the tame cattle, preying upon their flocks and herds, but of their people, devouring men, women, and children, so that "no man may pass through because of the beasts;" none dare travel, even in the high-roads, for fear of being pulled in pieces by lions, or other beasts of prey, as the children of Bethel by two bears. Note, When men revolt from their allegiance to God, and rebel against him, it is just with God that the inferior creatures should rise up in arms against man, Lev. xxvi. 22. 3. War. God often chastiseth sinful nations by bringing a sword upon them, the sword of a foreign enemy, and he gives it its commission, and orders what execution it shall do; ver. 17, "He saith, Sword, go through the land." It is bad enough if the sword do but enter into the borders of a land, but much worse when it goes through the bowels of a land; then by it God cuts off man and beast, horse and foot. What execution the sword doth God doth by it; for it is his sword, and it acts as he directs. 4. Pestilence. A dreadful disease which hath sometimes depopulated cities; by it God "pours out his fury in blood," that is, in death. The pestilence kills as effectually as if the blood were shed by the sword; for it is poisoned by the disease,—the sickness we call it. See how miserable the case of mankind is, that lies thus exposed to deaths in various shapes; see how dangerous the case of sinners is, against whom God hath so many ways of fighting, so that, though they escape one judgment, God has another waiting for them.

Thirdly. That when God's professing people revolt from him, and rebel against him, they may justly expect a complication of judgments to fall upon them. God has various ways of contending with a sinful nation; but if Jerusalem, the holy city, become a harlot, God will send upon her all his four sore judgments, ver. 21; for the nearer any are to God in name and profession the more severely will he reckon with them if they reproach that worthy name by which they are called, and give the lie to that profession they shall be punished seven times more.

Fourthly. That it is possible there may be, and commonly there are, some few very good men, even in those places that by sin are ripened for ruin. It is no foreign supposition, that even in a land that has trespassed grievously there may be three such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job. Daniel was now living, and at this time scarce arrived to the prime of his eminency, but he was already famous, at least this word of God concerning him would, without fail, make him so; but he was carried away into captivity with the first of all, Dan. i. 1. Some of the better sort of people in Jerusalem might perhaps think, if Daniel, of whose fame, in the king of Babylon's court, they had heard much, had but continued in Jerusalem, it had been spared for his sake, as the magicians in Babylon were. No, saith God, though you had him who was so eminently good in bad times and places, as Noah in the old world, and Job in the land of Uz, yet a reprieve should not be obtained. In the places that are most corrupt, and in the ages that are most degenerate, yet there is a remnant which God reserves for himself, and which still hold fast their integrity, and stand fair for the honour of delivering the land, as the innocent are said to do, Job xxii. 30.

Fifthly. That God oftentimes spares very wicked places for the sake of a few godly people in them. This is implied here as the expectation of Jerusalem's friends in the day of its distress. Surely God will stay his controversy with us; for are there not some among us that are emptying the measure of national guilt by their prayers, as others are filling it by their sins? And, rather than God will destroy the righteous with the wicked, he will preserve the wicked with the righteous. If Sodom might have been spared for the sake of ten good men, sure Jerusalem may.

Sixthly. That such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job will prevail, if any can, to turn away the wrath of God from a sinful people. Noah was a perfect man, and kept his integrity, when all flesh had corrupted their way; and for his sake his family, though one of them was wicked Ham, was saved in the ark. Job was a great example of piety, and mighty in prayer for his children, for his friends; and God turned his captivity when he prayed. Those were very ancient examples, before Moses that great intercessor; and therefore God mentions them, to intimate that he had some very peculiar favourites long before the Jewish nation was formed and founded, and would have such when it was ruined; for which reason, it should seem, those names were made use of rather than Moses, Aaron, or Samuel. And yet, lest any should think that God was partial in his respects to the ancient days, here is a modern instance, a living one, placed between those two that were the glories of antiquity, and he now a captive, and that is Daniel, to teach us not to lessen the useful good men of our own day, by over magnifying the ancients. Let the children of the captivity know that Daniel their neighbour and companion in tribulation, being a man of great humility, piety, and zeal for God, and instant and constant in prayer, had as good an interest in heaven as Noah or Job had. Why may not God raise up as great and good men now as he did formerly, and do as much for them?

Seventhly. That when the sin of a people is come to its height, and the decree is gone forth for their ruin, the piety and prayers of the best men shall not prevail to make up the controversy. This is here asserted again and again, that though these three men were in Jerusalem at this time, yet "they should deliver neither son nor daughter;" not so much as the little ones should be spared for their sakes, as the little ones of Israel were upon the prayer of Moses, Num. xiv. 31. No, "the land shall be desolate," and God will not hear their prayers for it, "though Moses and Samuel stood before him," Jer. xv. 1. Note, Abused patience will turn at last into inexorable wrath. And it should seem as if God would be more inexorable in Jerusalem's case than in another, ver. 6, because, besides the Divine patience, they had enjoyed greater privileges than any people beside, which were the aggravations of their sin.

Eighthly. That though pious praying men may not prevail to deliver others, yet they shall deliver their own souls by their righteousness; so that, though they may suffer in the common calamity, yet to them the property of it is altered. It is not that to them that it is to the wicked; it is unstung, and doth them no hurt; it is sanctified, and doth them good. Sometimes their souls, that is, their lives, are remarkably delivered, and given them for a prey. However their souls, that is, their spiritual interests, are secured; if their bodies be not delivered, yet their souls are. "Riches" indeed "profit not in the day of wrath, but righteousness delivers from death," from so great a death, so many deaths, as are here threatened. This should encourage us to keep our integrity in times of common apostacy; that if we do so, we shall be "hid in the day of the Lord's anger."

Ninthly. That, even then when God makes the greatest desolations by his judgments, he reserves some to be the monuments of his mercy, ver. 22, 23. In Jerusalem itself, though marked for utter ruin, yet "there shall be left a remnant," that shall not be cut off by any of those sore judgments before mentioned, but shall be carried into captivity, both sons and daughters, that shall be the seed of a new generation; the young ones that were not grown up to such an obstinacy in sin as their fathers were, who were therefore cut off as incurable. These shall be brought forth out of the ruins of Jerusalem by the victorious enemy. And, behold, "They shall come forth to you that are in captivity;" they shall make a virtue of necessity, and shall come the more willingly into Babylon, because so many of their friends are gone thither before them, and are there ready to receive them. And when they come, "ye shall see their ways and their doings;" that is, you shall hear them make a free and ingenuous confession of the sins they had formerly been guilty of, and an humble profession of repentance for them, with promises of reformation; and you shall see instances of their reformation, shall see what good their affliction hath done them, and how prudently and patiently they carry themselves under it. The good effect their narrow escape shall have upon them; it shall change their temper and conversation, and make them new men. And this will redound, 1. To the satisfaction of their brethren; "They shall comfort you when ye see their ways." Note, It is a very comfortable sight to see people when they are under the rod, repenting and humbling themselves, justifying God, and accepting the punishment of their iniquity. When we sorrow, as we ought to do, for the afflictions of others, it is a great comfort to us in our sorrow to see them improving their afflictions, and making a good use of them. When those captives told their friends how bad they had been, and how righteous God was in bringing these judgments upon them, it made them very easy, and helped to reconcile them to the calamities of Jerusalem, to the justice of God, in punishing his own people so, and to the goodness of God, which now appeared to have had kind intentions in all. And thus "ye shall be comforted concerning all the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem;" and, when you better understand the thing, shall not have such direful apprehensions concerning it as you have had. Note, It is a debt we owe to our brethren, if we have got good by our affliction, to comfort them by letting them know it. 2. It will redound to the honour of God. "Ye shall know that I have not done it without cause," not without a just provocation, and yet not without a gracious design, "all that I have done in it." Note, When afflictions have done their work, and have accomplished that for which they were sent, then will appear the wisdom and goodness of God in sending them; and God will not only be justified, but glorified in them.

CHAPTER XV.

Ezekiel has again and again, in God's name, foretold the utter ruin of Jerusalem; but it should seem he finds it hard to reconcile himself to it, and to acquiesce in the will of God in this severe dispensation; and therefore God takes various methods to satisfy him not only that it shall be so, but that there is no remedy: it must be so, it is fit it should be so. Here, in this short chapter, he shews him (probably with design that he should tell the people) that it was as requisite Jerusalem should be destroyed as that the dead and withered branches of a vine should be cut off and thrown into the fire. I. The similitude is very elegant, ver. 1—5. But, II. The reddition of the similitude is very dreadful, ver. 6—8.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, What is the vine tree more than any tree,
Or than a branch which is among the trees of the forest?
3 Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work?
Or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?
4 Behold, it is cast into the fire for fuel;

The fire devoureth both the ends of it,
And the midst of it is burned.
Is it meet for any work?
5 Behold, when it was whole, it was meet for no work:
How much less shall it be meet yet for any work,
When the fire hath devoured it, and it is burned?
6 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
As the vine tree among the trees of the forest,
Which I have given to the fire for fuel,
So will I give the inhabitants of Jerusalem.
7 And I will set my face against them;
They shall go out from one fire,
And another fire shall devour them;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I set my face against them.
8 And I will make the land desolate, [GOD.
Because they have committed a trespass, saith the Lord

The prophet, we may suppose, was thinking what a glorious city Jerusalem was above any city in the world. It was the crown and joy of the whole earth and therefore what pity it was that it should be destroyed. It was a noble structure, the city of God, and the city of Israel's solemnities. But if these were the thoughts of his heart, God here returns answer to them, by comparing Jerusalem to a vine.

First. It is true, if a vine be fruitful, it is a most valuable tree, none more so. It was one of those that were courted to have dominion over the trees, and the fruit of it is such as cheers God and man, Jud. ix. 12, 13; it "makes glad the heart," Ps. civ. 15. So "Jerusalem was planted a choice and noble vine, wholly a right seed," Jer. ii. 21; and, if it had brought forth fruit suitable to its character as a holy city, it would have been the glory both of God and Israel. It was a vine which God's right hand had planted, a branch out of a dry ground, which, though its original was mean and despicable, God had made strong for himself, Ps. lxxx. 15, to be to him for a name, and for a praise.

Secondly. But if it be not fruitful it is good for nothing; it is as worthless and useless a product of the earth as even thorns and briars are. "What is the vine-tree," if you take the tree by itself, without consideration of the fruit? "What is it more than any tree," that it should have so much care taken of it, and so much cost laid out upon it? What is a branch of the vine, though it spread more "than a branch which is among the trees of the forest," where it grows neglected and exposed? Or, as some read it, 'What is the vine more than any tree, if the branch of it be as the trees of the forest?' that is, if it bear no fruit, as forest trees seldom do; being designed for timber trees, not fruit trees. Now there are some fruit trees which, if they do not bear, yet the wood of them is of good use, and may be made to turn to a good account. But the vine is none of those; if that do not answer its end, as a fruit tree, it is worth nothing for a timber tree. Observe,

1. How this similitude is expressed here. The wild vine, that is among the trees of the forest, or the empty vine, (which Israel is compared to, Hos. x. 1,) that bears no more fruit than a forest tree, is good for nothing, it is as useless as a briar, and more so, for that will add some sharpness to the thorny hedge, which the vine branch will not. He shews, 1st. That it is fit for no use. The wood of it is not taken to do any work; one cannot so much as "make a pin of it to hang a vessel upon," ver. 2. See how variously the gifts of nature are dispensed for the service of man: among plants, the roots of some, the seeds or fruits of others, the leaves of others, and of some the stalks, are most serviceable to us: so among trees, some are strong, and not fruitful, as the oaks and cedars; others weak, but very fruitful, as the vine, which is unsightly, low, and depending, yet of great use. Rachel is comely, but barren; Leah homely, but fruitful. 2nd. That therefore it is made use of for fuel; it will serve to heat the oven with. Because it is not meet for any work, it is cast into the fire, ver. 4. When it is good for nothing else, it is useful this way, and answers a very needful intention, for fuel is a thing we must have; and to burn any thing for fuel which is good for other work is ill husbandry; "To what purpose is this waste?" The unfruitful vine is disposed of the same way with the briars and thorns, which are rejected, and whose end is to be burned, Heb. vi. 8; and what care is taken of it then? If a piece of solid timber be kindled, somebody perhaps may snatch it as a brand out of the burning, and say, it is pity to burn it, for it may be put to some better use. But if the branch of a vine be on fire, and, as usual, both the ends of it and the middle are kindled together, nobody goes about to save it. "When it was whole it was meet for no work, much less when the fire has devoured it," ver. 5; even the ashes of it are not worth saving.

2. How this similitude is applied to Jerusalem.

1st. That holy city was become unprofitable, and good for nothing. It had been as the vine-tree among the trees of the vineyard, abounding in the fruits of righteousness to the glory of God. When religion flourished there, and the pure worship of God was kept up, many a joyful vintage was then gathered in from it. And while it continued so God made a hedge about it; it was his "pleasant plant," Isa. v. 7, he watered it every moment, and kept it night and day, Isa. xxvii. 3. But it was now become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, of a wild vine, such as we read of, 2 Kin. iv. 39, "a vine-tree among the trees of the forest," which, being wild, "bringeth forth wild grapes," Isa. v. 4, which are not only of no use, but are nauseous and noxious, Deu. xxxii. 32, "their grapes are grapes of gall, and their clusters are bitter." It is explained, ver. 8, "They have trespassed a trespass;" that is, they have treacherously prevaricated with God, and perfidiously apostatized from him, for so the word signifies. Note, Professors of religion, if they do not live up to their profession, but contradict it, if they degenerate and depart from it, are the most unprofitable creatures in the world, like the salt that has lost its savour, and is thenceforth good for nothing, Mar. ix. 50. Other nations were famed for valour or politics, some for war, others for trade, and retained their credit; but the Jewish nation being famous for a holy people, when they lost their holiness, and became wicked, were thenceforth good for nothing: with that they lost all their credit and usefulness, and became the most base and despicable people under the sun, "trodden under foot of the Gentiles." Daniel and other pious Jews were of great use to their generation; but the idolatrous Jews then, and the unbelieving Jews now, since the preaching of the Gospel, have been, and are, of no common service, not fit for any work.

2nd. Being so, it is given to the fire for fuel, ver. 6. Note, Those that are not fruitful to the glory of God's grace shall be fuel to the fire of his wrath; and thus, if they give not honour to him, he will get him honour upon them, honour that will shine bright in that flaming fire by which impenitent sinners will be for ever consumed. He will not be a loser at last by any of his creatures; "The Lord hath made all things for himself, yea even the wicked," that would not otherwise be for him, "for the day of evil," Pr. xvi. 4. And they who would not glorify him as the God to whom duty belongs, in them he will be glorified as the God to whom vengeance belongs. The fire of God's wrath had before devoured both the ends of the Jewish nation, ver. 4. Samaria, and the cities of Judah, and now Jerusalem, that was the midst of it, was thrown into the fire to be burnt too; for it is meet for no work, it will not be wrought upon by any of the methods God has taken to be serviceable to him. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were like a vine-branch, rotten and awkward; and therefore; ver. 7, "I will set my face against them" to thwart all their counsels, as they set their faces against God to contradict his word, and defeat all his designs. It is decreed, the consumption is determined, "I will make the land quite desolate;" and therefore, "when they go out from one fire, another fire shall devour them," ver. 7. The end of one judgment shall be the beginning of another, and their escape from one only a reprieve till another comes. They shall go from misery in their own country to misery in Babylon. They that kept out of the way of the sword perished by famine or pestilence. When one descent of the Chaldean forces upon them was over, and they thought surely the bitterness of death is past, yet soon after they returned again with double violence, till they had made a full end. Thus "they shall know that I am the Lord," a God of almighty power, "when I set my face against them." Note, God shews himself to be the Lord by perfecting the destruction of his implacable enemies, as well as the deliverances of his obedient people. Those against whom God sets his face, though they may come out of one trouble little hurt, will fall into another; though they come out of the pit, will be taken in the snare, Isa. xxiv. 18; though they escape the sword of Hazael, will fall by that of Jehu, 1 Kin. xix. 17; for evil pursues sinners. Nay, though they go out from the fire of temporal judgments, and seem to die in peace, yet there is an everlasting fire that will devour them; for when God judgeth, first or last, he will overcome, and will be known by the judgments which he executeth: see Mat. iii. 10; Jno. xv. 6.

CHAPTER XVI.

Still God is justifying himself in the desolations he is about to bring upon Jerusalem; and very largely in this chapter he shews the prophet, and orders him to shew the people, that he did but punish them as their sins deserved. In the foregoing chapter he had compared Jerusalem to an unfruitful vine, that was fit for nothing but the fire. In this chapter he compares it to an adulteress, that, in justice, ought to be abandoned and exposed. And he must therefore shew the people their abominations, that they might see how little reason they had to complain of the judgments they were under. In this long discourse are set forth, I. The despicable and deplorable beginnings of that church and nation, ver. 3—5. II. The many honours and favours God had bestowed upon them, ver. 6—14. III. Their treacherous and ungrateful departures from him to the services and worship of idols, here represented by the most impudent whoredom, ver. 15—34. IV. A threatening of terrible destroying judgments which God would bring upon them for this sin, ver. 35—43. V. An aggravation both of their sin and of their punishment, by comparison with Sodom and Samaria, ver. 44—59. VI. A promise of mercy, in the close, which God would shew to a penitent remnant, ver. 60—63. And this is designed for admonition to us.

AGAIN the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, cause Jerusalem to know her abominations, 3 And say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD unto Jerusalem;
Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan;
Thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite.
4 And as for thy nativity, [cut,
In the day thou wast born thy navel was not
Neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; [all.
Thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at 5 None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee,
To have compassion upon thee;
But thou wast cast out in the open field, to the lothing of thy person,
In the day that thou wast born.

CHILD SWADDLED.

Ezekiel is now among the captives in Babylon; but, as Jeremiah at Jerusalem wrote for the use of the captives, though they had Ezekiel upon the spot with them, Jer. xxix., so Ezekiel wrote for the use of Jerusalem, though Jeremiah himself was resident there; and yet they were far from looking upon it as an affront to one another, or interfering with one another's business, for ministers have need of one another's help, both by preaching and writing. Jeremiah wrote to the captives for their consolation, which was the thing they needed; Ezekiel here is directed to write to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for their conviction and humiliation, which was the thing they needed. This is his commission; ver. 2, "Cause Jerusalem to know her abominations," that is, her sins; set them in order before her. Note, 1. Sins are not only provocations which God is angry at, but abominations which he hates, as contrary to his nature, and which we ought to hate, Jer. xliv. 4. 2. The sins of Jerusalem are in a special manner so. The practice of profaneness appears most odious in those that make a profession of religion. 3. Though Jerusalem is a place of great knowledge, yet she is loath to know her abominations. So partial are men in their own favour, that they are hardly made to see and own their own badness, but deny it, palliate or extenuate it. 4. It is requisite that we should know our sins, that we may confess them, and may justify God in what he brings upon us for them. 5. It is the work of ministers to cause sinners, sinners in Jerusalem, to know their abominations; to set before them the glass of the law, that in it they may see their own deformities and defilements; to tell them plainly of their faults: "Thou art the man." Now, that Jerusalem may be made to know her abominations, and particularly the abominable ingratitude she had been guilty of, it was requisite she should be put in mind of the great things God had done for her, as the aggravations of her ill carriage towards him. And, to magnify those favours, she is in these verses made to know the meanness and baseness of her original; from what poor beginnings God raised her, and how unworthy she was of his favour, and of the honour he had put upon her. Jerusalem is here put for the Jewish church and nation, which is here compared to an outcast child, baseborn and abandoned, which the mother herself has no affection or concern for.

First. The extraction of the Jewish nation was mean. "Thy birth is of the land of Canaan," ver. 3; that is, thou hadst from the very first the spirit and disposition of a Canaanite. The patriarchs dwelt in Canaan, and they were there but strangers and sojourners, had no possession, no power, not one foot of ground of their own, but a burying-place. Abraham and Sarah were indeed their father and mother, but they were only inmates with the Amorites and Hittites, who, having the dominion, seemed to be as parents to the seed of Abraham. Witness the court Abraham made to the children of Heth, Gen. xxiii. 4, 8, and the dependence they had upon their neighbours the Canaanites, and the fear they were in of them, Gen. xiii. 7; xxxiv. 30. If the patriarchs at their first coming to Canaan had conquered it, and made themselves masters of it, it had put an honour upon their family, and had looked great in history; but instead of that they went "from one nation to another," Ps. cv. 13, as tenants from one farm to another, almost as beggars from one door to another, when they were but few in number, yea very few. And yet this was not the worst: their fathers had served other gods in Ur of the Chaldees, Jos. xxiv. 2; even in Jacob's family there were strange gods, Gen. xxxv. 2. Thus early had they a genius leading them to idolatry, and upon this account their ancestors were Amorites and Hittites.

Secondly. When they first began to multiply, their condition was really very deplorable, like that of a new-born child, which must of necessity die from the womb, if the knees prevent it not, Job iii. 11, 12. The children of Israel, when they began to increase into a people, and became considerable, were thrown out from the country that was intended for them, a famine drove them thence. Egypt was the open field into which they were cast; there they had no protection or countenance from the government they were under; but, on the contrary, were ruled with rigour; and their lives embittered. They had no encouragement given them to build up their families, no help to build up their estates, no friends or allies to strengthen their interests. Joseph, that had been the shepherd and stone of Israel, was dead. The king of Egypt, that should have been kind to them for Joseph's sake, set himself to destroy this man-child "as soon as it was born," Rev. xii. 4; ordered all the males to be slain, which, it is likely, occasioned the exposing of many, as well as Moses, to which perhaps the similitude here has reference. The founders of nations and cities had occasion for all the arts and arms they were masters of, set their heads on work by policies and stratagems to preserve and nurse up their infant states; tantæ molis erat Romanam condre gentem,—'so vast were the efforts requisite to the establishment of the Roman name,'—Virg. But the nation of Israel had no such care taken of it, no such pains taken with it, as Athens, Sparta, Rome, and other commonwealths had when they were first founded; but, on the contrary, was doomed to destruction, like an infant new born, exposed to wind and weather, the navel string not cut, the poor babe not washed, not clothed, not swaddled, because not pitied, ver. 4, 5. Note, We owe the preservation of our infant lives to that natural pity and compassion which the God of nature has put into the hearts of parents and nurses towards new-born children. This infant is said to be cast out to the loathing of her person. It was a sign she was loathed by those that bare her; and she appeared loathsome to all that looked upon her. The Israelites were an abomination to the Egyptians, as we find, Gen. xliii. 32; xlvi. 34. Some think this refers to the corrupt and vicious disposition of that people from their beginning. They were not only "the weakest and fewest of all people," Deu. vii. 7, but the worst and most ill-humoured of all people. "God giveth thee this good land, not for thy righteousness, for thou art a stiff-necked people," Deu. ix. 6. And Moses tells them there; ver. 24, "You have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you." They were not suppled, nor washed, nor swaddled; they were not at all tractable or manageable, nor cast into any good shape. God took them to be his people, not because he saw any thing in them inviting or promising, but so it seemed good in his sight; and it is a very apt illustration of the miserable condition of all the children of men by nature. "As for our nativity, in the day that we were born" we were shapen in iniquity, and conceived in sin; our understandings darkened, our minds alienated from the life of God, polluted with sin, which rendered us loathsome in the eyes of God. "Marvel not" then that we are told "we must be born again."

6 And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood,
I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live;
Yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live.
7 I have caused thee to multiply as the bud of the field,
And thou hast increased and waxen great,
And thou art come to excellent ornaments:
Thy breasts are fashioned, and thine hair is grown,
Whereas thou wast naked and bare.

Which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord GOD.

In these verses we have an account of the great things which God did for the Jewish nation, in raising them up by degrees to be very considerable.

First. God saved them from the ruin they were upon the brink of in Egypt; ver. 6, "When I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood," loathed, and abandoned, and appointed to die, as sheep for the slaughter, "then I said unto thee, Live." I designed thee for life when thou wast doomed to destruction, and resolved to save thee from death. Those shall live to whom God commands life. God looked upon the world of mankind as thus cast off, thus cast out, thus polluted, thus weltering in blood, and his thoughts towards it were thoughts of good, designing it life, and that more abundantly. By converting grace he saith to the soul, "Live."

Secondly. He looked upon them with kindness and a tender affection. Not only pitied them, but set his love upon them; which was unaccountable, for there was nothing lovely in them; but "I looked upon thee, and behold thy time was the time of love," ver. 8. It was the kindness and love of God our Saviour that sent Christ to redeem us, that sends the Spirit to sanctify us, that brought us out of a state of nature into a state of grace. That was a time of love indeed, distinguishing love, when God manifested his love to us, and courted our love to him; "Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour," Cant. viii. 10.

Thirdly. He took them under his protection. "I spread my skirt over thee," to shelter thee from wind and weather, and "to cover thy nakedness, that the shame of it might not appear." Boaz spread his skirt over Ruth in token of the special favour he designed her, Ru. iii. 9. God took them in his care, as an eagle bears her young ones upon her wings, Deu. xxxii. 11, 12. When God owned them for his people, and sent Moses to Egypt to deliver them, which was an expression of the good-will of him that dwelt in the bush, then he spread his skirt over them.

Fourthly. He cleared them from the reproachful character which their bondage in Egypt laid them under; ver. 9, "Then washed I thee with water," to make thee clean, "and anointed thee with oil," to make thee sweet, and supple thee. All the disgrace of their slavery was rolled away when they were brought with a high hand, and a stretched-out arm, "into the glorious liberty of the children of God;" when God saith, "Israel is my son, my firstborn, let my people go, that they may serve me." That word, backed as it was with so many works of wonder, "thoroughly washed away their blood;" and, when God led them under the convoy of the pillar of cloud and fire, he "spread his skirt over them."

Fifthly. He multiplied them, and built them up into a people. This is here mentioned, ver. 7, before his spreading his skirt over them, because their numbers increased exceedingly, while they were yet bond slaves in Egypt. They "multiplied as the bud of the field" in spring time; they "waxed great, exceeding mighty," Ex. i. 7, 20; their "breasts were fashioned" when they were formed into distinct tribes, and had officers of their own, Ex. v. 19. Their hair grew when they grew numerous, whereas they had been naked and bare, very few, and therefore contemptible.

Sixthly. He admitted them into covenant with himself. See what glorious nuptials this poor, forlorn infant is preferred to at last; how she is dignified, who at first had scarce her life given her for a prey. "I sware unto thee, and entered into covenant with thee." This was done at mount Sinai, when the covenant between God and Israel was ratified and sealed; then "Thou becamest mine." God called them his people, and himself the God of Israel. Note, Those to whom God gives spiritual life he takes into covenant with himself; by that covenant they become his: his subjects and servants, that speaks their duty; his portion, his treasure, that speaks their privilege. And it is confirmed with an oath, that we might have strong consolation.

Seventhly. He beautified and adorned them. This maid cannot forget her ornaments, and she is gratified with abundance of them, ver. 10—13. We need not be particular in the application of these. Her wardrobe was well furnished with rich apparel; they had embroidered work to wear, shoes of fine badgers' skins, linen girdles, and silk veils, bracelets and necklaces, jewels and earrings, and even a beautiful crown, or coronet. Perhaps this may refer to the jewels and other rich goods which they took from the Egyptians; which might well be spoken of thus long after as a merciful circumstance of their deliverance, when it was spoken of long before, Gen. xv. 14, "They shall come out with great substance." Or, it may be taken figuratively, for all those blessings of heaven which adorned both their church and state. In a little time they came to excellent ornaments, ver. 7. The laws and ordinances which God gave them were to them as ornaments of grace to the head, and chains about the neck, Pr. i. 9. God's sanctuary which he set up among them was a beautiful crown upon their head, it was the beauty of holiness.

Eighthly. He fed them with abundance, with plenty, with dainty. "Thou didst eat fine flour, and honey, and oil;" manna, angels' food; "honey out of the rock, oil out of the flinty rock." In Canaan they did eat bread to the full, the finest of the wheat, Deu. xxxii. 13, 14. Those whom God takes into covenant with himself are fed with the bread of life, clothed with the robe of righteousness, adorned with the graces and comforts of the Spirit; "the hidden man of the heart is that which is incorruptible."

Ninthly. He gave them a great reputation among their neighbours, and made them considerable; acceptable to their friends and allies, and formidable to their adversaries. "Thou didst prosper into a kingdom," ver. 13; which speaks both dignity and dominion; and, ver. 14, "Thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty." The nations about had their eye upon them, and admired them for the excellent laws by which they were governed, the privilege they had of access to God, Deu. iv. 7, 8. Solomon's wisdom and Solomon's temple were very much the renown of that nation; and, if we put all the privileges of the Jewish church and kingdom together, we must own it was the most accomplished beauty of all the nations of the earth. The beauty of it was perfect, you could not name the thing that would be the honour of a people, but it was to be found in Israel, in David's and Solomon's time, when that kingdom was in its zenith: piety, learning, wisdom, justice, victory, peace, wealth; and all sure to continue if they had kept close to God. "It was perfect," saith God, "through my comeliness which I had put upon thee;" that is, through the beauty of their holiness, as they were a people set apart for God, and devoted to him, to be to him "for a name, for a praise, and for a glory." This was it that put a lustre upon all their other honours, and was indeed the perfection of their beauty. We may apply this spiritually: sanctified souls are truly beautiful; they are so in God's sight, and they themselves may take the comfort of it. But God must have all the glory, for they were by nature deformed and polluted; and whatever comeliness they have it is that which God has put upon them, and beautified them with, and he will be well pleased with the work of his own hands.

15 But thou didst trust in thine own beauty,
And playedst the harlot because of thy renown,
And pouredst out thy fornications on every one that passed by; his it was.
16 And of thy garments thou didst take,
And deckedst thy high places with divers colours,
And playedst the harlot thereupon:
The like things shall not come, neither shall it be so.
17 Thou hast also taken thy fair jewels
Of my gold and of my silver, which I had given thee,
And madest to thyself images of men,
And didst commit whoredom with them,
18 And tookest thy broidered garments, and coveredst them:
And thou hast set mine oil and mine incense before them.
19 My meat also which I gave thee,
Fine flour, and oil, and honey, wherewith I fed thee,
Thou hast even set it before them for a sweet savour:
And thus it was, saith the Lord GOD.
20 Moreover thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters,
Whom thou hast borne unto me,
And these hast thou sacrificed unto them to be devoured.
Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter,
21 That thou hast slain my children, and delivered them
To cause them to pass through the fire for them?
22 And in all thine abominations and thy whoredoms
Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth,
When thou wast naked and bare, and wast polluted in thy blood.
23 And it came to pass after all thy wickedness,
(Woe, woe unto thee! saith the Lord GOD;)
24 That thou hast also built unto thee an eminent place,
And hast made thee an high place in every street.
25 Thou hast built thy high place at every head of the way,
And hast made thy beauty to be abhorred,
And hast opened thy feet to every one that passed by,
And multiplied thy whoredoms.
26 Thou hast also committed fornication
With the Egyptians thy neighbours, great of flesh;
And hast increased thy whoredoms, to provoke me to anger. [thee,
27 Behold, therefore I have stretched out my hand over
And have diminished thine ordinary food,
And delivered thee unto the will of them that hate thee,
The daughters of the Philistines, which are ashamed of thy lewd way.
28 Thou hast played the whore also with the Assyrians,
Because thou wast unsatiable;
Yea, thou hast played the harlot with them,
And yet couldest not be satisfied.
29 Thou hast moreover multiplied thy fornication
In the land of Canaan unto Chaldea;
And yet thou wast not satisfied herewith.
30 How weak is thine heart, saith the Lord GOD,
Seeing thou doest all these things,
The work of an imperious whorish woman;
31 In that thou buildest thine eminent place in the head of every way,
And makest thine high place in every street;
And hast not been as an harlot, in that thou scornest hire;
32 But as a wife that committeth adultery,
Which taketh strangers instead of her husband!

But thou givest thy gifts to all thy lovers, [side
And hirest them, that they may come unto thee on every

Whereas none followeth thee to commit whoredoms:
And in that thou givest a reward, and no reward is given
Therefore thou art contrary. [unto thee,

In these verses we have an account of the great wickedness of the people of Israel, especially in worshipping idols, notwithstanding the great favours that God had conferred upon them, by which one would think they should have been for ever engaged to him. This wickedness of theirs is here represented by the lewd and scandalous conversation of that beautiful maid which was rescued from ruin, brought up and well provided for by a kind friend and benefactor, that had been in all respects as a father and a husband to her.

First. Their idolatry was the great provoking sin that they were guilty of. It began in the latter end of Solomon's time, (for from Samuel's till then I do not remember that we read any thing of it,) and from thence continued more or less the crying sin of that nation till the captivity. And though it now and then met with some check from the reforming kings, yet it was never totally suppressed, and for the most part appeared to a high degree impudent and bare-faced. They not only worshipped the true God by images, as the ten tribes by the calves at Dan and Bethel, but they worshipped false gods, Baal and Moloch, and all the senseless rabble of the pagan deities.

Secondly. This is that which is here all along represented (as often elsewhere) under the similitude of whoredom and adultery. 1. Because it is the violation of a marriage covenant with God, forsaking him, and embracing the bosom of a stranger; it is giving that affection and service to his rivals which are due to him alone. 2. Because it is the corrupting and defiling of the mind, and the enslaving of the spiritual part of the man, and subjecting it to the power and dominion of sense, as whoredom is. 3. Because it debaucheth the conscience, sears and hardens it; and those who by their idolatries dishonour the Divine nature, and change the truth of God into a lie, and his glory into shame, God justly punisheth by giving them over to a reprobate mind, to dishonour the human nature with vile affections, Rom. i. 23, &c. It is a besotting, bewitching sin; and when men are given up to it they seldom recover themselves out of the snare. 4. Because it is a shameful, scandalous sin, for those that have joined themselves to the Lord to join themselves to an idol. Now here observe,

1st. What were the causes of this sin. How came the people of God to be drawn away to the service of idols? How came a virgin so well taught, so well educated, to be debauched? Who would have thought it? But, First. They grew proud; ver. 15, "Thou trustedst to thy beauty," and didst expect that that should make thee an interest, and didst "play the harlot because of thy renown." They thought, because they were so complimented and admired by their neighbours, that, farther to ingratiate themselves with them, and return their compliments, they must join with them in their worship, and conform themselves to their usages. Solomon admitted idolatry to gratify his wives and their relations. Note, Abundance of young people are ruined by pride, and particularly pride in their beauty; rara est concordia formæ atque pudicitiæ,—'beauty and chastity are seldom associated.' Secondly. They forgot their beginning; ver. 22, "Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth;" how poor, and mean and despicable thou wast, and what great things

God did for thee, and what lasting obligations he laid upon thee thereby. Note, It would be an effectual check to our pride and sensuality to consider what we are, and how much we are beholden to the free grace of God. Thirdly. They were weak in understanding and in resolution; ver. 30, "How weak is thy heart, seeing thou dost all these things?" Note, The strength of men's lusts is an evidence of the weakness of their hearts; they have no acquaintance with themselves, nor government of themselves. She is weak, and yet an imperious, whorish woman. Note, Those that are most foolish are commonly most imperious, and think themselves fit to manage others, when they are far from being able to manage themselves.

2nd. What were the particulars of it.

First. They worshipped all the idols that came in their way, all that they were ever courted to the worship of; they were at the beck of all their neighbours; ver. 15, "Thou pouredst out thy fornications on every one that passed by, his it was." They were ready to close with every temptation of this kind, though never so absurd. No foreign idol should be imported, no new god invented, but they were ready to catch at it, as a common strumpet, that prostitutes herself to all comers, and multiplies her whoredoms, ver. 25. Thus some common drunkards will be company for every one that puts up the finger to them. How weak are the hearts of such!

Secondly. They adorned their idol temples, and groves, and high places with the fine rich clothing that God had given them; ver. 16, 18, "Thou deckedst thy high places with divers colours;" with the coats of divers colours, like Joseph's, which God had given them as particular marks of his favour; and hast played the harlot," that is, worshipped idols thereupon. Of this he saith, "The like things shall not come, neither shall it be so;" that is, this is a thing by no means to be suffered; I will never endure such practices as these, without shewing my resentments.

Thirdly. They made images for worship of the jewels which God had given them; ver. 17, "The jewels of my gold and my silver which I had given thee." Note, It is God that gives us our gold and silver. The products of trade, of art and industry, are the gifts of God's providence to us, as well as the fruits of the earth. And what God gives us the use of he still retains a property in; it is my silver and my gold, though I have given it thee. It is his still, so as that we ought to serve and honour him with it, and are accountable to him for the disposal of it. Every penny has God's image upon it as well as Cæsar's. Would we make our silver and gold, our plate, money, jewels, the matter of our pride and contention, our covetousness and prodigality, if we duly considered that it is God's silver, and his gold? The Israelites began betimes to turn their jewels into idols, when Aaron made the golden calf of their earrings.

Fourthly. They served their idols with the good things which God gave them for their own use, and to serve him with; ver. 18, "Thou hast set mine oil and mine incense before them," upon their altars, as perfumes to these dunghill deities. "My meat, and fine flour, and oil," and that honey which Canaan flowed with, and "wherewith I fed thee," thou hast regaled them and their hungry priests with; hast made an offering of it to them, for a sweet savour, to purify them, and procure acceptance with them. "And thus it was, saith the Lord God;" it is too plain to be denied, too bad to be excused. "These things thou hast done;" he that knows all things knows it. See how fond they were of their idols, that they would part with that which was given them for the necessary subsistence of themselves and their families to honour them with; which may shame our niggardliness and strait-handedness in the service of the true and living God.

Fifthly. They had sacrificed their children to their idols. This is insisted upon here, and often elsewhere, as one of the worst instances of their idolatry; as indeed there was none in which the devil triumphed so much over the children of men, both their natural reason and their natural affection, as in this: see Jer. vii. 31; xix. 5; xxxii. 35. "Thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters," and not only made them to pass through the fire, or between two fires, in token of their being dedicated to Moloch, but thou hast "sacrificed them to be devoured," ver. 20. Never was there such an instance of the degenerating of the paternal authority into the most barbarous tyranny as this was. Yet that was not the worst of it: it was an irreparable wrong to God himself, who challenged a special property in their children, more than in their gold and silver, and their meat; They are "my children," ver. 21; "the sons and daughters which thou hast borne unto me," ver. 20. He is the Father of spirits, and rational souls are in a particular manner his; and, therefore, the taking away of life, human life, unjustly, is a mighty affront to the God of life. But the children of the Israelites were his by a farther right; they were the children of the covenant, born in God's house: he had said to Abraham, "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed." They had the seal of the covenant in their flesh from eight days old, they were to bear God's name, and keep up his church; to murder them was in the highest degree inhuman, but to murder them in honour of an idol was in the highest degree impious. One cannot think of it without the utmost indignation, to see the pitiless hands of the parents shedding the guiltless blood of their own children; and, by offering those pieces of themselves to the devil for dying sacrifices, openly avowing the offering up of themselves to him for living sacrifices. How absurd was this, that the children which were born to God should be sacrificed to devils? Note, The children of parents that are members of the visible church are to be looked upon as born unto God, and his children; as such, and under that character, we are to love them, and pray for them, bring them up for him, and, if he calls for them, cheerfully part with them to him; for may he not do what he will with his own? Upon this instance of their idolatry, which indeed ought not to pass without a particular brand, this remark is made; ver. 20, "Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter?" which intimates there were those that made a small matter of it, and turned it into a jest. Note, There is no sin so heinous, so apparently heinous, which men of profligate consciences will not make a mock at. But is whoredom, is spiritual whoredom, a small matter? Is it a small matter for men to make their children brutes, and the devil their God? It will be a great matter shortly.

Sixthly. They built temples in honour of their idols, that others might be invited to resort thither, and join with them in the worship of their idols. "After all thy wickedness" of this kind committed in private, (for which, "woe, woe unto thee,"—that comes in a sad parenthesis, speaking those in a woful condition that are going on in sin, and giving them warning in time, if they would but take it,) thou hast at length arrived to such a pitch of impudence as to proclaim it. Thou hast long had a whore's heart, but now thou art come to have a whore's forehead, and canst not blush; ver. 23—25, "Thou hast built there an eminent place," 'a brothel house,' so the margin reads it, and such their idol temples were. "Thou hast made thee a high place" for one idol or other, "in every street, and at every head of the way;" and again, ver. 31. They did all they could to seduce and debauch others, and to spread the contagion by making the temptations to idolatry as strong as possibly they could; and hereby the ringleaders in idolatry did but make themselves vile. And even those that had courted them to it, finding themselves outdone by them, began to be surfeited with the abundance and violence of their idolatries; "Thou hast made thy beauty to be abhorred," even by those that had admired it. The Jewish nation, by leaving their own God, and doting on the gods of the nations round about them, had made themselves mean and despicable in the eyes even of their heathen neighbours. Much more was their beauty abhorred by all that were wise and good, and had any concern for the honour of God and religion. Note, Those shame themselves that bring a reproach on their profession; and justly will that beauty, that excellency, at length be made the object of others' loathing, which men have made the matter of their own pride?

3rd. What were the aggravations of this sin.

First. They were fond of the idols of those nations which had been their oppressors and persecutors. As, 1*st.* The Egyptians. They were a people notorious for idolatry, and for the most sottish, senseless idolatries. They had of old abused them by their barbarous dealings, and of late by their treacherous dealing, were always either cruel or false to them; and yet so infatuated were they, that "they committed fornication with the Egyptians their neighbours," not only by joining with them in their idolatries, but entering into leagues and alliances with them; and depending upon them for help in their straits, which was an adulterous departure from God. 2nd. The Assyrians. They had also been vexatious to Israel, and yet "thou hast played the whore with them," ver. 28. Though they lived at a greater distance, yet thou hast entertained their idols, and their superstitious usages, and so "hast multiplied thy fornications unto Chaldea;" hast borrowed images of gods, patterns of altars, rites of sacrificing, and one foolery or another of that kind, from that remote country, that enemy's country; and hast imported them into the land of Canaan, enfranchised and established them there. Thus Mr. George Herbert long since foretold, or feared at least,

> That Seine shall swallow Tiber, and the Thames
> By letting in them both pollute her streams.

Secondly. They had been under the rebukes of Providence for their sins, and yet they persisted in them; ver. 27, "I have stretched out my hand over thee," to threaten and frighten thee; so God did before he laid his hand upon them to ruin and destroy them. And that is his usual method, to try to bring men to repentance, first by lesser judgments; he did so here. Before he brought such a famine upon them as broke the staff of bread, he diminished their ordinary food; cut them short, before he cut them off. When the overplus is abused, it is just with God to diminish that which is for necessity. Before he delivered them to the Chaldeans to be destroyed he delivered them to the daughters of the Philistines to be ridiculed for their idolatries; for they hated them, and, though they were idolaters themselves, yet were ashamed of the lewd way of the Israelites, who were grown more profane in their idolatries than any of their neighbours, who changed their God, whereas other nations did not change theirs, Jer. ii. 10, 11; for this they were justly chastised by the Philistines. Or it may refer to the inroads which the Philistines made upon the south of Judah in the reign of Ahaz, by which it was weakened and impoverished, and which was the beginning of sorrows to them, 2 Chr. xxviii. 18; but they did not take warning by these judgments, and therefore were justly abandoned to ruin at last. Note, In the account which impenitent sinners shall be called to, they will be told not only of the mercies for which they have been ungrateful, but of the afflictions under which they have been incorrigible, Am. iv. 11.

Thirdly. They were insatiable in their spiritual whoredom; Thou "couldest not be satisfied," ver. 28, and again ver. 29. When they had multiplied their idols and superstitious usages beyond measure, yet still they were inquiring after new gods, and new fashions in worship. They that in sincerity join themselves to the true God find enough in him for their satisfaction; and, though they still desire more of God, yet they never desire more than God. But they that forsake this living fountain for broken cisterns will find themselves soon surfeited, but never satisfied; have soon enough of the gods they have, and are still inquiring after more.

Fourthly. They were at a great expence upon their idolatry, and laid out a great deal of wealth in purchasing patterns of images and altars, and hiring priests to attend upon them from other countries. Harlots generally had their hires, but this impudent adulteress, instead of being hired to serve idols, hired idols to protect her, and accept her homage. This is much insisted on, ver. 31—34. In this respect, "The contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms;" others are courted, but thou makest court to those that do not follow thee; art fond of making leagues and alliances with those heathen nations that despise thee. Others have gifts given them, but thou givest thy gifts, that is, the gifts which God has graciously given thee, to thine idols; herein like a wife that commits adultery, not for gain, as harlots do, but purely for the sin's sake. Note, Spiritual lusts, those of the mind, such as theirs after idols were, are oftentimes as strong and impetuous as any carnal lusts are. And it is a great aggravation of sin when men are their own tempters, and, instead of proposing to themselves any worldly advantage by it, are at great expence upon it. Such are transgressors without cause, Ps. xxv. 3; wicked transgressors indeed.

And now is not Jerusalem in all this made to know her abominations? for what greater abominations could she be guilty of than these? Here we may see with wonder and horror what the corrupt nature of men is when God leaves them to themselves; yea, though they have the greatest advantages to be better, and do better. And the way of sin is downhill. Nitimur in vetitum,—'We incline to what is forbidden.'

35 Wherefore, O harlot, hear the word of the LORD:
36 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thy filthiness was poured out,
And thy nakedness discovered through thy whoredoms with thy lovers,
And with all the idols of thy abominations,
And by the blood of thy children, which thou didst give unto them;
37 Behold, therefore I will gather all thy lovers,
With whom thou hast taken pleasure,
And all them that thou hast loved,
With all them that thou hast hated;
I will even gather them round about against thee,
And will discover thy nakedness unto them,
That they may see all thy nakedness.
38 And I will judge thee,

As women that break wedlock and shed blood are judged;
And I will give thee blood in fury and jealousy.
39 And I will also give thee into their hand,
And they shall throw down thine eminent place,
And shall break down thy high places:
They shall strip thee also of thy clothes, and shall take thy fair jewels,
And leave thee naked and bare.
40 They shall also bring up a company against thee,
And they shall stone thee with stones,
And thrust thee through with their swords.
41 And they shall burn thine houses with fire, [women:
And execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many
And I will cause thee to cease from playing the harlot,
And thou also shalt give no hire any more.
42 So will I make my fury toward thee to rest,
And my jealousy shall depart from thee,
And I will be quiet, and will be no more angry.
43 Because thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth,
But hast fretted me in all these things; [thine head,
Behold, therefore I also will recompense thy way upon Saith the Lord GOD: [abominations.
And thou shalt not commit this lewdness above all thine

Adultery was by the law of Moses made a capital crime. This notorious adulteress, the criminal at the bar, being in the foregoing verses found guilty, here hath sentence passed upon her. It is ushered in with solemnity, ver. 35: the prophet, as the judge, in God's name calls to her, "O harlot, hear the word of the Lord!" Our Saviour preached to harlots, for their conversion, to bring them into the kingdom of God, not as the prophet here, to expel them out of it. Note, An apostate church is a harlot; Jerusalem is so if she become idolatrous. "How is the faithful city become a harlot!" Rome is so represented in the Revelation, then when it is marked for ruin, as Jerusalem here; Rev. xvii. 1, "Come, and I will shew thee the judgments of the great whore." And those who will not hear the commanding word of the Lord, and obey it, shall be made to hear the condemning word of the Lord, and shall tremble at it. Let us attend while judgment is given.

First. The crime is repeated, and the articles of the charge summed up, ver. 36, and, as is usual, aggravated, ver. 43; for when God speaks in wrath he will be justified, and clear when he judgeth, clear when he is judged; and sinners when they are condemned shall have their sins so set in order before them that their mouth shall be stopped, and they shall not have a word to object against the equity of the sentence. The crimes which this harlot stands convicted of, and is now to be condemned for, are, 1. The violation of the two first commandments of the first table by idolatry, which is here called her whoredoms with her lovers; so she called them, Hos. ii. 12, because she loved them as if they had been indeed her benefactors; that is, with "all the idols of her abominations," the abominable idols which she served and worshipped. This was the sin which provoked God to jealousy. 2. The violation of the two first commandments of the second table, by the murder of their own innocent infants; "The blood of thy children which thou didst give unto them." It is not strange if those that have cast off God, and his fear, break through the strongest and most sacred bonds of natural affection.

The sins are aggravated from the consideration, 1st. Of the dishonour they had thereby done to themselves. Hereby "thy filthiness was poured out," that is, the uncleanness that was in thy heart was hereby discovered and brought to light, and thy nakedness was exposed to view, and thou thereby exposed to contempt. God is displeased with his professing people for shaming themselves by their sins. 2nd. Their base ingratitude is another aggravation of their sins; "Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth," and the kindness that was done thee then, when otherwise thou hadst perished, ver. 43. And, 3rd. The vexation which their sins gave to God, whom they ought to have pleased; "Thou hast fretted me in all these things," not only angered me, but grieved me. It is a strange expression, and one would think enough to melt a heart of stone, that the great God, who cannot admit any uneasiness, is pleased to speak of the sins and follies of his professing people as fretting to him; "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation."

Secondly. The sentence is passed. In general, "I will judge thee as women that break wedlock, and shed blood, are judged," ver. 38; and those two crimes were punished with death, with an ignominious death. Thou hast shed blood, and therefore I will give thee blood; thou hast broken wedlock, and therefore I will give it thee not only in justice, but in jealousy,—not only as a righteous judge, but as an injured and incensed husband, who "will not spare in the day of vengeance." Pr. vi. 34, 35. He will "recompense their way upon their head," ver. 43. In all the judgments God executeth upon sinners we must see "their own way recompensed upon their own head." They are dealt with not only as they deserved, but as they procured; it is the end which their sin as a way had a direct tendency to. More particularly,

1. This criminal must be (as is usually done with criminals) exposed to public shame, ver. 37. Malefactors are not executed privately, but are made a spectacle to the world. Care is here taken to bring spectators together. "All them that thou hast loved, with whom thou hast taken pleasure," they shall come to be witnesses of the execution, that they may take warning, and prevent their own like ruin; and those also whom thou hast hated, who will insult over thee, and triumph in thy fall. Both ways the calamities of Jerusalem will be aggravated, that they will be the grief of her friends, and the joy of her foes. These shall not only be gathered around her, but gathered against her; even those with whom she took unlawful pleasure, with whom she contracted unlawful leagues, the Egyptians and Assyrians, shall now contribute to her ruin. As, "when a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him," so, when a man's ways displease the Lord, he maketh even his friends to be at war with him; and justly makes those a scourge and a plague to sinners, and instruments of their destruction, who were their tempters, and with whom they were partakers in wickedness. Those whom they have suffered to strip them of their virtue shall see them stripped, and perhaps help to strip them, of all their other ornaments; to see the nakedness of the land will they come. It is added to the same purpose, ver. 41, "I will execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many women;" thou shalt be made an example of, in terrorem, 'that others may see and fear,' and do no more presumptuously.

2. The criminal is condemned to die, for her sins are such as death is the wages of; ver. 40, "They shall bring up a company," that is, a company shall be brought up against thee, and "they shall stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their swords;" so great a death, so many deaths in one, is this adulteress adjudged to. When the walls of Jerusalem were battered down with stones shot against them, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem were put to the sword, then this sentence was executed in the letter of it.

3. The estate of the criminal is confiscated, and all that belonged to her destroyed with her; ver. 39, "They shall throw down thine eminent place;" and, ver. 41, they "shall burn thine houses," as the habitations of ill women are destroyed in detestation of their lewdness. Their high places, erected in honour of their idols, by which they thought to ingratiate themselves with their neighbours, shall be an offence to them; and even they shall break them down. It was long the complaint, even in some of the best reigns of the kings of Judah, that the high places were not taken away; but now the army of the Chaldeans, when they lay all waste, shall break them down. If iniquity be not taken away by the justice of the nation, it shall be taken away by the judgments of God upon the nation.

4. Thus both the sin and the sinner shall be abolished together, and an end put to both. "Thou shalt cease from playing the harlot;" that is, there shall be no remainders of idolatry in the land, because the inhabitants shall be wholly extirpated; and they shall give no more hire because they have no more to give. Some that will not leave their sins live till their sins leave them. When all that with which they honoured their idols is taken from them, they shall "not give hire any more," ver. 41. Then "thou shalt not commit this lewdness" of sacrificing thy children, which was a crime provoking "above all thine abominations;" for thy children shall all be cut off by the sword, or carried into captivity, so that thou shalt have none to sacrifice, ver. 43. Or it may be meant of the reformation of those of them that escape and survive the punishment; they shall take warning, and shall do no more presumptuously. The captivity in Babylon made the people of Israel to cease for ever from playing the harlot; it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry. And then all shall be well when this is the fruit, even the taking away of sin. Then, ver. 42, "My jealousy shall depart, I will be quiet, and no more angry." When we begin to be at war with sin, God will be at peace with us; for he continues the affliction no longer than till it has done its work. When sin departs, God's jealousy will soon depart; for he is never jealous but when we give him just cause to be so. Yet some understand this as a threatening of utter ruin, that God will make a full end, and the fire of his anger shall burn as long as there is any fuel for it. "His fury shall rest upon them," and not remove: compare this with that doom of unbelievers, Jno. iii. 36, "The wrath of God abideth on them." They shall drink the dregs of the cup, and then God will be no more angry, for he is eased of his adversaries, Isa. i. 24; is satisfied in the abandoning of them, and therefore will be no more angry, because there are no more for his anger to fasten upon. They had fretted him when judgment and mercy were contesting; but now he is quiet, as he will be in the eternal damnation of sinners, wherein he will be glorified, and therefore he will be satisfied.

44 Behold, every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee,
Saying, As is the mother, so is her daughter.
45 Thou art thy mother's daughter,
That lotheth her husband and her children;
And thou art the sister of thy sisters,
Which lothed their husbands and their children:
Your mother was an Hittite, and your father an Amorite.
46 And thine elder sister is Samaria,
She and her daughters that dwell at thy left hand:
And thy younger sister, that dwelleth at thy right hand,
Is Sodom and her daughters.
47 Yet hast thou not walked after their ways,
Nor done after their abominations:
But, as if that were a very little thing,
Thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways.
48 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters,
As thou hast done, thou and thy daughters.
49 Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom,
Pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was
And in her daughters, [in her
Neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy. [fore me:
50 And they were haughty, and committed abomination be-
Therefore I took them away as I saw good.
51 Neither hath Samaria committed half of thy sins;
But thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they,
And hast justified thy sisters in all thine abominations which thou hast done.
52 Thou also, which hast judged thy sisters, bear thine own shame for thy sins

That thou hast committed more abominable than they:
They are more righteous than thou:
Yea, be thou confounded also, and bear thy shame,
In that thou hast justified thy sisters.
53 When I shall bring again their captivity,
The captivity of Sodom and her daughters,
And the captivity of Samaria and her daughters,
Then will I bring again the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them:
54 That thou mayest bear thine own shame,
And mayest be confounded in all that thou hast done,
In that thou art a comfort unto them.
55 When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate,
And Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate,
Then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate.
56 For thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thy mouth
In the day of thy pride,
57 Before thy wickedness was discovered,
As at the time of thy reproach of the daughters of Syria,
And all that are round about her, the daughters of the Philistines,
Which despise thee round about.
58 Thou hast borne thy lewdness
And thine abominations, saith the LORD.
59 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will even deal with thee as thou hast done,
Which hast despised the oath in breaking the covenant.

The prophet here farther shews Jerusalem her abominations, by comparing her with those places that had gone before her, and shewing that she was worse than any of them, and therefore should, like them, be utterly and irreparably ruined. We are all apt to judge of ourselves by comparison, and to imagine that we are sufficiently good, if we are but as good as such and such that were thought passable; or that we are not dangerously bad, if we be not worse than such and such, who, though bad, were not of the worst. Now God, by the prophet, shews Jerusalem,

First. That she was as bad as her mother; that is, as the accursed devoted Canaanites that were the possessors of this land before her. They that use proverbs, as most people do, shall apply that proverb to Jerusalem, "As is the mother, so is her daughter," ver. 44. She is even mother's own child; the Jews are as like the Canaanites in temper and inclinations as if they had been their own children. The character of the mother was, that she "loathed her husband and her children." She had all the marks of an adulteress, and that is the character of the daughter; she forsakes the guide of her youth, and is barbarous to the children of her own bowels. When God brought Israel into Canaan he particularly warned them not to do according to the abominations of the men of that land, who went before them, for which it had spewed them out, Lev. xviii. 27, 28; the monuments of whose idolatry, with the remains of the idolaters themselves, would be a continual temptation to them. But they learned their way, and trod in their steps, and were as well affected to the idols of Canaan as ever they were, Ps. cvi. 38; and thus in respect of imitation it might truly be said, that their mother was a Hittite, and their father an Amorite, ver. 45, for they resembled them more than Abraham and Sarah.

Secondly. That she was worse than her sisters, Sodom and Samaria, that were adulteresses too, that "loathed their husbands and their children," that were weary of the gods of their fathers, and were for introducing new gods, a la mode,—'quite in style,' that came newly up, and new fashions in religion, and were given to change. On this comparison between Jerusalem and her sisters the prophet here enlargeth, that he might either shame them into repentance or justify God in their ruin. Observe,

1. Who Jerusalem's sisters were; ver. 45, Samaria and Sodom. Samaria is called the elder, or, rather, the greater sister, because it was a much larger city and kingdom, richer and more considerable, and more nearly allied to Israel; if Jerusalem look northward, this is partly on her left hand. This city of Samaria, and the towns and villages that were as daughters to that mother city, these had been lately destroyed for their spiritual whoredom. Sodom, and the adjacent towns and villages that were her daughters, dwelt at Jerusalem's right hand, and was her lesser sister, less than Jerusalem, less than Samaria; and these were of old destroyed for their corporal whoredom, Jude 7.

2. Wherein Jerusalem's sins resembled her sister's, particularly Sodom's; ver. 49, "This was the iniquity of Sodom," (it is implied, And this is thine iniquity too,) "pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness." Their going after strange flesh, which was Sodom's most flagrant wickedness, is not mentioned, because notoriously known; but those sins which did not look so black, but opened the door and led the way to these more enormous crimes, and began to fill that measure of her sins which was filled up at length by their unnatural filthiness. Now these initiating sins were, 1st. Pride; in which the heart lifts up itself above and against both God and man. Pride was the first sin that turned angels into devils, and the garden of the Lord into a hell upon earth. It was the pride of the Sodomites that they despised righteous Lot, and would not bear to be reproved by him; and this ripened them for ruin. 2nd. Gluttony; here called fulness of bread. It was God's great mercy that they had plenty, but their great sin that they abused it, glutted themselves with it, ate to excess and drank to excess, and made that the gratification of their lusts which was given them to be the support of their lives. 3rd. Idleness; abundance of idleness, a dread of labour, and a love of ease. Their country was fruitful, and the abundance they had they came easily by, which was a temptation to them to indulge themselves in sloth, which disposed them to all that abominable filthiness which kindled their flames. Note, Idleness is an inlet to much sin. The men of Sodom that were idle were wicked, and sinners before the Lord, Gen. xiii. 13. The standing waters gather filth, and the sitting bird is the fowler's mark. When "David rose from off his bed at evening," he saw Bathsheba. Quæritur Ægistheus quare sit factus adulter? In promptu causa est, desidiosus erat,—'What made Ægistheus an adulterer? Indolence.' 4th, Oppression; Neither did she "strengthen the hands of the poor and needy." Probably it is implied that she weakened their hands, and broke their arms; however, it was bad enough, that when she had so much wealth, and consequently power, and interest, and leisure, she did nothing for the relief of the poor; in providing for whose wants those that themselves are full of bread may employ their time well,—they need not be so abundantly idle, as too often they are. These were the sins of the Sodomites, and these were Jerusalem's sins; their pride, the cause of their sins, is mentioned again ver. 50; they were haughty, with the horrid effects of their sins, their abominations which they committed before God. Men arrive gradually to the height of impiety and wickedness; Nemo repente fit turpissimus,—'No man reaches the height of vice at once.' But where pride has gotten the ascendant in a man he is in the high road to all abominations.

3. How much the sins of Jerusalem exceeded those of Sodom and Samaria; were more heinous in the sight of God, either in themselves or by reason of several aggravations. "Thou hast not only walked after their ways," and trod in their steps, but hast quite outdone them in wickedness, ver. 47. Thou thoughtest it as a very little thing to do as they did, didst laugh at them as sneaking sinners and silly ones; thou wouldst be more cunning, more daring in wickedness; wouldst triumph more boldly over thy convictions, and bid more open defiance to God and religion: if a man will break, let him break for something. Thus "thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways." Jerusalem was more polite, and therefore sinned with more wit, more art and ingenuity, than Sodom and Samaria could. Jerusalem had more wealth and power, and its government was more absolute and arbitrary, and therefore had the more opportunity of oppressing the poor, and shedding malignant influences around her, than Sodom and Samaria had. Jerusalem had the temple and the ark, and the priesthood, and kings of the house of David; and therefore the wickedness of that holy city, that was so dignified, so near, so dear to God, was more provoking to him than the wickedness of Sodom and Samaria, that had not Jerusalem's privileges and means of grace. "Sodom has not done as thou hast done," ver. 48. This agrees with what Christ saith, Mat. xi. 24, "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee." The kingdom of the ten tribes had been very wicked, and yet "Samaria has not committed half of thy sins," ver. 51; has not worshipped half so many idols, nor slain half so many prophets. It was bad enough that they of Jerusalem were guilty of Sodom's sins, sodomy itself not excepted, 1 Kin. xiv. 24; 2 Kin. xxiii. 7. And though the Dead sea, the standing monument of Sodom's sin and ruin, bordered upon their country, (Num. xxxiv. 12,) and that sulphureous lake was always under their nose, God having taken away Sodom and her daughters in such way and manner as he saw good, as he saith here, ver. 50, so as one thing should effectually make their "overthrow an ensample to those that after should live ungodly," (2 Pet. ii. 6,) yet they did not take warning, but "multiplied their abominations more than they." And,

1st. By this they justified Sodom and Samaria, ver. 51. They pretended, in their haughtiness and superciliousness, to judge them, and in the days of old, when they retained their integrity, they did judge them, ver. 52. But now they justify them comparatively; Sodom and Samaria are more righteous than thou, that is, less wicked. It will look like some extenuation of their sins, that, as bad as they were, Jerusalem was worse, though it was God's own city; not that it will serve as a plea to justify Sodom, but to condemn Jerusalem, against which Sodom and Samaria will rise up in judgment.

2nd. For this they ought themselves to be greatly ashamed. Thou who hast judged thy sisters, and cried out shame on them, now "bear thine own shame, for thy sins which thou hast committed," which, though of the same kind with theirs, yet being committed by thee are more abominable than theirs, ver. 52. This may be taken either as foretelling their ruin, "Thou shalt bear thy shame," or as inviting them to repentance, "Be thou confounded, and bear thy shame;" take the shame to thyself that is due to thee; and then it may be hoped sinners will forsake their sins, when they begin to be heartily ashamed of them. And therefore they shall go into captivity, and there they shall lie, that they may be "confounded in all that they have done;" because they had been a comfort and encouragement to Sodom and Samaria, ver. 54. Note, There is nothing in sin which we have more reason to be ashamed of than this, that by our sin we have encouraged others in sin, and comforted them in that for which they must be grieved, or they are undone. Another reason why they must now be ashamed is, because in the day of their prosperity they had looked with so much disdain upon their neighbours; "Thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thee in the day of thy pride," ver. 56; they thought Sodom not worthy to be named the same day with Jerusalem, little dreaming that Jerusalem would at length lie under a worse and more scandalous character than Sodom herself. Those that are high may perhaps come to stand upon a level with those they contemn. Or, "Sodom was not mentioned," that is, the warning designed to be given to thee by Sodom's ruin was not regarded. If the Jews had but talked more frequently and seriously to one another and to their children concerning "the wrath of God revealed from heaven against Sodom's ungodliness and unrighteousness," it might have kept them in awe, and prevented their treading in their steps. But they kept the thought of it at a distance, would not bear the mention of it, and, as the ancients say, put Isaiah to death for putting them in mind of it, when he called them "rulers of Sodom and people of Gomorrah," Isa. i. 10. Note, Those are but preparing judgments for themselves that will not take notice of God's judgments upon others.

4. What desolations God had brought and was bringing upon Jerusalem for these wickednesses, wherein they had exceeded Sodom and Samaria. 1st. She hath already long ago been disgraced, and fallen into contempt among her neighbours; ver. 57, "Before her wickedness was discovered," before she came to be so grossly and openly flagitious, yet she bore the just punishment of her secret and more concealed lewdness, when she fell under "the reproach of the daughters of Syria; of the Philistines," who were said to despise her, and be ashamed of her," ver. 27; and of "all that were round about her;" which seems to refer to the descent made upon Judah by the Syrians in the days of Ahaz, and soon after another by the Philistines, 2 Chr. xxviii. 5, 18. Note, Those that disgrace themselves by yielding to their lusts will justly be brought into disgrace by being made to yield to their enemies. And it is observable that, before God brought potent enemies upon them for their destruction, he brought enemies upon them that were less formidable, for their reproach; and if lesser judgments would do the work God would not send greater. In this thou hast borne thy lewdness, ver. 58. Those that will not cast off their sins by repentance and reformation shall be made to bear their sins to their confusion. 2nd. She is now in captivity, or hastening into captivity, and therein is reckoned with, not only for her lewdness, ver. 58, but for her perfidiousness and covenant-breaking, ver. 59, "I will deal with thee as thou hast done;" that is, I will forsake thee as thou hast forsaken me, and cast thee off as thou hast cast me off; for thou hast "despised the oath, in breaking the covenant," which seems to be meant of the covenant God made with their fathers at mount Sinai, whereby he took them and theirs to be a peculiar people to himself. They flatter themselves with a conceit that because God had hitherto continued his favour to them, notwithstanding their provocations, he would do so still. No, saith God, you have broken covenant with me, have despised both the promises of the covenant and the obligations of it, and therefore I will deal with thee as thou hast done. Note, Those that will not adhere to God as their God have no reason to expect that he should continue to own them as his people. 3rd. The captivity of the wicked Jews, and their ruin, shall be as irrecoverable as that of Sodom and Samaria. In this sense, as a threatening, most interpreters take ver. 53, 55, "When I shall bring again the captivity of Sodom and Samaria, and when they shall return to their former estate, then I will bring again the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them," and as it were for their sakes, and under their shadow and protection, because they are "more righteous than thou, and then thou shalt return to thy former estate." But Sodom and Samaria were never brought back, nor ever returned to their former estate, and therefore let not Jerusalem expect it; that is, those who now remained there, whom God would "deliver to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt," Jer. xxiv. 9, 10. Sooner shall the Sodomites arise out of the Salt sea, and the Samaritans return out of the land of Assyria, than they enjoy their peace and prosperity again; for, to their shame be it spoken, it is a comfort to those of the ten tribes who were dispersed and in captivity to see those of the two tribes who had been as bad or worse than they in like manner dispersed and in captivity. And therefore they shall live and die, shall stand and fall together; the bad ones of both shall perish together, the good ones of both shall return together. Note, Those who do as the worst of sinners do must expect to fare as they fare: "Let mine enemy be as the wicked."

60 Nevertheless I will remember my covenant with thee
In the days of thy youth,
And I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant.
61 Then thou shalt remember thy ways, and be ashamed,
When thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder and thy younger:
And I will give them unto thee for daughters,
But not by thy covenant.
62 And I will establish my covenant with thee;
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD:
63 That thou mayest remember, and be confounded,
And never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame,
When I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done,
Saith the Lord GOD.

Here in the close of the chapter, after a most shameful conviction of sin, and a most dreadful denunciation of judgments, mercy is remembered, mercy is reserved for those that shall come after; as was when God sware in his wrath concerning those who came out of Egypt that they should not enter into Canaan, "Yet," saith God, "your little ones shall;" so here. And some think that what is said of the return of Sodom and Samaria, ver. 53, 55, and of Jerusalem with them, is a promise; and it may be understood so, if by Sodom we understand, as Grotius and some of the Jewish writers do, the Moabites and Ammonites, the posterity of Lot, who once dwelt in Sodom; their captivity was returned, Jer. xlviii. 47, xlix. 6, as was that of many of the ten tribes, and Judah's with them. But these closing verses are without doubt a precious promise, which was in part fulfilled at the return of the penitent and reformed Jews out of Babylon, but was to have its full accomplishment in gospel times, and in "that repentance and remission of sins" which should then "be preached" with success "to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Now observe here,

First. From whence this mercy should take rise. From God himself, and his remembering his covenant with them, ver. 60. Nevertheless, though they have been so provoking, and God hast been so provoked, to that degree that one would think they could never be reconciled again, yet "I will remember my covenant with thee," that covenant which I made with thee "in the days of thy youth," and will revive it again. Though thou hast broken the covenant, ver. 59, I will remember it, and it shall flourish again. See how much it is our comfort and advantage that God is pleased to deal with us in a covenant way, for thus the mercies of it come to be sure mercies and everlasting, Isa. lv. 3; and while this root stands firm in the ground there is hope of the tree, though it be cut down, that through the scent of water it will bud again. We do not find that they put him in mind of the covenant, but ex mero motu,—'from his own mere good pleasure,' he remembers it as he had promised, Lev. xxvi. 42, "Then will I remember my covenant, and will remember the land." He that bids us to be ever mindful of the covenant no doubt will himself be ever mindful of it, "the word which he commanded;" and what he commands stands fast for ever, "to a thousand generations."

Secondly. How they should be prepared and qualified for this mercy; ver. 61, "Thou shalt remember thy ways," thine evil ways; God will put thee in mind of them, will set them in order before thee, that thou mayest be ashamed of them. Note, God's good work in us commenceth and keepeth pace with his good-will towards us. When he remembers his covenant for us, that he may not remember our sins against us, he puts us upon remembering our sins against ourselves; and if we will but be brought to remember our ways, how crooked and perverse they have been, and how we have walked contrary to God in them, we cannot but be ashamed; and when we are so we are best prepared to receive the honour and comfort of a sealed pardon and a settled peace.

Thirdly. What the mercy is that God has in reserve for them. 1. He will take them into covenant with himself; ver. 60, "I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant; and again, ver. 62, "I will establish," re-establish, and establish more firmly than ever, "my covenant with thee." Note, It is an unspeakable comfort to all true penitents, that the covenant of grace is so well ordered in all things, that every transgression in the covenant doth not throw us out of covenant, for that is inviolable. 2. He will bring the Gentiles into church communion with them; ver. 61, "Thou shalt receive thy sisters," the Gentile nations that are round about thee, "thine elder and thy younger," greater than thou art and lesser, ancient nations and modern; and "I will give them unto thee for daughters," that is, they shall be founded, nursed, taught, and educated by that Gospel, that "word of the Lord which shall go forth from Zion and from Jerusalem;" so that all the neighbours shall call Jerusalem mother, while the church continues there, and shall acknowledge "the Jerusalem which is from above, and which is free, to be the mother of us all," Gal. iv. 26. They shall be thy daughters, "but not by thy covenant," that is, not by the covenant of peculiarity; not as being proselytes to the Jewish religion, and subjects to the yoke of the ceremonial law, but as being converts with thee to the Christian religion. Or, "not by thy covenant," that is, not upon such terms as thou shalt think fit to impose upon them as conquered nations, as captives and homagers, to whom thou mayest give law at pleasure, such a dominion as that the carnal Jews hope to have over the nations; no, they shall be the daughters by my covenant, the covenant of grace made with thee and them in concert, as an indenture tripartite. I will be a Father, a common Father, both to Jews and Gentiles, and so they shall become sisters to one another. And when thou shalt receive them thou shalt be ashamed of thine own evil ways wherein thou wast conformed to them. Thou shalt blush to look a Gentile in the face, remembering how much worse than the Gentiles thou wast in the day of thine apostacy.

Fourthly. What the fruit and effect of this will be.

1. God will hereby be glorified; ver. 62, "Thou shalt know that I am the Lord." It shall hereby be known that the God of Israel is Jehovah, a God of power, and faithful to his covenant. And thou shalt know it who hast hitherto lived as if thou didst not know or believe it. It had often been said in wrath, "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," shall know it to your cost; here it is said in mercy, Ye shall know it to your comfort. And it is one of the most precious promises of the new covenant which God has made with us, that "all shall know him, from the least unto the greatest."

2. They shall be hereby more humbled and abased for sin; ver. 63, That thou mayest be the more confounded at the remembrance of all that thou hast done amiss, mayest reproach thyself for it, and call thyself a thousand times unwise, undutiful, ungrateful, and unlike what thou wast; and mayest never open thy mouth any more in contradiction to God, reflection on him, or complaints of him, but mayest be for ever silent and submissive because of thy shame. Note, Those that rightly remember their sins will be truly ashamed of them; and those that are truly ashamed of their sins will see great reason to be patient under their afflictions, to be dumb, and not open their mouths against what God doth. But that which is most observable is, that all this shall be "when I am pacified toward thee, saith the Lord God." Note, It is the gracious ingenuity of true penitents that, the clearer evidences and the fuller instances they have of God's being reconciled to them, the more grieved and ashamed they are that ever they have offended. God is in Jesus Christ pacified towards us. He is our peace, and it is by his cross that we are reconciled, and in his Gospel that God is reconciling the world to himself. Now the consideration of this should be powerful to melt our hearts into a godly sorrow for sin. This is repenting because "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The prodigal, after he had received the kiss, which assured him that his Father was pacified towards him, was ashamed and confounded, and said, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee." And the more our shame for sin is increased by the sense of pardoning mercy, the more will our comfort in God be increased.

CHAPTER XVII.

God was in the foregoing chapter reckoning with the people of Judah, and bringing ruin upon them for their treachery in breaking covenant with him: in this chapter he is reckoning with the king of Judah for his treachery in breaking covenant with the king of Babylon; for when God came to contend with them he found many grounds of his controversy. The thing was now in doing, Zedekiah was practising with the king of Egypt underhand for assistance in a treacherous project he had formed to shake off the yoke of the king of Babylon, and violate the homage and fealty he had sworn to him. For this God by the prophet here, I. Threatens the ruin of him and his kingdom, by a parable of two eagles and a vine, ver. 1—10, and the reddition of that parable, ver. 11—21; but in the close, II. He promiseth hereafter to raise the royal family of Judah again, the house of David, in the Messiah and his kingdom, ver. 22—24.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, put forth a riddle, and speak a parable unto the house of Israel; 3 And say, Thus saith the Lord GOD;

A great eagle with great wings,
Longwinged, full of feathers, which had divers colours,
Came unto Lebanon, and took the highest branch of the cedar:
4 He cropped off the top of his young twigs,
And carried it into a land of traffick;
He set it in a city of merchants.
5 He took also of the seed of the land,
And planted it in a fruitful field;
He placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow tree.
6 And it grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature,
Whose branches turned toward him, and the roots thereof were under him:
So it became a vine,
And brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs.
7 There was also another great eagle with great wings and many feathers:
And, behold, this vine did bend her roots toward him,
And shot forth her branches toward him,
That he might water it by the furrows of her plantation.
8 It was planted in a good soil by great waters,
That it might bring forth branches,
And that it might bear fruit,
That it might be a goodly vine

9 Say thou, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Shall it prosper?
Shall he not pull up the roots thereof,
And cut off the fruit thereof, that it wither?
It shall wither in all the leaves of her spring,
Even without great power or many people to pluck it up by the roots thereof.
10 Yea, behold, being planted, shall it prosper? [it?
Shall it not utterly wither, when the east wind toucheth
It shall wither in the furrows where it grew.
11 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
12 Say now to the rebellious house,
Know ye not what these things mean? [salem,
Tell them, Behold, the king of Babylon is come to Jeru-
And hath taken the king thereof, and the princes thereof,
And led them with him to Babylon;
13 And hath taken of the king's seed, and made a covenant
And hath taken an oath of him: [with him,
He hath also taken the mighty of the land:
14 That the kingdom might be base,
That it might not lift itself up,
But that by keeping of his covenant it might stand.
15 But he rebelled against him in sending his ambassadors into Egypt,
That they might give him horses and much people.
Shall he prosper? shall he escape that doeth such things?
Or shall he break the covenant, and be delivered?
16 As I live, saith the Lord GOD, [him king,
Surely in the place where the king dwelleth that made
Whose oath he despised, and whose covenant he brake,
Even with him in the midst of Babylon he shall die.
17 Neither shall Pharaoh with his mighty army and great
Make for him in the war, [company
By casting up mounts, and building forts, to cut off many persons:
18 Seeing he despised the oath by breaking the covenant,
When, lo, he had given his hand,
And hath done all these things, he shall not escape.
19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
As I live, surely mine oath that he hath despised,
And my covenant that he hath broken,
Even it will I recompense upon his own head.
20 And I will spread my net upon him,
And he shall be taken in my snare,
And I will bring him to Babylon,
And will plead with him there for his trespass
That he hath trespassed against me.
21 And all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword,
And they that remain shall be scattered toward all winds:
And ye shall know that I the LORD have spoken it.

THE ROMAN RETIARUS AND SECUTOR.
803

We must take all these verses together, that we may have the parable and the reddition of it at one view before us, because they will illustrate one another.

First. The prophet is appointed to put forth a riddle to the house of Israel, ver. 2; not to puzzle them, as Samson's riddle was put forth to the Philistines, not to hide the mind of God from them in obscurity, or to leave them in uncertainty about it, one advancing one conjecture, and another another, as is usual in expounding riddles; no, he is presently to tell them the meaning of it: "Let him that speaks in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret," 1 Cor. xiv. 13. But he must deliver this message in a riddle or parable, that they might take the more notice of it, might be the more affected with it themselves, and might the better remember it and tell it to others. For these reasons God often used similitudes by his servants the prophets, and Christ himself opened his mouth in parables. Riddles and parables are used for an amusement to ourselves, and an entertainment to our friends. The prophet must make use of these to see if in this dress the things of God might find acceptance, and insinuate themselves into the minds of a careless people. Note, Ministers should study to find out acceptable words, and try various methods to do good; and, as far as they have reason to think will be for edification, should both bring that which is familiar into their preaching and their preaching too into their familiar discourse; that there may not be so vast a dissimilitude as with some there is between what they say in the pulpit and what they say out.

Secondly. He is appointed to expound this riddle to the rebellious house, ver. 12; though being rebellious they might justly have been left in ignorance, to see and hear and not perceive, yet the thing shall be explained to them. "Know ye not what these things mean?" They that knew the story, and what was now in agitation, might make a shrewd guess at the meaning of this riddle; but, that they might be left without excuse, he is to give it them in plain terms, stripped of the metaphor. But the enigma was first propounded for them to study on awhile, and to send to their friends at Jerusalem, that they might inquire after and expect the solution of it some time after. Let us now see what the matter of this message is.

1. Nebuchadnezzar had some time ago carried off Jehoiachin, the same that was called Jeconiah, when he was but eighteen years of age, and had reigned in Jerusalem but three months, him and his princes and great men, and had brought them captives to Babylon, 2 Kin. xxiv. 12. This in the parable is represented by an eagle's cropping the top and tender branch of a cedar, and carrying it into a land of traffic, a city of merchants, ver. 3, 4, which is explained, ver. 12. The king of Babylon took the king of Jerusalem, who was no more able to resist him than a young twig of a tree is to contend with the strongest bird of prey, that easily crops it off, perhaps towards the making of her nest. Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel's vision is a lion, the king of beasts, Dan. vii. 4; there he has eagles' wings, so swift were his motions, so speedy were his conquests. Here in this parable he is an eagle, the king of birds; a great eagle, that lives upon spoil and rapine, whose young ones suck up blood, Job xxxix. 30. His dominion extends itself far and wide, like the great and long wings of an eagle. The people are numerous, for it is full of feathers; the court splendid, for it has divers colours, which look like embroidering, as the word is. Jerusalem is Lebanon, a forest of houses, and very pleasant; the royal family is the cedar, Jehoiachin is the top branch, the top of the young twigs, which he crops off; Babylon is the land of traffic and city of merchants, where it is set. And the king of Judah, being of the house of David, will think himself much degraded and disgraced to be lodged among tradesmen; but he must make the best of it.

2. When he carried him to Babylon he made his uncle Zedekiah king in his room, ver. 5, 6. His name was Mattaniah, the 'gift of the Lord,' which Nebuchadnezzar changed into Zedekiah, the 'justice of the Lord,' to mind him to be just, like the God he called his, for fear of his justice. This was "one of the seed of the land," a native, not a foreigner, not one of his Babylonian princes. He was "planted in a fruitful field," for so Jerusalem as yet was; he "placed it by great waters," where it would be likely to grow like a willow tree, which grows quick, and grows best in moist ground, but is never designed or expected to be a stately tree. He set it with care and circumspection, so some read it; he wisely provided that it might grow, but that it might not grow too big. "He took of the king's seed," so it is explained, ver. 14, and "made a covenant with him," that he should have the kingdom, and enjoy the regal power and dignity, provided he held it as his vassal, dependent on him, and accountable to him. He "took an oath of him," made him swear allegiance to him, swear by his own God, the God of Israel, that he would be a faithful tributary to him, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 13. He also "took away the mighty of the land," the chief of the men of war, partly as hostages for the performance of the covenant, and partly that, the land being thereby weakened, the king might be the less able, and therefore the less in temptation, to break his league. What he designed we are told, ver. 14, "That the kingdom might be base," in respect both of honour and strength; might neither be a rival with its powerful neighbours nor a terror to its feeble ones as it had been; that "it might not lift up itself" to vie with the kingdom of Babylon, or to bear down any of the petty states that were in subjection to it. But yet he designed that "by keeping of this covenant it may stand," and continue a kingdom. Hereby the pride and ambition of that haughty potentate would be gratified, who aimed to be like the Most High, Isa. xiv. 14; to have all about him subject to him. Now see here, 1st. How sad a change sin made with the royal family of Judah. Time was when all the nations about were tributaries to that; now that has not only lost its dominion over other nations, but is itself become a tributary. "How is the gold become dim!" Nations by sin sell their liberty, and princes their dignity, and "profane their crowns by casting them to the ground." 2nd. How wisely Zedekiah did for himself in accepting these terms, though they were dishonourable, when necessity brought him to it. A man may live very comfortably, and contentedly, though he cannot bear a part, and make a figure as formely. A kingdom may stand firm and safe, though it do not stand so high as it hath sometimes done, and so may a family.

3. Zedekiah, while he continued faithful to the king of Babylon, did very well; and if he would but have reformed his kingdom, and returned to God and his duty, he had done better, and by that means might soon have recovered his former dignity, ver. 6. This plant grew, and though it was "set as a willow tree," and little account was made of it, yet it became "a spreading vine of low stature," a great blessing to his own country, and his fruits making glad their hearts. And it is better to be a spreading vine of low stature than a lofty cedar of no use. Nebuchadnezzar was pleased, for "the branches turned towards him," and rested on him as the vine on the wall, and he had his share of this vine. "The roots thereof" too were "under him," and at his disposal. The Jews had reason to be pleased, for they sat under their own vine, which "brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs," and looked pleasant and promising. See how gradually the judgments of God came upon this provoking people; how God gave them respite, and so gave them space to repent. He made their kingdom base, to try if that would humble them, before he made it no kingdom; yet left it easy for them, to try if that would win upon them to return to him, that the troubles threatened might be prevented.

4. Zedekiah knew not when he was well, but grew impatient of the disgrace of being a tributary to the king of Babylon, and to get clear of it entered into a private league with the king of Egypt. He had no reason to complain that the king of Babylon put any new hardships upon him, or improved his advantages against him, that he oppressed or impoverished his country; for, as the prophet had said before, ver. 6, to aggravate his treachery, he shews again, ver. 8, what a fair way he was in to be considerable; "He was planted in a good soil, by great waters;" his family was likely enough to be built up, and his exchequer to be filled in a little time, so that if he had dealt faithfully he might have been a goodly vine. But there was "another great eagle" that he had an affection for, and put a confidence in, and that was the king of Egypt, ver. 7. Those two great potentates, the kings of Babylon and Egypt, were but two great eagles, birds of prey. This great eagle of Egypt is said to have great wings, but not to be long-winged, as the king of Babylon, because, though the kingdom of Egypt was strong, yet it was not of such a vast extent as that of Babylon was. The great eagle is said to have many feathers, much wealth, and many soldiers, which he depended upon as a substantial defence, but really were no more than as many feathers. Zedekiah, promising himself liberty, made himself a vassal to the king of Egypt, foolishly expecting ease by changing his master. Now, this vine did secretly and underhand "bend her roots" towards the king of Egypt, that great eagle, and after awhile did openly "shoot forth her branches towards him," give him an intimation how much she coveted an alliance with him, "that he might water it by the furrows of her plantation," whereas it was "planted by great waters," and did not need any assistance from him. This is expounded, ver. 15. Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon in "sending his ambassadors into Egypt," that they might "give him horses and much people," to enable him to contend with the king of Babylon. See what a change sin had made with the people of God. God promised they should be a numerous people, as the sand of the sea; yet now, if their king has occasion for much people, he must send to Egypt for them, they being for sin diminished and brought low, Ps. cvii. 39. See also the folly of fretful, discontented spirits, that ruin themselves by striving to mend themselves; whereas they might be easy and happy enough if they would but make the best of that which is.

5. God here threatens Zedekiah with the utter destruction of him and his kingdom, and in displeasure against him passeth that doom upon him, for his treacherous revolt from the king of Babylon. This is represented in the parable, ver. 9, 19, by the "plucking up of this vine by the roots, the cutting off the fruit, and the withering of the leaves," the leaves of her spring, when they are in their greenness, Job viii. 12, before they begin in autumn to wither of themselves. The project shall be blasted, it shall utterly wither, the affairs of this perfidious prince shall be ruined past retrieve, as a vine when the east wind blasts it, so that it shall be fit for nothing but the fire, as we had it in that parable, ch. xv. 4; it shall wither even "in the furrows where it grew," though they were never so well watered. It shall be destroyed "without great power or many people to pluck it up;" for what need is there of raising the militia to pluck up a vine? Note, God can bring great things to pass without much ado. He needs not great power and many people to effect his purposes, a handful will serve if he pleaseth. He without any difficulty ruined a sinful king and kingdom, and made no more of it than we do of rooting up a tree that cumbers the ground.

In the reddition of the parable the sentence is very largely recorded; "Shall he prosper?" ver. 15; can he expect to do ill and fare well? Nay, shall he that doth such wicked things escape? Shall he break the covenant and be delivered from that vengeance which is the just punishment of his treachery? No; can he expect to do ill, and not suffer ill? Let him hear his doom.

1st. It is ratified by the oath of God; ver. 16, "As I live, saith the Lord God, he shall die" for it. This intimates how highly God resented the crime, and how sure and severe the punishment of it would be. God swears in his wrath, as he did Ps. xcv. 11. Note, As God's promises are confirmed with an oath of comfort to the saints, so are his threatenings for terror to the wicked. As sure as God lives and is happy, I may add, and as long, so sure, so long, shall impenitent sinners die, and be miserable.

2nd. It is justified by the heinousness of the crime he had been guilty of. First. He had been very ungrateful to his benefactor, who had made him king, and undertook to protect him; had made him a prince when he might as easily have made him a prisoner. Note, It is a sin against God to be unkind to our friends, and to lift up the heel against those that have helped to raise us. Secondly. He had been very false to him whom he had covenanted with. This is mostly insisted on. He despised the oath; when his conscience or friends minded him of it, he made a jest of it, put on a daring resolution, and broke it, ver. 15, 16, 18, 19. He broke through it, and took a pride in making nothing of it, as a great tyrant in our own day, whose maxim (they say) it is, 'that princes ought not to be slaves to their word any farther than is for their interest.' That which aggravates Zedekiah's perfidiousness was that the oath by which he had bound himself to the king of Babylon, was, 1*st.* A solemn oath. An emphasis is laid upon this, ver. 18, "When, lo, he had given his hand," as a confederate with the king of Babylon, not only as his subject but as his friend, the joining of hands being a token of the joining of hearts. 2*nd.* A sacred oath. God saith, ver. 19, It is mine oath that he has despised, and "my covenant that he has broken." In every solemn oath God is appealed to as a witness of the sincerity of him that swears, and invocated as a judge and revenger of his treachery if he now swear falsely, or at any time hereafter break his oath. But the oath of allegiance to a prince is particularly called the oath of God, Eccl. viii. 2, as if that had something in it more sacred than another oath; for princes are ministers of God to us for good, Rom. xiii. 4. Now Zedekiah's breaking this oath and covenant is the sin which God will "recompense upon his own head," ver. 19; the "trespass which he hath trespassed against God," for which God will plead with him, ver. 20. Note, Perjury is a heinous sin, and highly provoking to the God of heaven. It would not serve for an excuse, (1.) That he who took this oath was a king, a king of the house of David, whose liberty and dignity might surely set him above the obligation of oaths. No, though kings are gods to us, they are men to God, and not exempt from his law and judgment. The prince is doubtless as firmly bound, before God, to the people by his coronation oath, as the people to the prince by the oath of allegiance. (2.) Nor that this oath was sworn to the king of Babylon, a heathen prince, worse than a heretic, with whom the church of Rome saith no faith is to be kept. No, though Nebuchadnezzar was a worshipper of false gods, yet the true God will avenge his quarrel when one of his worshippers breaks his league with him. For truth is a debt owing to all men; and if the professors of the true religion deal perfidiously with those of a false religion, their profession will be so far from excusing, much less justifying them, that it aggravates their sin; and God will the more surely and severely punish it, because by it they give occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme; as that Mahometan prince who, when the Christians broke the league with him, cried out, 'O Jesus, are these thy Christians?' (3.) Nor would it justify him that the oath was extorted from him by a conqueror; for the covenant was made upon a valuable consideration. He held his life and crown upon this condition, that he should be faithful and bear true allegiance to the king of Babylon; and if he enjoy the benefit of his bargain, it is very unjust if he do not observe the terms. Let him know then that, having "despised the oath and broken the covenant, he shall not escape." And if the contempt and violation of such an oath, such a covenant as this, would be so punished, of how much sorer punishment shall they be thought worthy who break covenant with God, when, lo, they had given their hand upon it that they would be faithful; who tread under foot the blood of that covenant as an unholy thing? Betwixt the covenants there is no comparison.

3rd. It is particularized in divers instances, wherein the punishment is made to answer the sin. First. He had rebelled against the king of Babylon, and the king of Babylon should be his effectual conqueror. In the place where that king dwells whose covenant he broke, even "with him in the midst of Babylon he shall die," ver. 16. He thinks to get out of his hands, but he shall fall more than before into his hands; God himself will now take part with the king of Babylon against him: "I will spread my net upon him," ver. 20. God has a net for those that deal perfidiously, and think to escape his righteous judgments, in which they shall be taken and held that would not be held by the bond of an oath and covenant. Zedekiah dreaded Babylon; Thither I will bring him, saith God, and plead with him there. Men will justly be forced upon that calamity which they endeavour by sin to flee from. Secondly. He had relied upon the king of Egypt, and the king of Egypt should be his ineffectual helper. "Pharaoh with his mighty army shall not make for him in the war," ver. 17, shall do him no service, nor give any check to the progress of the Chaldean forces. He shall not assist him in the siege by casting up mounts and building forts, nor in battle by cutting off many persons. Note, Every creature is that to us that God makes it to be; and he commonly weakens and withers that arm of flesh which we trust in and stay ourselves upon. Now was again fulfilled what was spoken on a former like occasion, Isa. xxx. 7, "The Egyptians shall help in vain." They did so; for, though upon the approach of the Egyptian army the Chaldeans withdrew from the siege of Jerusalem, upon their retreat they returned to it again and took it. It should seem the Egyptians were not hearty, had strength enough but no goodwill to help Zedekiah. Note, Those who deal treacherously with those that put a confidence in them will justly be dealt treacherously with by those they put a confidence in. Yet, the Egyptians were not the only states Zedekiah stayed himself upon. He had bands of his own to stand by him. But those bands, though we may suppose they were veteran troops, and the best soldiers his kingdom afforded, yet they shall become fugitives, shall quit their posts and make the best of their way, and shall fall by the sword of the enemy; and the remains of them shall be scattered, ver. 21. This was fulfilled when "the city was broken up, and all the men of war fled," Jer. lii. 7. Then "ye shall know that I the Lord have spoken it." Note, Sooner or later God's word will prove itself; and those who will not believe shall find by experience the reality and weight of it.

22 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar,
and will set it;
I will crop off from the top of his young twigs a tender one,
And will plant it upon an high mountain and eminent:
23 In the mountain of the height of Israel will I plant it:
And it shall bring forth boughs, and bear fruit, and be a goodly cedar:
And under it shall dwell all fowl of every wing;
In the shadow of the branches thereof shall they dwell.
24 And all the trees of the field shall know
That I the LORD have brought down the high tree, have exalted the low tree,
Have dried up the green tree, and have made the dry tree to flourish:
I the LORD have spoken and have done it.

When the royal family of Judah was brought to desolation by the captivity of Jehoiachin and Zedekiah, it might be asked, What is now become of the covenant of royalty made with David, that "his children should sit upon his throne for evermore?" Do the sure mercies of David prove thus unsure? To which it is sufficient for the silencing of the objectors to answer, that the promise was conditional: If they will keep my covenant, then they shall continue, Ps. cxxxii. 12. But David's posterity broke the condition, and so forfeited the promise. But the unbelief of man shall not invalidate the promise of God. He will find out another seed of David in which it shall be accomplished; and that is promised in these verses.

First. The house of David shall again be magnified, and out of its ashes another phœnix shall arise. The metaphor of a tree which was made use of in the threatening is here presented in the promise, ver. 22, 23. This promise had its accomplishment in part when Zerubbabel, a branch of the house of David, was raised up to head the Jews in their return out of captivity, and to rebuild the city and temple, and re-establish their church and state. But it was to have its full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, who was a root out of a dry ground, and to whom God according to promise gave the throne of his father David, Lu. i. 32.

1. God himself undertakes the reviving and restoring of the house of David. Nebuchadnezzar was the great eagle that had attempted the re-establishing of the house of David in a dependence upon him, ver. 5. But the attempt miscarried; his plantation withered, and was plucked up. Well, saith God, the next shall be of my planting, "I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar, and I will set it." Note, As men have their designs, God also hath his designs; but his will prosper when theirs are blasted. Nebuchadnezzar prided himself in setting up kingdoms at his pleasure, Dan. v. 19; but those kingdoms soon had an end: whereas "the God of heaven sets up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed," Dan. ii. 44.

2. The house of David is revived in "a tender one cropped from the top of his young twigs." Zerubbabel was so; what was in him that was hopeful was but the day of small things, Zec. iv. 10, yet before him great mountains were made plain. Our Lord Jesus was "the highest branch of the high cedar," the farthest of all from the root, for soon after he appeared the house of David was all cut off and extinguished; but the nearest of all to heaven, for his kingdom was not of this world. He was "taken from the top of the young twigs," for he is "the man, the branch, a tender plant, and a root out of a dry ground," Isa. liii. 2, but "a branch of righteousness, the planting of the Lord that he may be glorified."

3. This branch is planted in a high mountain, ver. 22, "in the mountain of the height of Israel," ver. 23. Thither he brought Zerubbabel in triumph, there he raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to gather the lost sheep of the house of Israel that were scattered upon the mountains: set him his king upon his holy hill of Zion, sent forth the Gospel from mount Zion, the word of the Lord from Jerusalem; there in the height of Israel, a nation which all its neighbours had an eye upon as conspicuous and illustrious, was the Christian church first planted. The churches of Judæa were the most primitive churches. The unbelieving Jews did what they could to prevent its being planted there; but who can pluck up what God will plant?

4. From thence it spreads far and wide. The Jewish state, though it began very low in Zerubbabel's time, was set as a tender branch which might easily be plucked up, yet took root, spread strangely, and after some time became very considerable. Those of other nations, "fowl of every wing," put themselves under the protection of it. The Christian church was at first like a grain of mustard-seed, but became, like this tender branch here, a great tree; its beginning small, but its latter end increasing to admiration. When the Gentiles flocked into the church then did the fowl of every wing (even the birds of prey, with those preyed upon, as the wolf and the lamb feeding together, Isa. xi. 6,) come and "dwell under the shadow of this goodly cedar:" see Dan. iv. 21.

Secondly. God himself will herein be glorified, ver. 24. The setting up of the Messiah's kingdom in the world shall discover more clearly than ever to the children of men that "God is the king of all the earth," Ps. xlvii. 7. Never was there a more full conviction given of this truth, that all things are governed by an infinitely wise and mighty Providence, than that which was given by the exaltation of Christ and the establishment of his kingdom among men; for by that it appeared that God has all hearts in his hand, and the sovereign disposal of all affairs. "All the trees of the field shall know," 1. That the tree which God will have to be brought down and dried up shall be so, though it be never so high and stately, never so green and flourishing. Neither honour nor wealth, neither external advancements nor internal endowments, will secure men from humbling, withering providences. 2. That the trees which God will have to be exalted, and to flourish, shall so be, shall so do, though never so low, and never so dry. The house of Nebuchadnezzar that now makes so great a figure shall be extirpated; and the house of David that now makes so mean a figure shall become famous again, and the Jewish nation that is now despicable shall be considerable. The kingdom of Satan that has borne so long, so large a sway, shall be broken, and the kingdom of Christ, that was looked upon with contempt, shall be established. The Jews, that in respect of church privileges had been high and green, shall be thrown out, and the Gentiles, that had been low and dry trees, shall be taken in their room, Isa. liv. 1. All the enemies of Christ shall be abased and made his footstool, and his interests shall be confirmed and advanced. "I the Lord have spoken," it is the decree, the declared decree, that Christ must be exalted, must be the head-stone of the corner; "and I have done it," that is, I will do it in due time, but it is as sure to be done as if it were done already. With men saying and doing are two things; but they are not so with God. What he hath spoken we may be sure he will do, nor shall one iota or tittle of his word fall to the ground: "for he is not a man that he should lie, or the son of man that he should repent," either of his threatenings or of his promises.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Perhaps, in the reading of some of the chapters foregoing, we may have been tempted to think ourselves not much concerned in them, (though they also were written for our learning), but this chapter at first view appears highly and nearly to concern us all very highly, very nearly; for, without particular reference to Judah and Jerusalem, it lays down the rule of judgment according to which God will deal with the children of men, in determining them to their everlasting state; and it agrees with that very ancient rule laid down, Gen. iv. 7; "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?" but, "if not, sin," the punishment of sin, "lies at the door." Here is, I. The corrupt proverb used by the profane Jews, which gave occasion to this message here sent them, and made it necessary for the justifying of God in his dealings with them, ver. 1—3. II. The reply given to this proverb, in which God asserts in general his own sovereignty and justice, ver. 4; Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them, ver. 4, 20; but say to the righteous, it shall be well with them, ver. 5—9. In particular, as to the case complained of, he assures us, 1. That it shall be ill with a wicked man, though he had a good father, ver. 10—13; 2. That it shall be well with a good man, though he had a wicked father, ver. 14—18, and therefore in this God is righteous, ver. 19, 20; 3. That it shall be well with penitents, though they began never so ill, ver. 21—23, and again, ver. 27, 28; 4. That it shall be ill with apostates, though they began never so well, ver. 24, 26. III. And the use of all this is: 1. To justify God, and clear the equity of all his proceedings, ver. 25, 29; 2. To engage and encourage us to repent of our sins and turn to God, ver. 30—32, and these are things which belong to our everlasting peace. O that we may understand and regard them, before they be hid from our eyes!

THE word of the LORD came unto me again, saying, 2 What mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge?

3 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Ye shall not have occasion any more
To use this proverb in Israel.
4 Behold, all souls are mine; [mine:
As the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is
The soul that sinneth, it shall die.
5 But if a man be just,
And do that which is lawful and right,
6 And hath not eaten upon the mountains,
Neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house [of Israel,
Neither hath defiled his neighbour's wife,
Neither hath come near to a menstruous woman,
7 And hath not oppressed any,
But hath restored to the debtor his pledge,
Hath spoiled none by violence,
Hath given his bread to the hungry,
And hath covered the naked with a garment;
8 He that hath not given forth upon usury,
Neither hath taken any increase,
That hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity,
Hath executed true judgment between man and man,
9 Hath walked in my statutes,
And hath kept my judgments, to deal truly;
He is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord GOD.

Evil manners, we say, beget good laws; and, in like manner, sometimes unjust reflections occasion just vindications; evil proverbs beget good prophecies. Here is,

First. An evil proverb commonly used by the Jews in their captivity. We had one before, ch. xii. 22, and a reply to it; here we have another, that sets God's justice at defiance; "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth;" the threatenings are a jest. This chargeth him with injustice, as if the judgments executed were a wrong; "You use this proverb concerning the land of Israel," now it is laid waste by the judgments of God, "saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge;" that is, we are punished for the sins of our ancestors; which is as great an absurdity in the Divine regimen as if the children should have their teeth set on edge, or stupified, by the fathers' eating sour grapes; whereas, in the order of natural causes, if men eat or drink any thing amiss, they only themselves shall suffer by it. Now,

1. It must be owned that there was some occasion given for this proverb. God had often said that he would "visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children," especially the sin of idolatry, intending thereby to express the evil of sin, of that sin, his detestation of it, and just indignation against it, and the heavy punishments he would bring upon idolaters; and that parents might be restrained from sin by their affection to their children, and that children might not be drawn to sin by their reverence for their parent. He had likewise often declared by his prophets, that in bringing the present ruin upon Judah and Jerusalem he had an eye to the sins of Manasseh, and other preceding kings; for, looking upon the nation as a body politic, and punishing them with national judgments for national sins, and admitting the maxim in our law, that a corporation never dies, reckoning with them now for the iniquities of former ages was but like making a man when he is old to possess the iniquities of his youth, Job xiii. 26; and there is no unrighteousness with God in doing so. But,

2. They intended it as a reflection upon God, and an impeachment of his equity, in his proceedings against them. Thus far that is right which is implied in this proverbial saying, that they who are guilty of wilful sin eat sour grapes, they do that which they will feel from, sooner or later. The grapes may look well enough in the temptation, but they will be bitter as bitterness itself in the reflection. They will set the sinner's teeth on edge; when conscience is awake and sets the sin in order before them, it will spoil the relish of their comforts as when the teeth are set on edge. But they suggest it as unreasonable that the children should smart for the fathers' folly, and feel the pain of that which they never tasted the pleasure of; and that God was unrighteous in thus taking vengeance, and could not justify it. See how wicked the reflection is, how daring the impudence! yet see how witty it is, and how sly the comparison. Many that are impious in their jeers are ingenious in their jests; and thus the malice of hell against God and religion is insinuated and propagated. It is here put into a proverb, and that proverb used, commonly used; they had it up ever and anon. And though it had plainly a blasphemous meaning, yet they sheltered themselves under the similitude from the imputation of downright blasphemy. Now, by this it appears they were unhumbled under the rod; for, instead of condemning themselves and justifying God, they condemned him and justified themselves. But woe to him that thus strives with his Maker.

Secondly. A just reproof of, and reply to, this proverb; "What mean ye" to use it? that is the reproof; do you intend hereby to try it out with God? Or, can you think any other but that you will hereby provoke him to be angry with you till he has consumed you? Is this the way to reconcile yourselves to him, and make your peace with him? The reply follows, in which God tells them,

1. That the use of the proverb should be taken away. This is said, it is sworn; ver. 3, "Ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb." Or, as it may be read, 'Ye shall not have the use of this parable.' The taking away of this parable is made the matter of a promise, Jer. xxxi. 29, here it is made the matter of a threatening; there it intimates that God will return to them in ways of mercy, here it intimates that God would proceed against them in ways of judgment. He will so punish them for this impudent saying that they shall not dare to use it any more: as in another case, Jer. xxiii. 34, 36. God will find out effectual ways to silence those cavillers; or, God will so manifest, both to themselves and others, that they have wickedness of their own enough to bring all these desolating judgments upon them, that they shall no longer for shame lay it upon the sins of their fathers that they were thus dealt with. Your own consciences shall tell you, and all your neighbours shall confirm it, that you yourselves have eaten the same sour grapes that your fathers did eat before you, or else your teeth had not been set on edge.

2. That really the saying itself was unjust, and a causeless reflection upon God's government. For, 1st. God doth not punish the children for the fathers' sins, unless they tread in their steps, and fill up the measure of their iniquity," Mat. xxiii. 32, and then they have no reason to complain; for whatsoever they suffer it is less than their own sin has deserved. And when God speaks of "visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children," that is so far from putting any hardship upon the children, to whom he only renders according to their works, that it accounts for God's patience with the parents, whom he therefore does not punish presently, because he "lays up their iniquity for their children," Job xxix. 19. 2nd. It is not only in temporal calamities that children (and sometimes innocent ones) fare the worse for their parents' wickedness; and

God can alter the property of those calamities, and make them work for good to those that are visited with them. But as to spiritual and eternal misery, (and that is the death here spoken of,) the children shall by no means smart for the parents' sins. This is here shewed at large, and it is a wonderful piece of condescension, that the great God is pleased to reason the case with such wicked and unreasonable men, that he did not immediately strike them dumb and dead, but vouchsafed to state the matter before them, that he may be clear when he is judged. Now in his reply,

First. He asserts and maintains his own absolute and incontestable sovereignty; "Behold, all souls are mine," ver. 4. God here claims a property in all the souls of the children of men, one as well as another. 1st. Souls are his. He that is the Maker of all things is in a peculiar manner the Father of spirits, for his image is stamped on the souls of men. It was so in their creation, it is so in their renovation. He "formeth the spirit of man within him," and is therefore called "the God of the spirits of all flesh," and embodied spirits. 2nd. "All souls are his," all created by him, and for him, and accountable to him. "As the soul of the father, so the soul of the son is mine." Our earthly parents are only the fathers of our flesh, our souls are not theirs, God challengeth them. Now, from hence it follows for the clearing of this matter, (1.) That it is certain God may do what he pleaseth, both with fathers and children, and none may say unto him, What doest thou? He that gave us our being doth us no wrong if he take it away again, much less when he only takes away some of the supports and comforts of it. It is as absurd to quarrel with him as for "the thing formed to say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" (2.) That it is as certain God bears a good will both to father and son, and will put no hardship upon either. We are sure God hateth nothing that he has made, and therefore (speaking of the adult who are capable of acting for themselves) he has such a kindness for all souls, that none die but through their own default. "All souls are his," and therefore he is not partial in his judgment with them; let us subscribe to his interest in us, and dominion over us. He saith, "All souls are mine;" let us answer, Lord, my soul is thine, I devote it to thee, to be employed for thee, and made happy in thee. It is with good reason that God saith, "My son, give me thy heart," for it is my own; to which we must yield, Father, take my heart, it is thy own.

Secondly. Though God might justify himself by insisting upon his sovereignty, yet he waives that, and lays down the equitable and unexceptionable rule of judgment by which he will proceed as to particular persons, and it is this:

1st. The sinner that persists in sin shall certainly die; his iniquity shall be his ruin. "The soul that sinneth it shall die," shall die as a soul can die, shall be excluded from the favour of God, which is the life and bliss of the soul, and shall lie for ever under his wrath, which is its death and misery. Sin is the act of the soul, the body is but the instrument of unrighteousness. It is called the sin of the soul, Mic. vi. 7; and therefore the punishment of sin is the tribulation and anguish of the soul, Rom. ii. 9.

2nd. The righteous man that perseveres in his righteousness shall certainly live. "If a man be just," have a good principle, a good spirit and disposition, and, as an evidence of that, "do judgment and justice," ver. 5, "he shall surely live, saith the Lord God," ver. 9. He that makes conscience of conforming himself in every thing to the will of God, that makes it his business to serve God, and his aim to glorify God, he shall, without fail, be happy here and for ever, in the love and favour of God; and wherein he comes short of his duty, it shall be forgiven him through a Mediator.

1. He is careful to keep himself clear from the pollutions of sin, and at a distance from all the appearances of evil.

(1.) From sins against the second commandment. In the matters of God's worship he is jealous, for he knows God is so. He hath not only not sacrificed in the high places to the images there set up, but he has not so much as eaten upon the mountains, that is, not had any communion with idolaters by eating things sacrificed to idols, 1 Cor. x. 20. He would not only not kneel with them at their altars, but not sit with them at their tables in their high places. He detests not only the idols of the heathen, but the idols of the house of Israel, which were not only allowed of, but generally applauded and adored by, those that were accounted the professing people of God. He has not only not worshipped those idols, but he hath not so much as lift up his eyes to them, he has not given them a favourable look; has had no regard at all to them, neither desired their favour nor dreaded their frowns. He has observed so many bewitched by them, that he has not dared so much as to look at them, lest he should be taken in the snare. The eyes of idolaters are said to go a whoring, Eze. vi. 9: see Deu. iv. 19.

(2.) From sins against the seventh commandment. He is careful to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of uncleanness; and therefore he has not dared to defile his neighbour's wife, nor said nor done any thing which had the least tendency to corrupt or debauch her; no, nor will he make any undue approaches to his own wife when she is put apart for her uncleanness, for it was forbidden by the law, Lev. xviii. 19; xx. 18. Note, It is an essential branch of wisdom and justice to keep the appetites of the body in subjection to reason and virtue.

(3.) From sins against the eighth commandment. He is a just man that hath not by fraud, and, under colour of law and right, oppressed any, and that hath not with force and arms spoiled any by violence, nor spoiled them of their goods or estates, much less of their liberties and lives, ver. 7. Oppression and violence were the sins of the old world, that brought the deluge, and are sins which still God is and will be the avenger of. Nay, he is one that has not lent his money upon usury, nor taken increase, ver. 8. Though being done by contract it may seem free from injustice, (volenti non fit injuria,—'what is done to a person with his own consent is no injury to him,') yet as far as it is forbidden by law he dares not do it. A moderate usury they were allowed to receive from strangers, but not from their brethren. A just man will not take advantage of his neighbour's necessity to make a prey of him, nor indulge himself in ease and idleness, to live upon the sweat and toil of others; and therefore will not take increase from those who cannot make increase of what he lends them, nor be rigorous in exacting what was agreed for from those that by the act of God are disabled to pay it, but is willing to share in loss as well as profit. Qui sentit commodum, sentire nebet et onus,—'He who enjoys the benefit should bear the burthen.'

2. He makes conscience of doing the duties of his place. He hath restored the pledge to the poor debtor, according to the law; Ex. xxii. 26, "If thou take thy neighbour's raiment" for a pawn, the raiment that is for necessary use, "thou shalt deliver it to him again," that he may sleep in his own bedclothes. Nay, he has not only restored to the poor that which was their own, but has given his bread to the hungry. Observe, it is called his bread, because it is honestly come by. That which is given to some is not unjustly taken from others; for God hath said, "I hate robbery for burnt offerings." Worldly men insist upon it that their bread is their own, as Nabal, who therefore would not give of it to David, 1 Sam. xxv. 17; yet let them know it is not so their own, but that they are bound to do good to others with it. Clothes are necessary as well as food, and therefore this just man is so charitable as to cover the naked also with a garment, ver. 7. The coats which Dorcas had made for the poor were produced as witnesses of her charity, Acts ix. 39. This just man has "withdrawn his hand from iniquity," ver. 8; if at any time he has been drawn in through inadvertency to that which afterwards has appeared to him to be an ill thing, he doth not persist in it, because he has begun it, but withdraws his hand from that which he now perceives to be iniquity; for he "executes true judgment between man and man," according as his opportunity is of doing it; as a judge, as a witness, as a juryman, as referee; and in all commerce is concerned that justice be done, that no man be wronged, that he that is wronged be righted, and that every man have his own; and is ready to interpose himself, and do any good office in order hereunto: this is his character towards his neighbour. Yet it will not suffice that he be just and true to his brother; to complete his character he must be so to his God likewise; ver. 9, "He hath walked in my statutes," those which relate to the duties of his immediate worship; he hath kept those and all other his judgments, has had respect to them all, has made it his constant care and endeavour to conform and come up to them all; to deal truly, that is, that so he may approve himself faithful to his covenant with God, that having joined himself to God, doth not treacherously depart from him, or dissemble with him. This is a just man, and living he shall live; he shall certainly live, shall have life, and shall have it more abundantly; shall live truly, live comfortably, live eternally. Keep the commandments, and thou shalt enter into life, Mat. xix. 17.

10 If he beget a son that is a robber, a shedder of blood,
And that doeth the like to any one of these things,
11 And that doeth not any of those duties,
But even hath eaten upon the mountains,
And defiled his neighbour's wife,
12 Hath oppressed the poor and needy,
Hath spoiled by violence,
Hath not restored the pledge,
And hath lifted up his eyes to the idols,
Hath committed abomination,
13 Hath given forth upon usury,
And hath taken increase:
Shall he then live? he shall not live:
He hath done all these abominations; he shall surely die;
His blood shall be upon him.
14 Now, lo, if he beget a son,
That seeth all his father's sins which he hath done,
And considereth, and doeth not such like,
15 That hath not eaten upon the mountains,
Neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house
Hath not defiled his neighbour's wife, [of Israel,
16 Neither hath oppressed any,
Hath not withholden the pledge,
Neither hath spoiled by violence,
But hath given his bread to the hungry,
And hath covered the naked with a garment,
17 That hath taken off his hand from the poor,
That hath not received usury nor increase,
Hath executed my judgments, hath walked in my statutes;
He shall not die for the iniquity of his father, he shall 18 As for his father, [surely live.
Because he cruelly oppressed,
Spoiled his brother by violence,
And did that which is not good among his people,
Lo, even he shall die in his iniquity. [the father?
19 Yet say ye, Why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of
When the son hath done that which is lawful and right,
And hath kept all my statutes, and hath done them,
He shall surely live.
20 The soul that sinneth, it shall die.
The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father,
Neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son:
The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him,
And the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him.

God by the prophet having laid down the general rule of judgment, that he will render eternal life to them that patiently continue in well-doing, but indignation and wrath to them that do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, Rom. ii. 7, 8, comes in these verses to shew that men's parentage and relation shall not alter the case either one way or other.

First. He applies it largely and particularly both ways. As it was in the royal line of the kings of Judah, so it often happens in private families, that godly parents have wicked children, and wicked parents have godly children. Now here he shews,

1. That a wicked man shall certainly perish in his iniquity, though he was the son of a pious father. If that righteous man before described beget a son, whose character is the reverse of his father's, his condition will certainly be so too. 1st. It is supposed as no uncommon case, but a very melancholy one, that the child of a very godly father, notwithstanding all the instructions given him, the good education he has had, and the needful rebukes that have been given him, and the restraints he has been laid under, after all the pains taken with him, the prayers put up for him, may yet prove notoriously wicked and vile, the grief of his father, the shame of his family, and the curse and plague of his generation. He is here supposed to allow himself in all those enormities which his good father dreaded, and carefully avoided; and to shake off all those good duties which his father made conscience of, and took satisfaction in; undoes all that his father did, and goes counter to his example in every thing. He is here described to be a highwayman, "a robber and a shedder of blood;" an idolater, he hath eaten upon the mountains, ver. 11, and has lifted up his eyes to the idols, which his good father never did, and has come at length not only to feast with the idolaters, but to sacrifice with them, which is here called committing abomination, for the way of sin is down-hill. He is an adulterer, hath defiled his neighbour's wife; an oppressor, even of the poor and needy; he robs the spital, and squeezeth those who he knows cannot right themselves, and takes a pride and pleasure in trampling upon the weak, and impoverishing those that are poor already. He takes away from those to whom he should give. He hath spoiled by violence and open force; he hath given forth upon usury, and so spoiled by contract; and hath not restored the pledge, but unjustly detained it, even when the debt was paid. Let those good parents that have wicked children not look upon their case as singular; it is a case put here, and by it we see that grace doth not run in a blood, nor always attend the means of grace; nor is the race always to the swift or the battle to the strong, for then the children that are well taught would do well: but God will let us know that his grace is his own, and his Spirit a free agent; and that, though we are tied to give our children a good education, he is not tied to bless it. In this, as much as any thing, appears the power of original sin, and the necessity of special grace. 2nd. We are here assured that this wicked man shall perish for ever in his iniquity, notwithstanding his being the son of a good father. He may perhaps prosper awhile in the world for the sake of the piety of his ancestors; but, having committed all these abominations, and never repented of them, "he shall not live," he shall not be happy in the favour of God. Though he may escape the sword of men, he shall not escape the curse of God; "he shall surely die." He shall be for ever miserable; "his blood shall be upon him." He may thank himself; he is his own destroyer, and his relation to a good father will be so far from standing him in stead, that it will aggravate his sin and his condemnation. It made his sin the more heinous, nay, it made him really the more vile and profligate; and consequently will make his misery hereafter the more intolerable.

2. That a righteous man shall be certainly happy, though he is the son of a wicked father. Though the father did eat the sour grapes, if the children do not meddle with them, they shall fare never the worse for that. Here,

1st. It is supposed, and, blessed be God, it is sometimes a case in fact, that the son of an ungodly father may be godly; that, observing how fatal his father's errors were, he may be so wise as to take warning, and not tread in his father's steps, ver. 14. Ordinarily children partake of the parent's temper, and are drawn in to imitate their example; but here the son, instead of seeing his father's sins, and, as is usual, doing the like, sees them, and dreads doing the like. Men indeed do not gather grapes of thorns, but God sometimes doth; takes a branch from a wild olive, and grafts it into a good one. Wicked Ahaz begets a good Hezekiah, who "sees all his father's sins which he has done;" and though he will not, like Ham, proclaim his father's shame, or make the worst of it, yet he loathes it, and blushes at it, and thinks the worse of sin, because it was the reproach and ruin of his own father. "He considereth, and doth not such like." Considers how ill it became his father to do such things, what an offence it was to God and all good men, what a wound and dishonour he got by it, and what calamities he brought into his family; and therefore he doth not such like. Note, If we did but duly consider the ways of wicked men, we would all dread being associates with them, and followers of them. The particulars are here again enumerated, almost in the same words with that character given of the just man, ver. 6, &c., to shew how good men walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps. This just man here, when he took care to avoid his father's sins, took care to imitate his grandfather's virtues. And if we look back we shall find some examples for our imitation, as well as others for our admonition. This just man cannot only say as the Pharisee, "I am no adulterer, no extortioner," no oppressor, no usurer, no idolater; but he hath given his bread to the hungry, and covered the naked; he hath taken off his hand from the poor. Where he found his father had put hardships upon poor servants, tenants, neighbours, he eased their burthen; did not say, What my father has done I will abide by; and if it was a fault, it was his, and not mine; as Rehoboam, who contemned the taxes his father had imposed. No, he takes his hand off from the poor, and restores them to their rights and liberties again, ver. 15—17. Thus he hath "executed God's judgments, and walked in his statutes." Not only done his duty for once, but gone on in a course and way of obedience.

2nd. We are assured that the graceless father alone shall die in his iniquity, but his gracious son shall fare never the worse for it. As for his father, ver. 18, because he was a cruel oppressor, and did hurt; nay, because though he had wealth and power, he did not with it do good among his people; lo, "even he," as great as he is, "shall die in his iniquity," and be undone for ever. But he that kept his integrity "shall surely live," shall be easy and happy, and he shall not "die for the iniquity of his father." Perhaps his father's wickedness has lessened his estate, and weakened his interest, but it shall be no prejudice at all to his acceptance with God, and his eternal welfare.

Secondly. He appeals to themselves then, whether they did not wrong God with their proverb. Thus plain the case is, and yet ye say, "Doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father?" No; he doth not, he shall not, if he will himself "do that which is lawful and right," ver. 19. But this people, that bear the iniquity of their fathers, had not done that which is lawful and right, and therefore justly suffered for their own sin, and had no reason to complain of God's proceedings against them as at all unjust, though they had reason to complain of the ill example their fathers had left them as very unkind; "Our fathers have sinned, and are not, and we have borne their iniquity," Lam. v. 7. It is true that there is a curse entailed upon wicked families; but it is as true that the entail may be cut off by repentance and reformation. Let the impenitent and unreformed, therefore, thank themselves if they fall under it. The settled rule of judgment is therefore repeated, ver. 20, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," and not another for it. What direction God hath given to earthly judges, (Deu. xxiv. 16,) he will himself pursue; "The son shall not die," not die eternally, "for the iniquity of the father," if he do not tread in the steps of it; "nor the father for the iniquity of the son," if he endeavour to do his duty for the preventing of it. In "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God," which is now clouded and eclipsed, "the righteousness of the righteous shall" appear before all the world to "be upon him," to his everlasting comfort and honour, upon him as a robe, upon him as a crown; and "the wickedness of the wicked upon him," to his everlasting confusion, upon him as a chain, upon him as a load, as a mountain of lead to sink him to the bottomless pit.

21 But if the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, [and right,
And keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful
He shall surely live, he shall not die.
22 All his transgressions that he hath committed,
They shall not be mentioned unto him:
In his righteousness that he hath done he shall live.
23 Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die?
Saith the Lord GOD:
And not that he should return from his ways, and live?
24 But when the righteous turneth away from his righteous-
And committeth iniquity, [ness,
And doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth,
Shall he live? [tioned:
All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be men-
In his trespass that he hath trespassed,
And in his sin that he hath sinned,
In them shall he die.
25 Yet ye say,
The way of the Lord is not equal.
Hear now, O house of Israel;
Is not my way equal? are not your ways unequal?
26 When a righteous man turneth away from his righteous-
And committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; [ness,
For his iniquity that he hath done shall he die.
27 Again, when the wicked man turneth away
From his wickedness that he hath committed,
And doeth that which is lawful and right,
He shall save his soul alive.
28 Because he considereth,
And turneth away from all his transgressions that he hath committed,
He shall surely live, he shall not die.
29 Yet saith the house of Israel,
The way of the Lord is not equal.
O house of Israel, are not my ways equal?
Are not your ways unequal?

We have here another rule of judgment which God will go by in dealing with us, by which is farther demonstrated the equity of his government. The former shewed that God will reward or punish, according to the change made in the family or succession, for the better or for the worse. Here he shews that he will reward or punish according to the change made in the person himself, whether for the better or the worse. While we are in this world we are in a state of probation; the time and trial lasts as long as the time of life; and according as we are found at last it will be with us to eternity. Now see here,

First. The case fairly stated much as it had been before, ch. iii. 18, &c., and here it is laid down once, ver. 21—24, and again, ver. 26—28, because it is a matter of vast importance, a matter of life and death, of life and death eternal. Here we have,

1. A fair invitation given to wicked people to turn from their wickedness. Assurance is here given us, that if the wicked will turn he shall surely live, ver. 21, 27. Observe,

1st. What is required to denominate a man a true convert; how he must be qualified that he may be entitled to this act of indemnity. First. The first step towards conversion is consideration; ver. 28, "Because he considereth and turneth." The reason why sinners go on in their evil ways is, because they do not consider what will be in the end thereof; but if the prodigal once come to himself, if he sit down and consider a little how bad his state is, and how easily it may be bettered, he will soon return to his father, Lu. xv. 17; and the adulteress to her first husband, when she considers that "then it was better with her than now," Hos. ii. 7. Secondly. This consideration must produce an aversion to sin. When he considereth he must turn away from his wickedness, that notes a change in the heart, and in the disposition of that. He must turn from his sins and his transgressions, that notes a change in the life; he must break off from all his evil courses, and wherein he has done iniquity must resolve to do so no more, and this from a principle of hatred to sin. "What have I to do any more with idols?" Thirdly. This aversion to sin must be universal. He must turn from all his sins, and all his transgressions, without a reserve for any Dalilah, any house of Rimmon. We do not rightly turn from sin unless we truly hate it; and we do not truly hate sin as sin, if we do not hate all sin. Fourthly. This must be accompanied with a conversion to God and duty. He must keep all God's statutes, (for the obedience, if it be sincere, will be universal,) and must "do that which is lawful and right," which agrees with the word and will of God, which he must take for his rule, and not the will of the flesh and the way of the world.

2nd. What is promised to those that do thus turn from sin to God. First. They shall save their souls alive, ver. 27. They shall surely live, they shall not die, ver. 21, and again, ver. 28; whereas it was said, "The soul that sins, it shall die," yet let not those that have sinned despair but that the threatened death may be prevented, if they will but turn and repent in time. When David penitently acknowledgeth, "I have sinned," he is immediately assured of his pardon;

"The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die," 2 Sam. xii. 13; thou shalt not die eternally. He shall surely live; that is, he shall be restored to the favour of God, which is the life of the soul, and shall not lie under his wrath, which is as messengers of death to the soul. Secondly. The sins they have repented of and forsaken shall not rise up in judgment against them, nor shall they be so much as upbraided with them. "All his transgressions that he has committed," though numerous, though heinous, though very provoking to God, and redounding very much to his dishonour, yet they "shall not be mentioned unto him," ver. 22, not mentioned against him. Not only they shall not be imputed to him to ruin him, but in the great day they shall not be remembered against him to grieve or shame him; they shall be covered, shall be sought for and not found. This speaks the fulness of pardoning mercy; when sin is forgiven, it is blotted out, it is remembered no more. Thirdly. In their righteousness they shall live; not for their righteousness, as if that were the purchase of their pardon and bliss, and an atonement for their sins, but in their righteousness, which qualifies them for all the blessings purchased by the Mediator, and is itself one of those blessings.

3rd. What encouragement a repenting, returning sinner hath to hope for pardon and life according to this promise. He is conscious to himself that his obedience for the future can never be a valuable compensation for his former disobedience; but he has this to support himself with, that God's nature, property, and delight is to have mercy, and to forgive; for he hath said, ver. 23, "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die?" No, by no means; you never had any cause given you to think so. It is true that God has determined to punish sinners, his justice calls for it; and, pursuant to that, impenitent sinners will lie for ever under his wrath and curse; that is the will of his decree, his consequent will, but not his antecedent will, the will of his delight. Though the righteousness of his government requires that sinners die, yet the goodness of his nature objects against it. "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" It is spoken here comparatively. He hath not pleasure in the ruin of sinners, for he would rather they should turn from their ways and live. He is better pleased when his mercy is glorified in their salvation than when his justice is glorified in their damnation.

2. A fair warning given to righteous people not to turn from their righteousness, ver. 24, 26. Here is, 1st. The character of an apostate, that turns away from his righteousness. He never was in sincerity a righteous man, as appears by that of the apostle, 1 Jno. ii. 19, "If they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us;" but he passed for a righteous man, had the denomination and all the external marks of a righteous man, he thought himself one, and others thought him one; but he throws off his profession, leaves his first love, disowns and forsakes the truth and ways of God, and so "turns away from his righteousness," as one sick of it, and now shews what he always had, a secret aversion to it. And having "turned away from his righteousness, he commits iniquity," grows loose, and profane, and sensual, intemperate, unjust, and, in short, "doth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doth;" for when the unclean spirit recovers his possession of the heart, he "brings with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there," Lu. xi. 26. 2nd. The doom of an apostate. Shall he live because he was once a righteous man?" No; factum non dicitur quod non perseverat,—'that which does not abide is not said to be done.' In his trespass, ver. 24, and for his iniquity, (that is the meritorious cause of his ruin,) for the iniquity "that he has done he shall die," shall die eternally; ver. 26, "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways." But will not his former professions and performances stand him in some stead? will they not avail at least to mitigate his punishment? No, "all his righteousness that he has done," though never so much applauded by men, "shall not be mentioned," so as to be either a credit or a comfort to him. The righteousness of an apostate is forgotten, as the wickedness of a penitent is. Under the law, if a Nazarite was polluted, he lost all his foregoing days of his separation, Num. vi. 12; so those that have begun in the Spirit, and end in the flesh, may reckon all their past services and sufferings in vain, Gal. iii. 3, 4. Unless we persevere, we lose what we have gained, 2 Jno. 8.

Secondly. An appeal to the consciences even of the house of Israel, though very corrupt, concerning God's equity in all these proceedings; for he will be justified, as well as sinners judged, out of their own mouths. 1. The charge they drew up against God is blasphemous; ver. 25, 29, the house of Israel has the impudence to say, "The way of the Lord is not equal," than which nothing could be more absurd, as well as impious. "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" Can his ways be unequal whose will is the eternal rule of good and evil, right and wrong? "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" No doubt he shall, he cannot do otherwise. 2. God's reasonings with them are very gracious and condescending, for even these blasphemers God would rather have convinced and saved than condemned. One would have expected that God should have immediately vindicated the honour of his justice by making those that impeached it eternal monuments of it. Must these be suffered to draw another breath that have once breathed out such wickedness as this? Shall that tongue ever speak again anywhere but in hell that has once said, "The ways of the Lord are not equal?" Yes, because this is the day of God's patience, he vouchsafes to argue with them, and he requires them to own, for it is so plain that they cannot deny, 1st. The equity of his ways; "Are not my ways equal?" No doubt they are; he never lays upon man more than is right. In the present punishments of sinners, and the afflictions of his own people, yea, and in the eternal damnation of the impenitent, "the ways of the Lord are equal." 2nd. The iniquity of their ways; "Are not your ways unequal?" It is plain they are, and the troubles you are in you have brought upon your own heads. God doth you no wrong, but you have wronged yourselves. "The foolishness of man perverts his ways," makes them unequal, and then "his heart frets against the Lord," as if his ways were unequal, Pr. xix. 3. In all our disputes with God, and in all his controversies with us, it will be found that his ways are equal, but ours are unequal; that he is in the right and we are in the wrong.

30 Therefore I will judge you, O house of Israel,
Every one according to his ways, saith the Lord GOD.
Repent, and turn yourselves from all your transgressions;
So iniquity shall not be your ruin.
31 Cast away from you all your transgressions, whereby ye have transgressed;
And make you a new heart and a new spirit:
For why will ye die, O house of Israel?
32 For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth,
Saith the Lord GOD: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye.

We have here the conclusion and application of this whole matter. After a fair trial at the bar of right reason, the verdict is brought in on God's side, it appears that his ways are equal; judgment therefore is next to be given, and one would think it should be a judgment of condemnation, nothing short of "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." But behold a miracle of mercy; the day of grace and Divine patience is yet lengthened out; and therefore, though God will at last judge every one according to his ways, yet he waits to be gracious, and closes all with a call to repentance, and a promise of pardon upon repentance.

First. Here are four necessary duties that we are called to, all amounting to the same. 1. We must repent. We must change our mind and change our ways; we must be sorry for what we have done amiss, and ashamed of it, and go as far as we can towards the undoing of it again. 2. We must "turn ourselves from all our transgressions," ver. 30. And again, ver. 32, "Turn yourselves," face about; turn from sin, nay, turn against it as the enemy you loathe, turn to God as the friend you love. 3. We must "cast away from us all our transgressions;" we must abandon and forsake them with a resolution never to return to them again. Give sin a bill of divorce; break all the leagues we have made with it; throw it overboard, as the mariners did Jonah, for it has raised the storm; cast it out of the soul, and crucify it as a malefactor. 4. We must "make us a new heart, and a new spirit." This was the matter of a promise, ch. xi. 19; here it is the matter of a precept. We must do our endeavour, and then God will not be wanting to us to give us his grace. St. Austin well explains this precept, Deus non jubet impossibilia, sed jubendo monet et facere quod possis, et petere quod non possis,—'God does not enjoin impossibilities, but by his commands admonishes us to do what is in our power, and to pray for what is not.' He hereby admonishes us to do what is in our power, and to pray for what is not.

Secondly. Here are four good arguments to enforce these calls to repentance. 1. It is the only way, and it is a sure way, to prevent the ruin which our sins have a direct tendency to. "So iniquity shall not be your ruin;" which implies, that if we do not repent iniquity will be our ruin here and for ever; but if we do, we are safe, we are snatched as brands out of the burning. 2. If we repent not, we certainly perish, and our blood will be upon our own heads. "Why will ye die, O house of Israel?" What an absurd thing is it for you to choose death and damnation rather than life and salvation. Note, The reason why sinners die is, because they will die, they will go down the way that leads to death, and not come up to the terms on which life is offered. Herein sinners, especially sinners of the house of Israel, are most unreasonable, and act most unaccountably. 3. The God of heaven has no delight in our ruin, but desires our welfare; ver. 32, "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth;" which implies, that he has pleasure in the recovery of those that repent, which is both an engagement and an encouragement to us to repent. 4. We are made for ever if we repent. "Turn yourselves, and live ye." He that saith to us, Repent, thereby saith to us, Live; yea, he saith to us, Live; so that life and death are here set before us.

CHAPTER XIX.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the seventh, to foretell and lament the ruin of the house of David, the royal family of Judah, in the calamitous exit of the four sons and grandsons of Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah, in whom that illustrious line of kings was cut off, which the prophet is here ordered to lament, ver. 1; and he doth it by similitudes. I. The kingdom of Judah and house of David is here compared to a lioness, and those princes to lions that were fierce and ravenous, but were hunted down and taken in nets, ver. 2—9. II. That kingdom and house are here compared to a vine, and these princes to branches, that had been strong and flourishing, but were now broken off and burnt, ver. 10—14. This ruin of that monarchy was now in the doing, and this lamentation of it was intended to affect the people with it, that they might not flatter themselves with vain hopes of the lengthening out of their tranquillity.

MOREOVER take thou up a lamentation for the princes of Israel, 2 And say,
What is thy mother? A lioness:
She lay down among lions,
She nourished her whelps among young lions.
3 And she brought up one of her whelps:
It became a young lion,

LION HUNT.

And it learned to catch the prey; it devoured men.
4 The nations also heard of him;
He was taken in their pit, [Egypt.
And they brought him with chains unto the land of

And her hope was lost,
Then she took another of her whelps,
And made him a young lion.
6 And he went up and down among the lions,
He became a young lion,
And learned to catch the prey, and devoured men.
7 And he knew their desolate palaces,
And he laid waste their cities;
And the land was desolate, and the fulness thereof,

8 Then the nations set against him on every side from the
And spread their net over him:
He was taken in their pit.
9 And they put him in ward in chains,
And brought him to the king of Babylon:
They brought him into holds,
That his voice should no more be heard
Upon the mountains of Israel.

Here is, First. Orders given to the prophet to bewail the fall of the royal family, which had long made so great a figure by virtue of a covenant of royalty made with David and his seed, that the eclipsing and extinguishing of it is justly lamented by all that know what value to put upon the covenant of our God; as we find, after a very large account of that covenant with David, Ps. lxxxix. 3, 20, &c., a sad lamentation for the decays and desolation of his family; ver. 38, 39, "But thou hast cast off and abhorred, hast made void the covenant of thy servant, and profaned his crown," &c. The kings of Judah are here called princes of Israel; for their glory was diminished, and they were become as princes; and their purity was lost, they were become corrupt and idolatrous as the kings of Israel, whose ways they had learned. The prophet must take up a lamentation for them; that is, he must describe their lamentable fall, as one that did himself lay it to heart, and desired those he preached to and wrote to might do so too. And how can we expect others should be affected with that which we ourselves are not affected with? And ministers, when they boldly foretell, yet must bitterly lament, the destruction of sinners, as those that have not desired the woful day. He is not directed to give advice to the princes of Israel, (that had been long and often done in vain,) but the decree being gone forth he must take up a lamentation for them.

Secondly. Instructions given him what to say.

1. He must compare the kingdom of Judah to a lioness; so wretchedly degenerated was it from what it had been formerly, when it sat as a queen among the nations; ver. 2, "What is thy mother?" Thine, O king. We read of Solomon's crown wherewith his mother crowned him; that is, his people, Cant. iii. 11. Thine, O Judah; the royal family is as a mother to the kingdom, a nursing mother; she is a lioness, fierce and cruel, and ravenous. When they had left their divinity, they soon lost their humanity too; and when they feared not God, neither did they regard man. She lay down among lions. God had said the people shall dwell alone, but they mingled themselves with the nations, and learned their works. "She nourished her whelps among young lions;" taught the young princes the way of tyrants, which was then used by the arbitrary kings of the East; filled their heads betimes with notions of their absolute despotic power, and possessed them with a belief that they had a right to enslave their subjects, that their liberty and property lay at their mercy. Thus "she nourished her whelps among young lions."

2. He must compare the kings of Judah to lions' whelps, ver. 3. Jacob had compared Judah, and especially the house of David, to a lion's whelp, for its being strong and formidable to its enemies abroad; Gen. xlix. 9, "He is an old lion, who shall stir him up?" And if they had adhered to the Divine law and promise God had preserved to them the might, and majesty, and dominion of a lion; and doth it in Christ, the lion of the tribe of Judah. But these lions' whelps were so to their own subjects, were cruel and oppressive to them, preyed upon their estates and liberties; and when they thus by their tyranny made themselves a terror to those whom they ought to have protected, it was just with God to make those a terror to them whom otherwise they might have subdued. Here is lamented,

1st. The sin and fall of Jehoahaz, one of the whelps of this lioness. He became a young lion, ver. 3; he was made king, and thought he was made so that he might do what he pleased, and gratify his own ambition, covetousness, and revenge, as he had a mind; and so he was soon master of all the arts of tyranny: he "learned to catch the prey, and devoured men." When he had got power in his hand, all that had before in any thing disobliged him were made to feel his resentments, and become a sacrifice to his rage. But what came of it? He did not prosper long in his tyranny. The "nations heard of him," ver. 4, heard how furiously he drove at his first coming to the crown, how he trampled upon all that is just and sacred, and violated all his engagements, so that they looked upon him as a dangerous neighbour, and prosecuted him accordingly, "as a multitude of shepherds is called forth against a lion roaring on his prey," Isa. xxxi. 4; and he was taken as a beast of prey in their pit. His own subjects durst not stand up in defence of their own liberties; but God raised up a foreign power that soon put an end to his tyranny, and "brought him in chains to the land of Egypt." Thither Jehoahaz was carried captive, and never heard of more.

2nd. The like sin and fall of his successor, Jehoiakim. The kingdom of Judah for some time expected the return of Jehoahaz out of Egypt, but at length despaired of it, and then took another of the lion's whelps, and made him a young lion, ver. 5. And he, instead of taking warning by his brother's fate, to use his power with equity and moderation, and to seek the good of his people, trod in his brother's steps; "He went up and down among the lions," ver. 6; he consulted and conversed with those that were fierce and furious like himself, and took his measures from them, as Rehoboam took the advice of the rash and hotheaded young men; and he soon learned to catch the prey, and he devoured men, ver. 6. He seized his subjects' estates, fined and imprisoned them, filled his treasury by rapine and injustice, sequestrations and confiscations, fines and forfeitures, and swallowed up all that stood in his way. He had got the art of discovering what effects men had that lay concealed, and where the treasures were which they had hoarded up; he knew their desolate places, ver. 7, where they hid their money, and sometimes hid themselves; he knew where to find both out; and by his oppression he laid waste their cities, depopulated them, by forcing the inhabitants to remove their families to some place of safety. "The land was desolate," and the country villages were deserted; and though there was great plenty, and a fulness of all good things, yet people quitted it all for fear of the noise of his roaring. He took a pride in making all his subjects afraid of him, as the lion makes all the beasts of the forest to tremble, Am. iii. 8; and by his terrible roaring so astonished them that they fell down for fear; and, having not spirit to make their escape, became an easy prey to him, as they say the lions do. He hectored, and threatened, and talked big, and bullied people out of what they had. Thus he thought to have established his own power, but it had a contrary effect, it did but hasten his own ruin; ver. 8, "The nations set against him on every side," to restrain and reduce his exorbitant power, which they joined in confederacy to do for their common safety; and they spread their net over him, formed designs against him. God brought against Jehoiakim bands of the Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, with the Chaldees, 2 Kin. xxiv. 2, and he was taken in their pit. "Nebuchadnezzar bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon," 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6. They put this lion within grates, bound him in chains, and "brought him to the king of Babylon," ver. 9. What became of him we know not, but "his voice was no more heard" roaring "upon the mountains of Israel." There was an end of his tyranny. He was "buried with the burial of an ass," Jer. xxii. 19, though he had been as a lion, "the terror of the mighty in the land of the living." Note, The righteousness of God is to be acknowledged when those that have terrified and enslaved others are themselves terrified and enslaved; when those that by the abuse of their power to destruction, which was given them for edification, make themselves as wild beasts, as roaring lions, and raging bears, for such, Solomon saith, wicked rulers are over the poor people, Pr. xxviii. 15, are treated as such; when those who, like Ishmael, have their hand against every man, come at last to have every man's hand against them. It was long since observed that bloody tyrants seldom die in peace, but have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy.

Ad generum Cereris sine cæde et sanguine pauci
Descendunt reges et sicca morte tyranni,—
'How few of all the boastful men that reign
Descend in peace to Pluto's dark domain.'—Juvenal.

10 Thy mother is like a vine in thy blood, planted by the waters:
She was fruitful and full of branches by reason of many waters. [bare rule, 11 And she had strong rods for the sceptres of them that

EASTERN SCEPTRES.

And her stature was exalted among the thick branches,
And she appeared in her height with the multitude of her branches.
12 But she was plucked up in fury,
She was cast down to the ground,
And the east wind dried up her fruit:
Her strong rods were broken and withered;
The fire consumed them.
13 And now she is planted in the wilderness,
In a dry and thirsty ground.
14 And fire is gone out of a rod of her branches,
Which hath devoured her fruit,
So that she hath no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule.
This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation.

Jerusalem, the mother city, is here represented by another similitude; she is a vine, and the princes are her branches. This comparison we had before, ch. xv.

First. Jerusalem is as a vine; the Jewish nation is so; "Like a vine in thy blood," ver. 10, the blood royal; like a vine set in blood, and watered with blood, which contributes very much to the flourishing and fruitfulness of vines. As if the blood which thou hast shed had been designed for the fattening and improving of the soil, in such plenty was it shed; and for a time it seemed to have that effect; for "she was fruitful and full of branches, by reason of" the waters, the "many waters," near which she was planted. Places of great wickedness may prosper for awhile; and a vine set in blood may be full of branches. Jerusalem was full of able magistrates, men of sense, men of learning and experience, that were strong rods, branches of this vine, of uncommon bulk and strength; or, poles for the support of this vine, for so magistrates are. The boughs of this vine were grown to such maturity that they were fit to make white staves of, "for the sceptres of them that bear rule," ver. 11. And they are strong rods only that are fit for sceptres; men of strong judgments, and strong resolutions, that are fit for magistrates. When the royal family of Judah was numerous, and the courts of justice filled with men of sense and probity, then Jerusalem's "stature was exalted among the thick branches;" when the government is in good able hands, a nation is thereby made considerable. Then she was not taken for a weak and lowly vine, but "she appeared in her height," a topping city, "with the multitude of her branches;" tanquam lenta solent inter viburna cupressus,—'In thy quietness,' so some read that, ver. 10, which we translate, "in thy blood," thou wast such a vine as this. When Zedekiah was quiet and easy under the king of Babylon's yoke, his kingdom flourished thus. See how slow God is to anger, how he defers his judgments, and waits to be gracious.

Secondly. This vine is now quite destroyed. Nebuchadnezzar, being highly provoked by Zedekiah's treachery, plucked it up in fury, ver. 12, ruined the city and kingdom, and cut off all the branches of the royal family that fell in his way. The vine was cut off close to the ground, though not plucked up by the roots; the east wind dried up the fruit that was blasted; the young people fell by the sword, or were carried into captivity. The aspect of it had nothing that was pleasing, the prospect nothing that was promising; "her strong rods were broken and withered;" her great men were cut off, judges and magistrates deposed. "The vine itself is planted in the wilderness," ver. 13. Babylon was as a wilderness to those of the people that were carried captives thither. The land of Judah was as a wilderness to Jerusalem. Now the whole country was ravaged and laid waste by the Chaldean army, a fruitful land turned into barrenness; it is burnt with fire, Ps. lxxx. 16, and that "fire is gone out of a rod of her branches," ver. 14; that is, the king himself, by rebelling against the king of Babylon, has given occasion to all this mischief. She may thank herself for the fire that consumes her; she has by her wickedness made herself like tinder to the sparks of God's wrath, so that her own branches serve as fuel for her own consumption; in them the fire is kindled which devoured the fruits, the sins of the elder being the judgments which destroy the younger. Her fruit is burned with her own branches, "so that she has no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule;" none to be found now that are fit for the government, or dare take this ruin under their hand, as the complaint is, Isa. iii. 6, 7; none of the house of David left that have right to rule; no wise men, or men of sense, that are able to rule. It goes ill with any state, and is like to go worse, when it is thus deprived of the blessings of government, and has no strong rods for sceptres. "Woe unto thee, O land, when thy king is a child;" for as good have no rod as not a strong rod. Those strong rods, we have reason to fear, had been instruments of oppression, assistant to the king in catching the prey, and devouring men, and now they are destroyed with him. Tyranny is the inlet to anarchy; and when the rod of government is turned into the serpent of oppression it is just with God to say, There shall be no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule; but let men be as the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the lesser. Note, "This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation." The prophet was bidden, ver. 1, to take up a lamentation; and, having done so, he leaves it to be made use of by others. "It is a lamentation" to us of this age; and, the desolations continuing long, it "shall be for a lamentation" to those that shall come after us; the child unborn will rue the destruction made of Judah and Jerusalem by the present judgments. They were a great while in coming, the bow was long in the drawing; but now they are come they will continue, and the sad effects of them will be entailed upon posterity. Note, Those who fill up the measure of their fathers' sins are laying up in store for their children's sorrows, and furnishing them with matter for lamentation; and nothing is more so than the overthrow of government.

CHAPTER XX.

In this chapter, I. The prophet is consulted by some of the elders of Israel, ver. 1. II. He is instructed by his God what answer to give them. He must, 1. Signify God's displeasure against them, ver. 2, 3. And, 2. He must shew them what just cause he had for that displeasure, by giving them a history of God's gracious dealings with their fathers, and their treacherous dealings with God; 1st. In Egypt, ver. 1—9; 2nd. In the wilderness, ver. 10—26; 3rd. In Canaan, ver. 27—32. 3. He must denounce the judgments of God against them, ver. 33—36. 4. He must tell them likewise what mercy God had in store for them, when he would bring a remnant of them to repentance, re-establish them in their own land, and set up his sanctuary among them again, ver. 37—44. 5. Here is another word dropped towards Jerusalem, which is explained and enlarged upon in the next chapter, ver. 45—49.

AND it came to pass in the seventh year, in the fifth month, the tenth day of the month, that certain of the elders of Israel came to enquire of the LORD, and sat before me. 2 Then came the word of the LORD unto me, saying, 3 Son of man, speak unto the elders of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Are ye come to enquire of me? As I live, saith the Lord GOD, I will not be enquired of by you. 4 Wilt thou judge them, son of man, wilt thou judge them? cause them to know the abominations of their fathers:

Here is, First. The occasion of this message which we have in this chapter. That sermon which we had, ch. xviii., was occasioned by their presumptuous reflections upon God; this was occasioned by their hypocritical inquiries after him. Each shall have their own. This prophecy is exactly dated in the seventh year of the captivity, about two years after Ezekiel began to prophesy. God would have them keep count how long their captivity lasted, that they might see how the years went on towards their deliverance, though very slowly. "Certain of the elders of Israel came to inquire of the Lord," not statedly, as those ch. viii. 1, but, as it should seem, occasionally, and upon a particular emergency. Whether they were of those that were now in captivity, or elders lately come from Jerusalem upon business to Babylon, is not certain; but by what the prophet saith of them, ver. 32, it should seem their inquiry was, whether, now they were captives in Babylon, at a distance from their own country, where they had not only no temple, but no synagogue for the worship of God, it was not lawful for them, that they might ingratiate themselves with their lords and masters, to join with them in their worship, and do as the families of these countries do that serve wood and stone. This matter was palliated as well as it would bear, like Naaman's indenting with Elisha for leave to bow in the house of Rimmon, in compliment to the king; but we have reason to suspect that their inquiry drove at this. Note, Those hearts are wretchedly hardened that ask God leave to go on in sin, and that when they are suffering for it. They came and sat very demurely, and with a show of devotion before the prophet, ch. xxxiii. 31.

Secondly. The purport of this message.

1. They must be made to know that God is angry with them. He takes it as an affront that they are come to inquire of him, when they are resolved to go on still in their trespasses. "As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you," ver. 3. Their shows of devotion shall neither be acceptable to God nor advantageous to themselves. God will not take notice of their inquiries, nor give them any satisfactory answers. Note, A hypocritical attendance on God and his ordinances is so far from being pleasing to him, that it is provoking.

2. They must be made to know that God is justly angry with them, ver. 4; "Wilt thou judge them, Son of man, wilt thou judge them?" Thou art a prophet, surely thou wilt not plead for them, as an intercessor with God, but surely thou wilt pass sentence on them, as a judge for God. "See, I have set thee over the nation," wilt thou not declare to them the judgments of the Lord? "Cause them," therefore, "to know the abominations of their fathers;" so the orders run now, as before, ch. xvi. 2, he must cause them to know their abominations. Though their own abominations were sufficient to justify God in the severest of his proceedings against them, yet it would be of use for them to know the abominations of their fathers, that they might see what a righteous thing it was with God now at last to cut them off from being a people, who from the first were such a provoking people.

5 And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In the day when I chose Israel, [Jacob,
And lifted up mine hand unto the seed of the house of
And made myself known unto them in the land of Egypt,
When I lifted up mine hand unto them, saying,
I am the LORD your God;
6 In the day that I lifted up mine hand unto them,
To bring them forth of the land of Egypt
Into a land that I had espied for them,
Flowing with milk and honey,
Which is the glory of all lands:
7 Then said I unto them,
Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes,
And defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt:
I am the LORD your God.
8 But they rebelled against me,
And would not hearken unto me: [their eyes,
They did not every man cast away the abominations of
Neither did they forsake the idols of Egypt:
Then I said, I will pour out my fury upon them,
To accomplish my anger against them
In the midst of the land of Egypt.
9 But I wrought for my name's sake,
That it should not be polluted before the heathen,
Among whom they were,
In whose sight I made myself known unto them,
In bringing them forth out of the land of Egypt.

The history of the ingratitude and rebellion of the people of Israel here begins as early as their beginning; so doth the history of man's apostacy from his Maker. No sooner have we read the story of our first parents' creation, but immediately we meet with that of their rebellion; so we see here it was with Israel, a people designed to represent the body of mankind, both in their dealings with God and his with them. Here is,

First. The gracious purposes of God's law concerning Israel in Egypt, where they were bondslaves to Pharaoh. Be it spoken, be it written, to the immortal honour of free grace, that then and there, 1. He chose Israel to be a peculiar people to himself, though their condition was bad, and their character worse, that he might have the honour of mending both. He therefore chose them because they were the seed of the house of Jacob, the posterity of that prince with God, "that he might keep the oath which he had sworn unto their fathers," Deu. vii. 7, 8. 2. He made himself known to them by his name Jehovah, a new name, Ex. vi. 3, when by reason of their servitude they had almost lost the knowledge of that name by which he was known to their fathers, God Almighty. Note, As the foundation of our blessedness is laid in God's choosing us, so the first step towards it is God's making himself known to us. And, whatever distance we are at, whatever distress we are in, he that made himself known to Israel, even in the land of Egypt, can find us out, and follow us with the gracious discoveries and manifestations of his favour. 3. He made over himself to them, as their God in covenant. "I lift up my hand unto them," saying it, and confirming it with an oath, "I am the Lord your God," to whom you are to pay your homage, and from whom and in whom you are to expect your bliss. 4. He promised to bring them out of Egypt, and made good what he promised. He lifted up his hand, that is, he sware unto them that he would deliver them; and they being very unworthy, and their deliverance very unlikely, it was requisite the promise of it should be confirmed by an oath. Or, he lifted up his hand, that is, he put forth his almighty power to do it; he did it with an outstretched arm, Ps. cxxxvi. 12. 5. He assured them that he would put them in possession of the land of Canaan. He therefore brought them out of Egypt, "that he might bring them into a land he had spied out for them:" a second garden of Eden, which was "the glory of all lands," so he found it, the climate temperate, the soil, the situation pleasant, and every thing agreeable, Deu. viii. 7; xi. 12; however, so he made it, by setting up his sanctuary in it.

Secondly. The reasonable commands he gave them, and the easy conditions of his covenant with them at that time. Having told them what they might expect from him, he next tells them what was all he expected from them; it was no more than this, ver. 7, "Cast ye away every man" his images that he useth for worship, that are the adorations, but should be "the abominations of his eyes." Let him abominate them, and put them out of his sight, "and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt," which it seems many of them were fond of,—the golden calf was one of them. It was just, and what might reasonably be expected, that, being delivered from the Egyptian slavery, they should quit the Egyptian idolatry, especially when God, at bringing them out, executed judgments upon the gods of Egypt, Num. xxxiii. 4, and thereby shewed himself above them. And whatever other idols they might have an inclination to, one would think they should have a rooted aversion to the gods of Egypt, for Egypt's sake, which had been to them a house of bondage. Yet it seems they needed this caution, and it is backed with a good reason, I am the Lord your God, who neither need an assistant nor will admit a rival.

Thirdly. Their unreasonable disobedience to these commands, for which God might justly have cut them off as soon as ever they were formed into a people; ver. 8, "They rebelled against God;" not only refused to comply with his particular precepts, but shook off their allegiance, and in effect told him they would be at liberty to worship what God they pleased; and even then when God came down to deliver them, and sent Moses for that purpose, yet they would not forsake the idols of Egypt, which perhaps made them speak so affectionately of the onions of Egypt, Num. xi. 5, for among other things the Egyptians worshipped an onion. It was strange that all the plagues of Egypt would not prevail to cure them of their affection to the idols of Egypt. For this, God said he would pour out his fury upon them, even while they were yet in the midst of the land of Egypt. Justly might he have said, Let them die with the Egyptians. This magnifies the riches of God's goodness, that he was pleased to work so great a salvation for them, even then when he saw them ripe for ruin; well might Moses tell them, It is "not for your righteousness," Deu. ix. 5.

Fourthly. The wonderful deliverance which God wrought for them notwithstanding. Though they forfeited the favour while it was in the bestowing, and when God would have healed them then their iniquity was discovered, Hos. vii. 1, yet "mercy rejoiced against judgment," and God did what he designed purely for his own name's sake, ver. 9. When nothing in us will furnish him with a reason for his favours, he furnisheth himself with one. God made himself known to them in the sight of the heathen, when he ordered Moses publicly to say to Pharaoh, "Israel is my son, my firstborn, let them go, that they may serve me." Now, if he should have left them to perish for their wickedness as they deserved, the Egyptians would have reflected upon him for it, and his name would have been polluted, which ought to be sanctified, and shall be so. Note, The church is secured, even when it is corrupt, because God will secure his own honour.

10 Wherefore I caused them to go forth out of the land of [Egypt,
And brought them into the wilderness.
11 And I gave them my statutes,
And shewed them my judgments,
Which if a man do, he shall even live in them.
12 Moreover also I gave them my sabbaths,
To be a sign between me and them, [them.
That they might know that I am the LORD that sanctify
13 But the house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilder-
They walked not in my statutes, [ness:
And they despised my judgments,
Which if a man do, he shall even live in them;
And my sabbaths they greatly polluted:
Then I said, I would pour out my fury upon them in the 14 But I wrought for my name's sake,

That it should not be polluted before the heathen,
In whose sight I brought them out.
15 Yet also I lifted up my hand unto them in the wilderness,
That I would not bring them into the land which I had given them,
Flowing with milk and honey,
Which is the glory of all lands;
16 Because they despised my judgments,
And walked not in my statutes, but polluted my sab-

17 Nevertheless mine eye spared them from destroying them,
Neither did I make an end of them in the wilderness.
18 But I said unto their children in the wilderness,
Walk ye not in the statutes of your fathers,
Neither observe their judgments,
Nor defile yourselves with their idols:
19 I am the Lord your God;
Walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments,
And do them;
20 And hallow my sabbaths;
And they shall be a sign between me and you,
That ye may know that I am the LORD your God.
21 Notwithstanding the children rebelled against me:
They walked not in my statutes,
Neither kept my judgments to do them,
Which if a man do, he shall even live in them;
They polluted my sabbaths:
Then I said, I would pour out my fury upon them,
To accomplish my anger against them in the wilderness
22 Nevertheless I withdrew mine hand,
And wrought for my name's sake,
That it should not be polluted in the sight of the heathen,
In whose sight I brought them forth.
23 I lifted up mine hand unto them also in the wilderness,
That I would scatter them among the heathen,
And disperse them through the countries;
24 Because they had not executed my judgments,
But had despised my statutes,
And had polluted my sabbaths,
And their eyes were after their fathers' idols.
25 Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good,
And judgments whereby they should not live;
26 And I polluted them in their own gifts,
In that they caused to pass through the fire all that openeth the womb,
That I might make them desolate,
To the end that they might know that I am the LORD.

The history of the struggles between the sins of Israel, by which they endeavoured to ruin themselves, and the mercies of God, by which he endeavoured to save them and make them happy, is here continued; and the instances of that struggle in these verses have reference to what passed between God and them in the wilderness, in which God honoured himself and they shamed themselves. The story of Israel in the wilderness is referred to in the New Testament, (1 Cor. x., Heb. iii.,) as well as often in the Old, for warning to us Christians, and therefore we are particularly concerned in these verses. Observe,

First. The great things God did for them, which he puts them in mind of, not as grudging them his favours, but to shew how ungrateful they had been. And we say, if you call a man ungrateful, you can call him no worse. It was a great favour, 1. That God "brought them forth out of Egypt," ver. 10, though, as it follows, he "brought them into the wilderness," and not into Canaan presently. It is better to be at liberty in a wilderness than bond-slaves in a land of plenty; to enjoy God and ourselves in solitude, than to lose both in a crowd; yet there were many of them who had such base, servile spirits as not to understand this, but when they met with the difficulties of a desert, wished themselves in Egypt again. 2. That he gave them the law upon mount Sinai, ver. 11; not only instructed them concerning good and evil, but by his authority bound them from the evil and to the good. He "gave them his statute," and a valuable gift it was: "Moses commanded them a law that was the inheritance of the congregation of Israel," Deu. xxxiii. 4. God made them to know his judgments; not only enacted laws for them, but shewed them the reasonableness and equity of those laws, with what judgment they were formed. The laws he gave them they were encouraged to observe and obey, for "if a man do them, he shall even live in them;" that is, in keeping of God's commandments there is abundance of comfort, and a great reward. Christ saith, "If thou wilt enter into life," and enjoy it, "keep the commandments." Though they who are most strict in their obedience are thus far unprofitable servants that they do no more than is their duty to do, yet it is thus richly recompensed, "This do, and thou shalt live." The Chaldee saith, "he shall live an eternal life in them." St. Paul quotes this, Gal. iii. 12, to shew that the law is not of faith, but proposeth life upon condition of perfect obedience, which we are not capable of performing, and therefore must have recourse to the grace of the Gospel, without which we are all undone. 3. That he revived the ancient institution of the sabbath day, which was lost and forgotten while they were bond-slaves in Egypt, for their task-masters there would by no means allow them to rest one day in seven. In the wilderness indeed every day was a day of rest, for what need had they to labour who lived upon manna, and whose raiment waxed not old? But one day in seven must be a holy rest; ver. 12, "I gave them my sabbath to be a sign between me and them." The institution of the sabbath was a sign of God's goodwill to them, and their observance of it a sign of their regard to him: "that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." By this, God made it to appear he had distinguished them from the rest of the world, and designed to model them for a peculiar people to himself; and by their attendance on God in solemn assemblies on sabbath days they were made to increase in the knowledge of God, in an experimental knowledge of the powers and pleasures of his sanctifying grace. Note, 1st. Sabbaths are privileges, and are so to be accounted. The church acknowledgeth it as a great favour, in that chapter which is parallel to this, and seems to have a reference to this, Neh. ix. 14, "Thou madest known to them thy holy sabbaths." 2nd. Sabbaths are signs. It is a sign men have a sense of religion, and there is some good correspondence between them and God, while they make conscience of keeping holy the sabbath day. 3rd. Sabbaths, if duly sanctified, are the means of our sanctification. If we do the duty of the day, we shall find, to our comfort, it is the Lord that sanctifies us, makes us holy, that is, truly happy here, and prepares us to be happy, that is, perfectly holy, hereafter.

Secondly. The disobedient, undutiful carriage towards God, for which he might justly have thrown them out of covenant, as soon as he had taken them into covenant; ver. 13, "They rebelled in the wilderness." There where they received so much mercy from God, and had such a dependence upon him, and were in their way to Canaan, yet there they broke out in many open rebellions against the God that led them and fed them. They did not only not walk in God's statutes, but they despised his judgments as not worth observing; instead of sanctifying the sabbaths, they polluted them, greatly polluted them; one gathered sticks, many went out to gather manna on this day. Hereupon God was ready sometimes to cut them off; he said more than once he would "consume them in the wilderness," but Moses interceded, so did God's own mercy more powerfully, and most of all a concern for his own glory, that "his name might not be polluted and profaned among the heathen," ver. 14; that the Egyptians might not say, either for mischief he brought them thus far, or he was not able to bring them any farther, or he had no such good land as was talked of to bring them to, Ex. xxxii. 12; Num. xiv. 13. Note, God's strongest reasons for his sparing mercy are those which are fetched from his own glory.

Thirdly. God's determination to cut off that generation of them in the wilderness. He that lifted up his hand for them, ver. 6, now lifts up his hand against them; that then by an oath confirmed his promise to bring them out of Egypt, now by an oath confirmed his threatening that he would not bring them into Canaan; ver. 15, 16, "I lifted up my hand unto them, saying, As truly as I live, these men who have tempted me these ten times shall never see the land which I sware unto their fathers," Num. xiv. 22, 23; Ps. xcv. 11. By their contempt of God's laws, and particularly of his sabbaths, they put a bar in their own door; and that which was at the bottom of their disobedience to God, and their neglect of his institutions, was a secret affection to the gods of Egypt; "Their heart went after their idols." Note, The bias of the mind towards the world and the flesh, the money and the belly, those two great objects of spiritual idolatry, is the root of bitterness, from which springs all disobedience to the Divine law. The heart that goes after those idols despiseth God's judgments.

Fourthly. The reservation of a seed that should be admitted upon a new trial, and instructions given to that seed, ver. 17. Though they thus deserved ruin, and were doomed to it, yet "mine eye spared them." When he looked upon them he had a compassion for them, and did not make an end of them, but reprieved them till a new generation was reared. Note, It is owing purely to the mercy of God that he has not long ago made an end of us. This new generation was well educated; Moses in Deuteronomy reported and enforced the laws which had been given to those that came out of Egypt, that their children might have them as it were sounding in their ears afresh, when they entered Canaan; ver. 18, "I said unto their children in the wilderness," in the plains of Moab; walk in the statutes of your God, and "walk not in the statutes of your fathers." Do not imitate their superstitious usages, nor retain their foolish, wicked customs; away with their vain conversation, which has nothing else to say for itself but that it was received by the tradition of your fathers; 1 Pet. i. 18, "Defile not yourselves with their idols," for you see how odious they rendered themselves to God by them, but "keep my judgments, and hallow my sabbaths," ver. 19, 20. Note, If parents be careless and do not give their children good instructions as they ought, the children ought to make up the want by studying the word of God so much the more carefully and diligently themselves, when they grow up. And the bad examples of parents must be made use of by their children for admonition, and not for imitation.

Fifthly. The revolt of the next generation from God, by which they also made themselves obnoxious to the wrath of God; ver. 21, "The children rebelled against me" too. And the same that was said of the fathers' rebellion is here said of the children's, for they were a seed of evil-doers; Moses told them he knew their rebellion and their stiff neck, Deu. xxxi. 27, and Deu. ix. 24, "You have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you;" "They walked not in my statutes," ver. 21; nay, "they despised my statutes," ver. 25. They who disobey God's statutes despise them; they shew that they have a mean opinion of them, and of him whose statutes they are. They polluted God's sabbaths, as their fathers. Note, The profanation of the sabbath day is an inlet to all impiety; those who pollute holy time will keep nothing pure. It was said of the fathers, ver. 16, that "their heart went after their idols;" they worshipped idols because they had an affection for them. It is said of the children, ver. 24, that "their eyes went after their fathers' idols;" they were grown atheistical, and had no affection for any gods at all, but they worshipped their fathers' idols because they were their fathers', and they had them before their eyes; they were used to them. And if they must have gods, they would have such as they could see, such as they could manage; and that which aggravated their disobedience to God's statutes was, that if they had done them they might have lived in them, ver. 21; might have been a happy, thriving people. Note, They that go contrary to their duty go contrary to their interest; they will not obey, will not come to Christ that they may have life, Jno. v. 40; and it is therefore just that they who will not live and flourish as they might in their obedience should die and perish in their disobedience. Now the great instance of that generation's rebellion, and inclination to idolatry, was the iniquity of Peor, as that of their fathers was the golden calf; then the "anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel," Num. xxv. 3. Then there was a plague in the congregation of the Lord, which if it had not been seasonably stayed by Phinehas's zeal, had cut them all off; and yet they owned in Joshua's time, We are not "cleansed from that iniquity unto this day," Jos. xxii. 15; Ps. cvi. 29. Then it was that God said he would pour out his fury upon them, ver. 21; that he lifted up his hand unto them in the wilderness, when they were a second time just ready to enter Canaan, "that he would scatter them among the heathen." This very thing he said to them by Moses in his parting song, Deu. xxxii. 20; because they provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, he said, "I will hide my face from them;" and ver. 26, 27, he said, "I will scatter them into corners, were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy," which explains this here, ver. 21, 22, "I said I would pour out my fury upon them, but I withdrew my hand for my name's sake." Note, When the corruptions of the visible church are such, and so provoking, that we have reason to fear its total extirpation, yet then we may be confident of this to our comfort, that God will secure his own honour by making good his purpose, that while the world stands he will have a church in it.

Sixthly. The judgments of God upon them for their rebellion. They would not regard the statutes and judgments by which God prescribed them their duty, but despised them; and therefore God gave them statutes and judgments that were not good, and by which they should not live, ver. 25. By which seems to be meant the several ways by which God punished them while they were in the wilderness, the plague that broke in upon them, the fiery serpent, and the like; which, in allusion to the law they had broken, are called judgments, because inflicted by the justice of God; and statutes, because he gave orders concerning them, and commanded desolations, as sometimes he had commanded deliverances, and appointed Israel's plagues as he had done the plagues of Egypt. When God said, "I will consume them in a moment," Num. xvi. 25; when he said, "Take the heads of the people, and hang them up," Num. xxv. 4; when he threatened them with the curse, and obliged them to say Amen to every curse, Deu. xxvii., xxviii.; then he gave them judgments by which they should not live: more is implied than is expressed,—they are judgments by which they should die. Those that will not be bound by the precepts of the law shall be bound by the sentence of it; for one way or other the word of God will take hold of men, Zec. i. 6.

Spiritual judgments are the most dreadful, and these God punished them with; the statutes and judgments which the heathen observed in the worship of their idols were not good, and in practising them they could not live. And God gave them up to those: he made their sin to be their punishment; gave them up to a reprobate mind, as he did the Gentile idolaters, Rom. i. 24, 26; gave them up to their own hearts' lusts, Ps. lxxxi. 12; punished them for their superstitious customs which were against the written law, by giving them up to those that were against the very light and law of nature. He left them to themselves, to be guilty of the most impure idolatries, as in the worship of Baal-peor he polluted them; that is, he permitted them to pollute themselves in their own gifts, ver. 26; and of the most barbarous idolatries, as in the worship of Moloch, when they caused their children, especially their firstborn, (which God challenged a particular property in, "The firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto me,") "to pass through the fire," that is, to be sacrificed to their idols; that thus he might make them desolate. Not only that he might justly do it, but that he might do it by their own hands; for this must needs be a great weakening to their families, and a diminution of the honour and strength of their country. Note, God sometimes makes sin to be its own punishment, and yet is not the author of sin; and there needs no more to make men miserable than to give them up to their own vile appetites and passions. Let them be put into the hand of their own counsels, and they will ruin themselves, and make themselves desolate. And thus God makes them know that he is the Lord, and that he is a righteous God, which they themselves will be compelled to own when they see how much their wilful transgressions contribute to their own desolations. Note, Those who will not acknowledge God as the Lord their Ruler, shall be made to acknowledge him as the Lord their Judge, when it is too late.

27 Therefore, son of man, speak unto the house of Israel, and say unto them,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Yet in this your fathers have blasphemed me,
In that they have committed a trespass against me.
28 For when I had brought them into the land,
For the which I lifted up mine hand to give it to them,
Then they saw every high hill, and all the thick trees,
And they offered there their sacrifices, [ing:
And there they presented the provocation of their offer-
There also they made their sweet savour,
And poured out there their drink offerings.
29 Then I said unto them,
What is the high place whereunto ye go?
And the name thereof is called Bamah unto this day.
30 Wherefore say unto the house of Israel,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers?
And commit ye whoredom after their abominations?
31 For when ye offer your gifts,
When ye make your sons to pass through the fire,
Ye pollute yourselves with all your idols, even unto this day:

MOLOCH.

And shall I be enquired of by you, O house of Israel?
As I live, saith the Lord GOD, I will not be enquired of by you.
32 And that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all,
That ye say, We will be as the heathen,
As the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone.

Here the prophet goes on with the story of their rebellions, for their farther humiliation; and shews,

First. That they had persisted in them after they were settled in the land of Canaan. Though God had so many times testified his displeasure against their wicked courses, yet in this, that is, in the very same thing, "your fathers have blasphemed me;" that is, continued to affront me, that they "also have trespassed a trespass against me," ver. 27. Note, It is a great aggravation of sin when men will not take warning by the mischievous consequences of sin in those that have gone before them. This is blaspheming God, it is speaking reproachfully of his judgments, as if they were of no significancy, and were not worth regarding.

1. God had made good his promise. I brought them into the land that I had sworn to give them; though their unbelief and disobedience had made the performance slow, and much retarded it, yet it did not make the promise of none effect. They were often very near being cut off in the wilderness, but a step between them and ruin; and yet they came to Canaan at last. Note, Even God's Israel gets to heaven by hell gates; so many are their transgressions, and so strong their corruptions, that it is a miracle of mercy they are happy at last; as hypocrites go to hell by heaven gates. The righteous scarcely are saved; per tot discrimina rerum tendimus ad cœlum,—'ten thousand dangers fill the road to heaven.'

2. They had broken his precept by their abominable idolatries. God had appointed them to destroy all the monuments of idolatry, that they might not be tempted to desert his sanctuary; but instead of defacing them they fell in love with them, and when they "saw every high hill," whence they had the most delightful prospects, and all the "thick trees," where they had the most delightful shades,—the former to shew forth their pompous idolatries, the latter to conceal their shameful ones,—"there they offered their sacrifices, and made their sweet savour," which should have been presented upon God's altar only. "There they presented the provocation of their offering," ver. 28; that is, their offerings, which, instead of pacifying God or pleasing him, were highly provoking; sacrifices which, though costly, yet being misplaced, were an abomination to the Lord.

3. They obstinately persisted herein, notwithstanding all the admonitions that were given them; ver. 29, "Then I told them" by my servants the prophets, told them where the high place was to which they went, nay, I put them upon considering it, and asking their own consciences concerning it, by putting this question to them, "Which is the high place whereunto you go?" What do you find there that is so inviting, that you will leave God's altars, where he requires your attendance, to frequent such places as he has forbidden to worship in? Do you not know that those high places are of a heathenish extraction, and that the things which the Gentiles sacrificed they sacrificed to devils, and not to God? Did not Moses tell you so? Deu. xxxii. 17, "And will you have fellowship with devils? What is that high place to which you go" when you turn your back on God's altars? O foolish Israelites, who or what has bewitched you, that you will forsake the fountain of life for broken cisterns? that worship which God appoints and will accept, for that which he forbids, which he abhors, and which he will avenge? And yet the name is called Bamah unto this day; that is, they will have their way, let God and his prophets say what they please to the contrary. They are wedded to their high places, even in the best reigns those were not taken away. You could not prevail to take away the name of Bamah, the high place, out of their mouths; but still they would have that in the place of their worship. The sin and the sinner are hardly parted.

Secondly. That this generation after they were unsettled continued under the dominion of the same corrupt inclination to idolatry, ver. 30. He must say to the present house of Israel, some of whose elders were now sitting before him, "Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers?" After all that God hath said against you by a succession of prophets, and done against you by a series of judgments, yet will you take no warning? will you still be as bad as your fathers were, and commit the same abominations that they committed? I see you will, you have a mind to be at the old trade again; you offer your gifts in the high places, and you make your sons to pass through the fire; either you actually do it, or do it in purpose and imagination, and so you continue idolaters to this day. These elders seem now to have been projecting a coalition with the heathen; their hearts they will reserve for the God of Israel, but their knees they will be at liberty to bow to the gods of the nations among whom they live, that they may have the more respect, and the fairer quarter among them. Now the prophet is here ordered to tell those who are forming this scheme, and were for compounding the matter between God and Baal, that they should have no comfort or benefit by either. 1. They should have no benefit by their consulting in private with the prophets of the Lord; for, because they were hearkening after idols, God would have nothing to do with them; ver. 31, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you." What he had said before, (ver. 3,) having largely shewed how just it was, he here repeats as that which he would abide by. Let them not think that they honoured him by their inquiries, nor expect an answer of peace from him, as long as they continued in love and league with their idols. Note, Those reap no benefit by their religion that are not entire and sincere in it; nor can we have any comfortable communion with God in ordinances of worship unless we be inward, and upright with him therein. We make nothing of our profession if it be but a profession. Nay, 2. They should have no benefit by their conforming in public to the practice of their neighbours; ver. 32, "That which comes into your mind" as a piece of refined politics in the present difficult juncture, and which you would be advised to for your own preservation, and that you may not by being singular expose yourselves to abuses; it "shall not be at all," it shall turn to no account to you. You say, "We will be as the heathen;" we will join with them in worshipping their gods, though at the same time we do not believe them to be gods, but wood and stone; and then we should be taken as the families of the countries. They will not know, or in a little while will have forgotten, that we are Jews, and will allow us the same privileges with their own countrymen. Tell them, saith God, that this project shall never prosper. Either their neighbours will not admit them to join with them in their worship, or, if they do, will think never the better, but the worse of them for it; and will look upon them as dissemblers, and not fit to be trusted, who are thus false to their God, and put a cheat upon their neighbours. Note, There is nothing got by sinful compliances; and the carnal projects of hypocrites will stand them in no stead. It is only integrity and uprightness that will preserve men, and recommend them to God and man.

33 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm,
And with fury poured out, will I rule over you:
34 And I will bring you out from the people, [scattered,
And will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are
With a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm,
And with fury poured out.
35 And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people,
And there will I plead with you face to face.
36 Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt,
So will I plead with you, saith the Lord GOD.
37 And I will cause you to pass under the rod,
And I will bring you into the bond of the covenant:
38 And I will purge out from among you the rebels,
And them that transgress against me: [sojourn,
I will bring them forth out of the country where they
And they shall not enter into the land of Israel:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
39 As for you, O house of Israel, thus saith the Lord GOD;
Go ye, serve ye every one his idols,
And hereafter also, if ye will not hearken unto me:
But pollute ye my holy name no more
With your gifts, and with your idols.
40 For in mine holy mountain, [GOD,
In the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord
There shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve me:
There will I accept them,
And there will I require your offerings, [things.
And the firstfruits of your oblations, with all your holy 41 I will accept you with your sweet savour,
When I bring you out from the people,
And gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered;
And I will be sanctified in you before the heathen.
42 And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall bring you into the land of Israel,
Into the country for the which I lifted up mine hand
To give it to your fathers.
43 And there shall ye remember your ways,
And all your doings, wherein ye have been defiled;
And ye shall lothe yourselves in your own sight
For all your evils that ye have committed.
44 And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have wrought with you for my name's sake,
Not according to your wicked ways, nor according to your corrupt doings,
O ye house of Israel, saith the Lord GOD.

The design which was now on foot among the elders of Israel was, that the people of Israel, being scattered among the nations, should lay aside all their peculiarities, and conform to those among whom they lived; but God had told them the design should not take effect, ver. 32. Now in these verses he shews particularly how it should be frustrated. They aimed at the mingling of the families of Israel with the families of the countries. But it will prove in the issue, that the wicked Israelites, notwithstanding their compliances, shall not mingle with them in their prosperity, but shall be distinguished from them for destruction; for idolatrous Israelites, that are apostates from God, shall be sooner and sorer punished than idolatrous Babylonians, that never knew the way of righteousness. Read and tremble at the doom here passed upon them; it is backed with an oath not to be reversed. "As I live, saith the Lord God," thus and thus will I deal with you. They think to make both Jerusalem and Babylon their friends by halting between two. But God threatens that neither of them shall serve for a rest or refuge for them.

First. Babylon shall not protect them, nor any of the countries of the heathen; for God will cast them out of his protection, and then what prince, what people, what place, can serve to be a sanctuary to them? God was Israel's king of old, and had they continued his loyal subjects he would have ruled over them with care and tenderness, for their good; but now "with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over them," ver. 33. That power which should have been exerted for their protection shall be exerted for their destruction. Note, There is no shaking off God's dominion; rule he will, either with the golden sceptre or with the iron rod; and they that will not yield to the power of his grace shall be made to sink under the power of his wrath. Now when God is angry with them, though they may think they shall be lost in the crowd of the heathen, among whom they are scattered, they will be disappointed; for, ver. 34, "I will gather you out of the countries wherein you are scattered," as when the rebels are dispersed in battle, those that have escaped the sword of war are pursued and brought together out of all the places whither they were scattered, to be punished by the sword of justice. They shall be brought into the wilderness of the people, ver. 35, either into Babylon, which is called a wilderness, ch. xix. 13, and the desert of the sea, Isa. xxi. 1, or into some place, which, though full of people, should be to them as the wilderness was to Israel, after they came out of Egypt, a place where God will plead with them face to face, as he pleaded with their fathers in the wilderness of Egypt, ver. 36; where their carcases shall fall, and where he will swear concerning them, that they shall never return to Canaan; as he sware concerning their fathers, that they should never come into Canaan, where he will avenge the breach of his law with as much terror as he gave it in the wilderness of Sinai. Note, God has a good action against apostates, and will not only find time, but find a proper place too, to plead with them in upon that action, a wilderness even in the midst of the people for that purpose.

Secondly. Israel shall be no more able to protect them than Babylon could; nor shall their relation to God's people stand them in any more stead for the other world than their compliance with idolaters shall for this world; nor shall they stand "in the congregation of the righteous," any more than in the congregation of evil-doers; for there will come a distinguishing day, when God will separate between the precious and the vile. He will cause them, as the shepherd causeth his sheep, to pass under the rod, when he tithes them, Lev. xxvii. 32, that he may mark which is for God. God will take particular notice of each of them, one by one, as sheep are counted, and "He will bring them into the bond of the covenant," ver. 37; that is, he will try them and judge of them according to the tenor of the covenant, and the difference made between some and others by the blessings and curses of the covenant. Or, it may refer to those among them that repented and reformed; he will cause them to pass under the rod of affliction, and, having done them good by it, he will bring them again into the bond of the covenant,—will be to them a God in covenant, and use them again as heirs of promise.

1. He will separate the wicked men from among them; ver. 38, "I will purge out from among you the rebels," that have been a grief and scandal to you, and who have by their rebellions brought all these calamities upon you. The judgments of God shall find them out, and their naming the name of Israel shall be no shelter to them. They shall be "brought out of the countries where they sojourn," and shall not have that rest in them which they promised themselves; but they "shall not enter into the land of Israel," nor enjoy the benefit of that rest which God has promised to his people. Note, Though godly people may share with the wicked in the calamities of the world, yet wicked people shall have no share with the godly in the heavenly Canaan; but it shall be part of the blessedness of that world that they shall be purged out from among them, the tares from the wheat, the chaff from the corn, ch. xiii. 9. But wherever these idolaters of the house of Israel were contriving to worship both God and their idols, thinking to please both, God here protests against it, ver. 39, as Elijah had done in his name; "If the Lord be God, then follow him; but if Baal, then follow him." If you will serve your idols, do, and take what comes of it; but then do not pretend relation to God and a religious observance of him, nor pollute his holy name with your gifts at his altar. Spiritual judgments are the sorest judgments. Two of that kind of judgments are threatened in this verse against those that were for dividing between the God of Israel and the gods of the nations. 1st. That they should be given up to the service of their idols. To them he saith ironically, "Since you will not hearken unto me, go ye, serve every one his idols," now you think it will be for your interest, and hereafter also. You shall go on in it; Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone, let him take his course, and see what he will get by it at last. Note, They who think to serve themselves by sin will find in the end that they have but enslaved themselves to sin. 2nd. That they shall be cut off from the service of God, and communion with God; You shall not pollute my holy name with your vain oblations, Isa. i. 11. You bring your gifts in your hands, wherewith you pretend to honour me, but at the same time you bring your idols in your hearts, and therefore you do but pollute me, which I will not suffer any more, Am. v. 21, 22. Note, Those are justly forbidden God's house that profane his house.

2. He will separate them to himself again. 1st. He will "gather them" in mercy "out of the countries whither they were scattered," to be monuments of mercy, as the incorrigible were gathered to be vessels of wrath, ver. 41. Not one of God's jewels shall be lost in the lumber of this world. 2nd. He will "bring them to the land of Israel," which he had promised to give to their fathers. And the discontinuance of their possession shall be no defeasance of their right; it is the land of Israel still, and thither God will bring them safe again, ver. 42. 3rd. He will re-establish his ordinances among them,—will set up his sanctuary in his holy mountain, which is here called "the mountain of the height of Israel;" for the mount Sion was none of the highest mountains, yet the temple there was one of the highest honours of Israel. It is promised that they who preserved their integrity, and would not serve idols in other lands, shall return to their prosperity, and shall serve the true God in their own land; "All of them in the land shall serve me." Note, It is the true happiness of a people, and a sure token for good to them, when there is a prevailing disposition in them to serve God. Whereas God had forbidden the idolaters to bring their gifts to his altar, of these he will require offerings and first-fruits, and will accept them, ver. 42. What he doth not require he will not accept, but what is done with a regard to his precepts he will be well pleased with. He will "accept them with their sweet savour," or 'savour of rest,' ver. 41, as being very grateful to him, and what he takes a complacency in; whereas to hypocritical worshippers he saith, "I will not smell in your solemn assemblies." 4th. He will give them true repentance for their sins, ver. 43. When they find how gracious God is to them they shall be overcome with his kindness, and blush to think of their ill carriage towards so good a God. There, in my holy mountain, when you come to enjoy the privileges of that again, there shall ye remember your doings, wherein ye have been defiled. Note, The more conversant we are with God's holiness, the more we shall see of the odious nature of sin. There "ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight." Note, Ingenuous evangelical repentance makes people loathe themselves for their sins, as Job xlii. 5, 6. 5th. He will give them the knowledge of himself. They shall know by experience that he is the Lord; that he is a God of almighty power and inexhaustible goodness; kind to his people, and faithful to his covenant with them. Note, All the favours we receive from God should lead us into a more intimate acquaintance with him. 6th. He will do all this for his own name's sake, notwithstanding their undeservings, and ill deservings, ver. 44. He has wrought with them, that is, wrought for them, wrought in favour of them, wrought in concurrence with them, they doing their endeavour; he has wrought with them purely for his name's sake. His reasons were all fetched from himself. Had he dealt with them "according to their wicked ways, and their corrupt doings," though they were the better and sounder part of the house of Israel, he had left them to be scattered and lost with the rest; but he recovered and restored them for the sake of his own name, not only that it might not be polluted, ver. 14, but that he might be sanctified in them before the heathen, ver. 41; that he might sanctify himself, so the word is; for it is God's work to glorify his own name. He will do well for his people, that he may have the glory of it; that he may manifest himself to be a God pardoning sin, and so keeping promise; that his people may praise him, and that their neighbours may likewise take notice of him as they did when God "turned again their captivity," Ps. cxxvi. 1. "Then said they among the heathen, The Lord has done great things for them."

45 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
46 Son of man, set thy face toward the south,
And drop thy word toward the south,
And prophesy against the forest of the south field;
47 And say to the forest of the south,
Hear the word of the LORD;
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will kindle a fire in thee,
And it shall devour every green tree in thee,
And every dry tree:
The flaming flame shall not be quenched, [therein.
And all faces from the south to the north shall be burned
48 And all flesh shall see that I the LORD have kindled it:
It shall not be quenched.
49 Then said I, Ah Lord GOD! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?

We have here a prophecy of wrath against Judah and Jerusalem, which should more fitly have begun the next chapter than have concluded this; for it has no dependence on what goes before, but that which follows in the beginning of the next chapter is the reddition or explication of it, when the people complained that this was a parable which they understood not. In this parable,

First. It is a forest that is prophesied against; "the forest of the south field," that is, Judah and Jerusalem. These lay south from Babylon, where Ezekiel now was; and therefore he is directed to set his face towards the south, ver. 46, to intimate to them, that God had set his face against them, was displeased with them, and determined to destroy them. But though it be a message of wrath he has to deliver, he must deliver it with mildness and tenderness; he must drop his word towards the south. His doctrine must distil as the rain, Deu. xxxii. 2, that people's hearts might be softened by it, as the earth by the river of God, which drops upon the pastures of the wilderness, Ps. lxv. 12, and which a south land more especially calls for, Jos. xv. 19. Judah and Jerusalem are called forests, not only because they had been full of people, as a wood of trees, but because they had been empty of fruit, for fruit trees grow not in a forest, and a forest is put in opposition to a fruitful field, Isa. xxxii. 15. They that should have been as the garden of the Lord, and his vineyard, were become like a forest, all overgrown with briers and thorns. And those that are so, that bring not forth the fruits of righteousness, God's word prophesies against.

Secondly. It is a fire kindled in his forest that is prophesied of, ver. 47. All those judgments, which wasted and consumed both the city and the country, sword, famine, pestilence, and captivity, are signified by this fire. 1. It is a fire of God's own kindling; "I will kindle a fire in thee." The breath of the Lord is not as a drop, but as a stream of brimstone to set it on fire, Isa. xl. 33. He that had been himself a protecting fire about Jerusalem is now a consuming fire in it. "All flesh shall see," by the fury of this fire, and the desolations it shall make, especially when they compare it with the sins which had made them fuel for this fire, that it is "the Lord that has kindled it," ver. 48, as a just avenger of his own injured honour. 2. This conflagration shall be general. All orders and degrees of men shall be devoured by it, young and old, rich and poor, high and low, even green trees, which the fire doth not easily fasten upon, shall be devoured by this fire; even good people shall some of them be involved in these calamities. And if this be done in the green tree what shall be done in the dry? The dry trees shall be as tinder and touchwood to this fire. All faces, that is, all that covers the face of the earth, from the south of Canaan to the north, from Beersheba to Dan, shall be burnt therein. 3. The fire shall not be quenched; no attempts to give check to the dissolution shall prevail. When God will ruin a nation, who or what can save it?

Now observe, 1st. The people's reflection upon the prophet, on occasion of this discourse. They said, "Doth he not speak parables?" which was the language either of their ignorance or infidelity,—the plainest truths were as parables to them,—or of their malice and ill-will to the prophet. Note, It is common for those who will not be wrought upon by the word to pick quarrels with it. It is either too plain or too obscure, too fine or too homely, too common or too singular; something or other is amiss in it. 2nd. The prophet's complaint to God; "Ah, Lord God, they say" so and so of me. Note, It is a comfort to us, when people speak ill of us unjustly, that we have a God to complain to.

CHAPTER XXI.

In this chapter we have, I. An explanation of the prophecy in the close of the foregoing chapter concerning the fire in the forest, which the people complained they could not understand, ver. 1—5, with directions to the prophet to shew himself deeply affected with it, ver. 6, 7. II. A farther prediction of the sword that was coming upon the land, by which all should be laid waste; and this expressed very emphatically, ver. 8—17. III. A prospect given of the king of Babylon's approach to Jerusalem, to which he was determined by divination, ver. 18—24. IV. Sentence passed upon Zedekiah, king of Judah, ver. 25—27. V. The destruction of the Ammonites by the sword foretold, ver. 28—32. Thus is this chapter all threatening.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, set thy face toward Jerusalem,
And drop thy word toward the holy places,
And prophesy against the land of Israel,
3 And say to the land of Israel, Thus saith the LORD;
Behold, I am against thee,
And will draw forth my sword out of his sheath,
And will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked.
4 Seeing then that I will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked,

Therefore shall my sword go forth out of his sheath
Against all flesh from the south to the north:
5 That all flesh may know [sheath:
That I the LORD have drawn forth my sword out of his
It shall not return any more.
6 Sigh therefore, thou son of man,
With the breaking of thy loins;
And with bitterness sigh before their eyes.
7 And it shall be, when they say unto thee, Wherefore sighest thou? [eth:
That thou shalt answer, For the tidings; because it com-
And every heart shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble,
And every spirit shall faint, and all knees shall be weak
as water:
Behold, it cometh, and shall be brought to pass, saith
the Lord GOD.

The prophet had faithfully delivered the message he was instructed with in the close of the foregoing chapter, in the terms wherein he received it; not daring to add his own comment upon it. But when he complained that the people found fault with him for speaking parables, the word of the Lord came to him again, and gave him a key to that figurative discourse, that with it he might let the people into the meaning of it, and so silence that objection; for all men shall be rendered inexcusable at God's bar, and every mouth shall be stopped. Note, He that speaks with tongues should pray that he may interpret, 1 Cor. xiv. 13. When we speak to people about their souls we would study plainness, and express ourselves as we may be best understood. Christ expounded his parables to his disciples, Mar. iv. 34.

First. The prophet is here more plainly directed against whom to level the arrow of this prophecy. He must drop his word toward the holy places, ver. 2, toward Canaan the holy land, Jerusalem the holy city, the temple the holy house. These were highly dignified above other places, but when they polluted them that word which used to drop in the holy places shall now drop against them,—"Prophesy against the land of Israel." It was the honour of Israel that it had prophets and prophecy; but these, being despised by them, are turned against them. And justly is Zion battered with her own artillery, which used to be employed against her adversaries, seeing she knew not how to value it.

Secondly. He is instructed, and is to instruct the people, in the meaning of the fire that was threatened to consume the forest of the south. It signified, 'a sword drawn,' the sword of war, which should make the land desolate; ver. 3, "Behold, I am against thee, O land of Israel!" There needs no more to make a people miserable than to have God against them; for as, if he be for us, we need not fear whoever are against us, so if he be against us we cannot hope whoever are for us. And God's professing people, when they revolt from him, set him against them who used to be for them. Was the fire there of God's kindling? The sword here is his sword, which he hath prepared, and which he will give commission to; it is he that will draw it out of its sheath, where it had lain quiet, and threatened no harm. Note, When the sword is unsheathed among the nations God's hand must be eyed and owned in it. Did the fire devour every green tree, and every dry tree? The sword in like manner shall cut off the righteous and the wicked. Good and bad were involved in the common calamities of the nation. The righteous were cut off from the land of Israel, when they were sent captives to Babylon, though perhaps few or none of them were cut off from the land of the living; and it was a threatening omen to the land of Israel that in the beginning of its troubles such excellent men as Daniel and his fellows, and Ezekiel, were cut off from it, and conveyed to Babylon. But though the sword cut off the righteous and the wicked, for it devours one as well as another, 2 Sam. xi. 25; yet far be it from us to think that the righteous are as the wicked, Gen. xviii. 25. No; God's graces and comforts make a great difference when his providence seems to make none. The good figs are sent into Babylon for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5, 6. It is only in outward appearance that "there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked," Eccl. ix. 2. But it speaks the greatness of God's displeasure against the land of Israel. Well might it be said "his eye shall not spare," when it shall not spare, no, not the righteous in it. Since there are not righteous men enough to save the land, to make the justice of God the more illustrious, the few that are shall suffer with it, and God's mercy shall make it up to them some other way. Did the fire "burn up all faces from the south to the north?" The sword shall go "forth against all flesh from the south to the north;" shall go forth as God's sword, with a commission that cannot be contested, with a force that cannot be resisted. Were all flesh made to know that God kindled the fire? They shall be made to know that he hath drawn forth the sword, ver. 5. And lastly, Shall the fire that is kindled never be quenched? So when this sword of the Lord is drawn against Judah and Jerusalem, the scabbard is thrown away, and it shall never be sheathed, it shall not return any more till it has made a full end.

Thirdly. The prophet is ordered, by expressions of his own grief and concern for these calamities that were coming on, to try to make impressions of the like upon the people. When he has delivered his message he must sigh, ver. 6, must fetch many deep sighs, with the breaking of his loins; he must sigh as if his heart would burst, sigh with bitterness, with other expressions of bitter sorrow; and this publicly in the sight of those to whom he delivered the foregoing message, that this might be a sermon to their eyes as that was to their ears, and it was well if both would work upon them. The prophet must sigh, though it was painful to himself and made his breast sore; and though it is probable the profane among the people would ridicule him for it, and call him a whining, canting preacher. But if we be beside ourselves, it is to God, and if this be to be vile, we will be yet more so. Note, Ministers, if they would affect others with the things they speak of, must shew that they are themselves in the greatest sincerity affected with them; and must submit to that which may create uneasiness to themselves, so that it will promote the ends of their ministry. The people observing the prophet to sigh so much, and seeing no visible occasion for it, would ask, "Wherefore sighest thou?" These sighs have some mystical meaning, let us know what it is; and he must answer them, ver. 7, It is "for the tidings," the heavy tidings that we shall hear shortly. The tidings come, the judgments come which we hear tidings of, it cometh apace, and then you will all sigh: nay, that will not serve, "every heart shall melt, and every spirit fail;" your courage will all be gone, and you will have no encouraging considerations to support yourselves with; and when heart and spirit fail, it will follow of course, that "all hands will be feeble" and unable to fight, "and all knees will be weak as water," and unable to flee or to stand their ground. Those who have God for them, when flesh and heart fail, have him to be the strength of their heart; but those who have God against them have no cordial for a fainting spirit, but are as Belshazzar when his thoughts troubled him, Dan. v. 6. But some people are worse frightened than hurt. May not the case be so here, and the event prove better than likely? No, "behold it cometh and shall be brought to pass." It is not a bugbear that they are frightened with, but according to the fear so is the wrath, and more grievous than is feared.

8 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
9 Son of man, prophesy, and say, Thus saith the LORD;
Say, A sword, a sword is sharpened, and also furbished:
10 It is sharpened to make a sore slaughter;
It is furbished that it may glitter:
Should we then make mirth?
It contemneth the rod of my son, as every tree.
11 And he hath given it to be furbished, that it may be handled:
This sword is sharpened, and it is furbished,
To give it into the hand of the slayer.
12 Cry and howl, son of man:
For it shall be upon my people,
It shall be upon all the princes of Israel:
Terrors by reason of the sword shall be upon my people:
Smite therefore upon thy thigh.
13 Because it is a trial,
And what if the sword contemn even the rod?
It shall be no more, saith the Lord GOD.
14 Thou therefore, son of man, prophesy,
And smite thine hands together,
And let the sword be doubled the third time, the sword of the slain:
It is the sword of the great men that are slain,
Which entereth into their privy chambers.
15 I have set the point of the sword against all their gates,
That their heart may faint, and their ruins be multiplied:
Ah! it is made bright,
It is wrapped up for the slaughter.
16 Go thee one way or other,
Either on the right hand, or on the left,
Whithersoever thy face is set.
17 I will also smite mine hands together,
And I will cause my fury to rest:
I the LORD have said it.

Here is another prophecy of the sword, which is delivered in a very affecting manner. The expressions here used are somewhat intricate, and perplex interpreters. The sword was unsheathed in the foregoing verses, here it is fitted up to do execution, which the prophet is commanded to lament. Observe,

First. How the sword is here described, 1. It is sharpened that it may cut and wound, and make a sore slaughter. The wrath of God will put an edge upon it; and, whatever instruments God shall please to make use of in executing his judgments, he will fill them with strength, courage, and fury, according to the service they are employed in. Out of the mouth of Christ goes a sharp sword, Rev. xix. 15. 2. It is furbished that it may glitter, to the terror of those against whom it is drawn. It shall be a kind of flaming sword. If it have rusted in the scabbard for want of use, it shall be rubbed and brightened; for, though the glory of God's justice may seem to have been eclipsed for awhile, during the day of his patience, and the delay of his judgments, yet it will shine out again, and be made to glitter. 3. It is a victorious sword, nothing shall stand before it; ver. 10, "It contemneth the rod of my son, as every tree." "Israel," said God once, "is my son, my firstborn." The government of that people was called a rod, a strong rod, (we read, ch. xix. 11, of the strong rods they had for sceptres,) but when the sword of God's justice is drawn, it contemns this rod, makes nothing of it, though it be a strong rod, and the rod of his son; it is no more than any other tree. When God's professing people are revolted from him, and in rebellion against him, his sword despiseth them. What are they to him more than another people? The marginal reading gives another notion of this sword: 'It is the rod of my son;' and we know of whom God hath said, Ps. ii. 7, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," and ver. 9, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron." This sword is that rod of iron which contemns every tree, and will bear it down. Or, this sword is the rod of my son, a correcting rod, for the chastening of the transgression of God's people, 2 Sam. vii. 14, not to cut them off from being a people. It is a sword to others, a rod to my son.

Secondly. How the sword is here put into the hand of the executioners. It is the rod of my son, and he has given it that it may be handled, ver. 11, that it may be made use of, for the end for which it was drawn. It is given into the hand, not of the fencer, to be played with, but of the slayer, to do execution with. The sword of war my son makes use of is a sword of justice, and to him all judgment is committed. It is made bright, ver. 15; it is wrapped up, that it may be kept safe, and clean, and sharp for the slaughter, not as Goliah's sword was wrapped up in a cloth, only for a memorial, 1 Sam. xxi. 9.

Thirdly. How the sword is directed, and against whom it is sent; ver. 12, "It shall be upon my people;" they shall fall by this sword. It is repeated again, as that which is scarce credible, that the sword of the heathen shall be upon

God's own people. Nay, "It shall be upon all the princes of Israel," their dignity and power as princes shall be no more their security than their profession of religion as princes of Israel. But if the sword be at any time upon God's people, have they not comfort within sufficient to arm them against every thing in it that is frightful? Yes, they have while they carry themselves as becomes his people. But these had not done so, and therefore terrors by reason of the sword shall be upon those that call themselves my people. Note, While good men are quiet, not only from evil but from the fear of it, wicked men are disturbed not only with the sword but with the terrors of it, arising from a consciousness of their own guilt. The sword is directed particularly against the great men, for they had been the greatest sinners among them; they had altogether broken the yoke and burst the bonds, Jer. v. 5; and therefore with them in a special manner God's controversy is, who had been the ringleaders in sin. "The sword of the slain is the sword of the great men that are slain," ver. 14. Though they have furnished themselves with places of retirement, places of concealment, where they flatter themselves with hopes that they shall be safe, they will find that the sword will "enter into their privy chambers," and find them out there, as the frogs, when they were one of Egypt's plagues, found admission into the chambers of their kings. The sword, the point of this sword, is directed against their gates, against all their gates, ver. 5, against all those things with which they thought to keep it out, and fortify themselves against it. Note, The strongest gates, though they be gates of brass, never so well barred, never so well guarded, are no fence against the point of the sword of God's judgments. But, when that is pointed against sinners, 1. They are ready to fear the worst; their hearts faint, so that they are not able to make any resistance. 2. The worst comes; whatever resistance they make it is to no purpose; but they are ruined, and their ruins are multiplied. But what need we observe the particular directions of this sword, when it has a general commission, is sent with a running warrant; ver. 16, "Go thee, one way or other," which way thou wilt, turn "to the right hand or to the left," thou wilt find those that are obnoxious, for there are none free from guilt; and thou hast authority against them, for there are none exempt from punishment; and therefore, "whithersoever thy face is set," that way do thou proceed, and, like Jonathan's sword, "from the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, thou shalt never return empty," 2 Sam. i. 22. Note, So full is the world of wicked people, that which way soever God's judgments go forth, they will find work, will find matter to work upon. That fire will never go out on this earth for want of fuel. And such various methods God has of meeting with sinners, that the sword of his justice is still as it was at first when it flamed in the hand of the cherubims,—it turneth every way, Gen. iii. 24.

Fourthly. What is the nature of this sword, and what the intentions and limitations of it as to the people of God, ver. 13. It is a correction, it is designed to be so; the sword to others is a rod to them. This is a comfortable word which comes in in the midst of these terrible ones, though it be expressed somewhat obscurely. 1. The people of God begin to be afraid that "the sword will contemn even the rod;" that the sword will go on with such fury that it will despise its commission to be a rod only, will forget its bounds, and become a sword indeed even to God's own people. They fear lest the Chaldean's sword, which is the rod of God's anger, contemn its being called a rod, and become as the axe that "boasts itself against him that heweth therewith;" or, "the staff that lifts up itself as if it were no wood," Isa. x. 15. Or, "what if the sword contemn even the rod;" that is, what if this sword make the former rod, as that of Sennacharib, to be contemned as nothing to this? What if this should prove not a correcting rod, but a destroying sword, to make a full end of our church and nation. This is that which the thinking but timorous few are apprehensive of. Note, When threatening judgments are abroad it is good to suppose the worst that may be the consequences of them, that we may provide accordingly. "What if the sword contemn the tribe or sceptre," namely, that of Judah, and the house of David? so some think Shebet here signifies. What if it should aim at the ruin of our government? If it do, the Lord is righteous and will be gracious notwithstanding. But, 1. These fears are silenced with an assurance that it is not so; the sword shall not forget itself, nor the errand on which it is sent. "It is a trial," and it is no more than a trial. He that sends it makes what use of it, and sets what bounds to it, he pleaseth. Here shall its proud waves be stayed. Note, It is matter of comfort to the people of God when his judgments are abroad, and they are ready to tremble for fear of them, that, whatever they are to others, to them they are but trials; and when they are tried they shall come forth as gold, and the proving of their faith shall be the improving of it.

Fifthly. Here the prophet and the people must shew themselves affected with these judgments threatened.

1. The prophet must be very serious in denouncing these judgments. He must say, "A sword, a sword," ver. 9. Let him not study for fine words, and a variety of quaint expressions. When the town is on fire, people do not so give notice of it, but cry with a frightful, doleful voice, Fire, fire. So must the prophet cry, "A sword, a sword;" and ver. 14, "Let the sword be doubled the third time," in thy preaching. God speaketh once, yea twice, yea thrice. It were well if men after all would perceive and regard it. It shall be doubled the third time in God's providence; for it was Nebuchadnezzar's third descent upon Jerusalem that made a full end of it. Ruin comes gradually, but at last comes effectually, upon a provoking people. Yet this is not all; the prophet is not only as a herald at arms to proclaim war, and to cry, "A sword, a sword," once and again, and a third time, but as a person nearly concerned he must cry and howl, ver. 12; must sadly lament the desolations that the sword would make, as one that did himself not only sympathize with the sufferers but feel from the sufferings. Again, ver. 14, "Prophesy and smite thy hands together," wring thy hands, as lamenting the desolation; or, clap thy hands, as by thy prophesy instigating and encouraging those that were to be the instruments of it; or, as one standing amazed at the suddenness and severity of the judgment. The prophet must smite his hands together; for, saith God, "I will also smite mine hands together." God is in earnest in pronouncing this sentence upon them, and therefore the prophet must shew himself in earnest in publishing it. God's smiting his hands together, as well as the prophet's, is in token of a holy indignation at their wickedness, which was really very astonishing. When Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, he smote his hands together, Num. xxiv. 10. Note, God and his ministers are justly angry at those who might be saved, and yet will be ruined. Some make it an expression of triumph and exultation, agreeing with that, Isa. i. 24, "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries;" and that Pr. i. 26, "I also will laugh at their calamity." And so it follows here. "I will cause my fury to rest," not only it shall be perfected, but shall be pleased. And observe with what solemnity, with what authority, this sentence is ratified; "I the Lord have said it," who can and will make good what I have said. "I have said it," and will never unsay it. "I have said it," and who can gainsay it?

2. The people must be very serious in the prospect of these judgments. An intimation of this comes in in a parenthesis; ver. 10, "Should we then make mirth?" seeing God hath drawn the sword, and the prophet sighs and cries, "Should we then make mirth?" The prophet seems to give this as a reason why he sighs, as Neh. ii. 3, "Why should not my countenance be sad," when Jerusalem lies waste? Note, Before we allow ourselves to be merry we ought to consider whether we should be merry or no. Should we make mirth, we that are sentenced to the sword, that lie under the wrath and curse of God? Shall we "make mirth as other people," who have "gone a whoring from our God?" Hos. ix. 1. Should we now make mirth, when the hand of God is gone out against us, when God's judgments are abroad in the land, and he by them calls to weeping and mourning? Isa. xxii. 11, 13. Shall we now make mirth, as the king and Haman, when the church is in perplexity? Est. iii. 15; when we should be grieving for the affliction of Joseph, Amos vi. 6.

18 The word of the LORD came unto me again, saying,
19 Also, thou son of man, appoint thee two ways,
That the sword of the king of Babylon may come:
Both twain shall come forth out of one land:
And choose thou a place,
Choose it at the head of the way to the city.
20 Appoint a way, that the sword may come to Rabbath of the Ammonites,
And to Judah in Jerusalem the defenced.
21 For the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way,
At the head of the two ways, to use divination:
He made his arrows bright,
He consulted with images,
He looked in the liver.
22 At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem,
To appoint captains,
To open the mouth in the slaughter,
To lift up the voice with shouting,
To appoint battering rams against the gates,
To cast a mount, and to build a fort.
23 And it shall be unto them as a false divination in their sight,
To them that have sworn oaths:
But he will call to remembrance the iniquity,
That they may be taken.
24 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because ye have made your iniquity to be remembered,
In that your transgressions are discovered,
So that in all your doings your sins do appear;
Because, I say, that ye are come to remembrance,
Ye shall be taken with the hand.
25 And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come,
When iniquity shall have an end,
26 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Remove the diadem, and take off the crown:
This shall not be the same:
Exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high.
27 I will overturn, overturn, overturn, it:
And it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is;
And I will give it him.

The prophet in the verses before had shewed them the sword coming; he here shews them that sword coming against them, that they might not flatter themselves that by some means or other it should be diverted a contrary way.

First. He must see and shew the Chaldean army coming against Jerusalem, and determined by a supreme power to do so. The prophet must appoint him two ways, that is, he must upon a paper draw out two roads, ver. 19, as sometimes is done in maps; and he must bring the king of Babylon's army to the place where the roads part, for there they will make a stand. They both came out of the same land, but when they come to the place where one road leads to Rabbah, the head city of the Ammonites, and the other to Jerusalem, he makes a pause: for though he is resolved to be the ruin of both, yet he is not determined which to attack first. Here his politics and his politicians leave him at a loss; the sword must go either to Rabbah, or to Judah in Jerusalem. Many of the inhabitants of Judah had now taken shelter in Jerusalem, and all the interests of the country were bound up in the safety of the city, and therefore it is called Judah in Jerusalem the defenced; so strongly fortified was it, both by nature and art, that it was thought impregnable, Lam. iv. 12. The prophet must describe this dilemma that the king of Babylon is in, ver. 20; for "the king of Babylon stood," that is, he shall stand, considering what course to take, "at the head of the two ways." Though he was a prince of great foresight and great resolution, yet it seems he knew neither his own interest nor his own mind. Let not the wise man, then, glory in his wisdom, nor the mighty man in his arbitrary power, for even those that may do what they will yet seldom know what to do for the best. Now observe, 1. The method he took to come to a resolution. He used divination, applied himself to a higher and invisible power, either to the determination of providence by a lot, in order to which he made his arrows bright that were to be drawn for the lots, in honour of the solemnity, (perhaps Jerusalem was written on one arrow and Rabbah on the other, and that which was first drawn out of the quiver he determined to attack first); or to the direction of some pretended oracle, he consulted with images, or teraphim, expecting to receive audible answers from them; or to the observations which the augurs made upon the entrails of the sacrifices, he looked in the liver, whether the position of that portended good or ill luck. Note, It is a mortification to the pride of the wise men of the earth, that in difficult cases they have been glad to make their court to heaven for direction; as it is an instance of their folly that they have taken such ridiculous ways of doing it, when, in cases proper for an appeal to providence, it is sufficient that the lot be cast into the lap, with that prayer, Give a perfect lot, and a firm belief that the disposal thereof is not fortuitous, but of the Lord, Pr. xvi. 33. 2. The resolution he was hereby brought to. Even by these ill practices God served his own purposes, and directed him to go to Jerusalem, ver. 22. The divination for Jerusalem happened to be at his right hand, which, according to the rules of divination, determined him that way. Note, What services God designs men for he will be sure, in his providence, to lead them to, though perhaps they themselves are not aware what conduct they are under. Well, Jerusalem being the mark set up, the campaign is presently opened with the siege of that important place. Captains are appointed for the command of the forces to be employed in the siege, who must open the mouth in the slaughter, must give directions to the soldiers what to do, and make speeches to animate them. Orders are given to provide every thing necessary for carrying on the siege with vigour; battering rams must be prepared and forts built. O what pains, what cost, are men at to destroy one another!

Secondly. He must shew both the people and the prince that they bring this destruction upon themselves by their own sin.

1. The people do so, ver. 23, 24. They slight the notices that are given them of the judgments coming; Ezekiel's prophecy is to them a false divination; they are not moved or awakened to repentance by it. When they hear that Nebuchadnezzar, by his divinations, is directed to Jerusalem, and assured of success in that enterprize, they laugh at it, and continue secure, calling it a false divination, because they have sworn oaths, that is, they have joined in a solemn league with the Egyptians, and they depend upon the promise they have made them to raise the siege, or upon the assurances which the false prophets have given them that it shall be raised. Or, it may refer to the oaths of allegiance they had sworn to the king of Babylon, but had violated; for which treachery of theirs God had given them up to a judicial blindness, so that the fairest warnings given them were slighted by them as false divinations. Note, Those who make a jest of the most sacred oaths, it is not strange if they can make a jest likewise of the most sacred oracles; for where will a profane mind stop? But shall their unbelief invalidate the council of God? Are they safe because they are secure? By no means. Nay, the contempt they put upon Divine warnings is a sin that brings to remembrance their other sins, and they may thank themselves if they be now remembered against them. 1st. Their present wickedness is discovered. Now God is contending with them, so perverse and obstinate are they, that whatever they offer in their own defence doth but add to their offence. They never carried themselves so ill as they did now they have the loudest call given them to repent and reform; "So that in all your doings your sins do appear;" turn you which way you will, and you shew a black side. This is too true of every one of us; for not only there is none that lives and sins not, but "there is not a just man upon earth that doth good and sinneth not." Our best services have such alloys of weakness, and folly, and imperfection, and so much evil is present with us, even when we would do good, that we may say with sorrow and shame, in all our doings, and in all our sayings too, our sins do appear and witness against us, so that if we were under the law we were undone. 2nd. This brings to mind their former wickedness; "You have made your iniquity to be remembered," not by yourselves, that it might be repented of, but by the justice of God, that it might be reckoned for. Your own sins make the sins of your fathers to be remembered against you, which otherwise you should never have smarted for. Note, God remembers former iniquities against those only that by the present discoveries of their wickedness shew that they do not repent of them. 3rd. That they may suffer for all together, they are turned over to the destroyer, that they may be taken, ver. 23; and ye shall be taken with the hand that God had appointed to seize you and to hold you, and out of which you cannot escape. Men are said to be God's hand, when they are made use of as the ministers of his justice, Ps. xvii. 14. Note, Those who will not be taken with the word of God's grace shall at last be taken by the hand of his wrath.

2. The prince likewise brings his ruin upon himself. Zedekiah is the prince of Israel, to whom the prophet here, in God's name, addresseth himself; and if he had not spoken in God's name he would not have spoken so boldly, so bluntly; for is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked?

1st. He gives him his character; ver. 25, "Thou profane and wicked prince of Israel." He was not so bad as some of his predecessors, and yet bad enough to merit this character. He was himself profane, lost to every thing that is virtuous and sacred. And he was wicked, as he promoted sin among his people; he sinned, and made Israel to sin. Note, Profaneness and wickedness is bad in any, but worst of all in a prince, a prince of Israel; that as an Israelite should know better himself, and as a prince give a better example, and have a better influence on those about him.

2nd. He reads him his doom. His iniquity has an end, the measure of it is full, and therefore his day is come, the day of his punishment, the day of Divine vengeance. Note, Though they who are wicked and profane may flourish awhile, yet their day will come to fall. The sentence here passed is, First. That Zedekiah shall be deposed. He has forfeited his crown, and he shall no longer wear it; he has, by his profaneness, profaned his crown, and it shall be cast to the ground; ver. 26, "Remove the diadem." Crowns and diadems are loseable things; it is only in the other world that there is a crown of glory that fadeth not away, "a kingdom that cannot be moved." The Chaldee paraphrase expounds it thus, 'Take away the diadem from Serajah the chief priest, and I will take away the crown from Zedekiah the king, neither this nor that shall abide in his place, but shall be removed. This shall not be the same,' not the same he has been; 'This, not this,' so the word is. Profane and wicked, perhaps, he is as he has been, but not prince of Israel, as he has been. Note, Men lose their dignity by their iniquity. Their profaneness and wickedness removes their diadem and takes off their crown, and makes them the reverse of what they were. Secondly. That great confusion and disorder in the state shall follow hereupon; everything shall be turned upside down. The conqueror shall take a pride in exalting him that is low, and abasing him that is high, preferring some, and degrading others at his pleasure, without any regard either to right or merit. Thirdly. Attempts to re-establish the government shall be blasted and come to nothing. Gedaliah's particularly, and Ishmael's, who was of the seed royal, to which the Chaldee paraphrase refers this; neither of them shall be able to make any thing of it. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn," first one project and then another; for who can build up what God will throw down? Fourthly. This monarchy shall never be restored till it is fixed for perpetuity in the hands of the Messiah. There shall be no more kings of the house of David after Zedekiah, till Christ comes, whose right the kingdom is, who is that seed of David in whom the promise was to have its full accomplishment, "and I will give it him." He shall have the throne of his father David, Lu. i. 32. Immediately before the coming of Christ there was a long eclipse of the royal dignity, as there was also a failing of the spirit of prophecy, that his shining forth in the fulness of time, both as king and prophet, might appear the more illustrious. Note, Christ has an incontestable title to the dominion and sovereignty both in the church and in the world; the kingdom is his right. And, having the right, he shall in due time have the possession,—I will give it him; and there shall be a general overturning of all, rather than he shall come short of his right; and a certain overturning of all the opposition that stands in his way, to make room for him, Dan. ii. 45; 1 Cor. xv. 25. This is mentioned here for the comfort of those who feared the promise made in David would fail for evermore. No, saith God, that promise is sure, for the Messiah's kingdom shall last for ever.

28 And thou, son of man, prophesy and say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD concerning the Ammonites,
And concerning their reproach; even say thou,
The sword, the sword is drawn:
For the slaughter it is furbished,
To consume because of the glittering:

RUINS OF AMMON.

29 Whiles they see vanity unto thee,
Whiles they divine a lie unto thee,
To bring thee upon the necks of them that are slain,
Of the wicked, whose day is come, when their iniquity shall have an end.
30 Shall I cause it to return into his sheath?
I will judge thee in the place where thou wast created,
In the land of thy nativity.
31 And I will pour out mine indignation upon thee,
I will blow against thee in the fire of my wrath,
And deliver thee into the hand of brutish men, and skilful to destroy.
32 Thou shalt be for fuel to the fire;
Thy blood shall be in the midst of the land;
Thou shalt be no more remembered:
For I the LORD have spoken it.

The prediction of the destruction of the Ammonites, which was effected by Nebuchadnezzar about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, seems to come in here upon occasion of the king of Babylon's diverting his design against Rabbah, when he turned it upon Jerusalem. Upon this the Ammonites grew very insolent, and triumphed over Jerusalem; but the prophet must let them know that forbearance is no acquittance, the reprieve is not a pardon. Their day also is at hand, their turn comes next; and it will be but a poor satisfaction to them that they are to be devoured last, to be last executed.

First. The sin of the Ammonites is here intimated; it is their reproach, ver. 28. The reproach they put upon themselves when they hearkened to their false prophets, (for such, it seems, there were among them as well as among the Jews,) that pretended to foretell their perpetual safety in the midst of the desolations that were made of the countries round about them. "They see vanity unto thee, and divine a lie," ver. 29. They flatter thee with promises of peace, and thou art such a fool as to suffer thyself to be imposed upon by them, and to encourage them therein by giving credit to them. Note, Those that feed themselves with a self-conceit in the day of their prosperity prepare matter for a self-reproach in the day of their calamity. 2. The reproach they put upon the Israel of God, when they triumphed in their afflictions, and thereby added affliction to them, which was very barbarous and inhuman. Their divines, by puffing them up with a conceit that they were a better people than Israel, being spared when they were cut off, and with a confidence that their prosperity should always continue, made them so very haughty and insolent that they did even tread on the necks of the Israelites that were slain, slain by the wicked Chaldeans, who had commission to execute God's judgments upon them when their iniquity had an end, that is, when the measure of it was full: we shall meet with this again, ch. xxv. 3, &c. Note, Those are ripening apace for misery who trample upon the people of God in their distress, whereas they ought to tremble when judgment begins at the house of God.

Secondly. The utter destruction of the Ammonites is threatened. For the reproach cast on the church by her neighbours will be returned into their own bosom, Ps. lxxix. 12. Let us see how terrible the threatening is and the destruction will be. 1. It shall come from the wrath of God, who resents the indignities and injuries done to his people as done to himself; ver. 31, "I will pour out my indignation" as a shower of fire and brimstone upon thee. The least drop of Divine indignation and wrath will create tribulation and anguish enough to the soul of man that doth evil; what, then, would a full stream of that indignation and wrath do? "I will blow against thee in the fire of my wrath," that is, I will blow up the fire of my wrath against thee; it shall burn with the utmost vehemence. And ver. 32, "Thou shalt be for fuel to this fire." Note, Wicked men make themselves fuel to the fire of God's wrath; they are consumed by it, and it is inflamed by them. 2. It shall be effected by the sword of war. To them he must cry, as before to Israel, because they had triumphed in Israel's overthrow, "The sword, the sword is drawn," ver. 28, (compare ver. 9, 10); it is drawn to consume, because of the glittering, that is, because it is brandished and glitters, and is fit to be made use of. God's executions will answer his preparations. This sword, when it is drawn, shall not return into its sheath (ver. 30) till it has done the work for which it was drawn. When the sword is drawn it doth not return till God causeth it to return; and he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Who can change his purpose? 3. The persons employed in it are "brutish men and skilful to destroy." Men of such a bad character as this, that have the wit of men to do the work of wild beasts,—human reason, which makes them skilful, but no human compassion, which makes them skilful only to destroy,—though they are the scandal of mankind, yet sometimes are made use of to serve God's purposes. God delivers the Ammonites into the hands of such, and justly, for they themselves were brutish, and delighted in the destruction of God's Israel. We have reason to pray as Paul desired to be prayed for, that we may be delivered from wicked and unreasonable men, 2 Thes. iii. 2; men that seem made for doing mischief. 4. The place where they should thus be reckoned with. I will judge thee there where thou wast created, where thou wast first formed into a people, and where thou hast been settled ever since, and therefore where thou seemest to have taken root; the land of thy nativity shall be the land of thy destruction. Note, God can bring ruin upon us there where we are most secure, and turn us out of the land which we thought we had a title to not to be disputed, and a possession of not to be disturbed. "Thy blood shall be shed," not only in thy borders, but "in the midst of thy land." Lastly. It shall be an irreparable ruin; though thou mayest think to recover thyself, it is in vain to think of it, "thou shalt be no more remembered" with any respect, Ps. ix. 6. Justly is their name blotted out who would have Israel's name for ever lost.

CHAPTER XXII.

Here are three several messages which God intrusts the prophet to deliver concerning Judah and Jerusalem, and all to the same purpose, to shew them their sins, and the judgments that were coming upon them for those sins. I. Here is a catalogue of their sins, by which they had exposed themselves to shame, and for which God would bring them to ruin, ver. 1—16. II. They are here compared to dross, and are condemned as dross to the fire, ver. 17—22. III. All orders and degrees of men among them are here found guilty of the neglect of the duty of their place, and of having contributed to the national guilt, which therefore, since none appeared as intercessors, they must all expect to share in the punishment of, ver. 23—31.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Now, thou son of man, wilt thou judge, wilt thou judge the bloody city?
Yea, thou shalt shew her all her abominations.
3 Then say thou, Thus saith the Lord GOD,
The city sheddeth blood in the midst of it, that her time may come,
And maketh idols against herself to defile herself.
4 Thou art become guilty in thy blood that thou hast shed;
And hast defiled thyself in thine idols which thou hast made;
And thou hast caused thy days to draw near,
And art come even unto thy years:
Therefore have I made thee a reproach unto the heathen,
And a mocking to all countries.
5 Those that be near, and those that be far from thee, shall mock thee,
Which art infamous and much vexed.
6 Behold, the princes of Israel,
Every one were in thee to their power to shed blood.
7 In thee have they set light by father and mother:
In the midst of thee have they dealt by oppression with the stranger:
In thee have they vexed the fatherless and the widow.
8 Thou hast despised mine holy things,
And hast profaned my sabbaths.
9 In thee are men that carry tales to shed blood:
And in thee they eat upon the mountains:
In the midst of thee they commit lewdness.
10 In thee have they discovered their fathers' nakedness:
In thee have they humbled her that was set apart for pollution.
11 And one hath committed abomination with his neighbour's wife;
And another hath lewdly defiled his daughter-in-law;
And another in thee hath humbled his sister, his father's daughter.
12 In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood;
Thou hast taken usury and increase,
And thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion,
And hast forgotten me, saith the Lord GOD.
13 Behold, therefore I have smitten mine hand
At thy dishonest gain which thou hast made,
And at thy blood which hath been in the midst of thee.
14 Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong,
In the days that I shall deal with thee?
I the LORD have spoken it, and will do it.
15 And I will scatter thee among the heathen,
And disperse thee in the countries,
And will consume thy filthiness out of thee.
16 And thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself in the sight of the heathen,
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD.

In these verses the prophet, by a commission from heaven, is set as a judge upon the bench, and Jerusalem is made to hold up her hand as a prisoner at the bar. And if prophets were set over other nations, much more over God's nation, Jer. i. 10. This prophet is authorised to judge the bloody city, the city of bloods. Jerusalem is so called, not only because she has been guilty of the particular sin of bloodshed, but because her crimes in general were bloody crimes, ch. vii. 23, such as polluted her in her blood, and for which she deserved to have blood given her to drink. Now, the business of a judge with a malefactor is, to convict him of his crimes, and then to pass sentence upon him for them. These two things Ezekiel is to do here.

First. He is to find Jerusalem guilty of many heinous crimes here enumerated in a long bill of indictment; and it is billa vera,—'a true bill;' so he writes upon it, whose judgment we are sure is according to truth. He must "shew her all her abominations," ver. 2, that God may be justified in all the desolations brought upon her. Let us take a view of all the particular sins which Jerusalem here stands charged with, and they are all exceeding sinful.

1. Murder. "The city sheds blood," not only in the suburbs, where the strangers dwell, but "in the midst of it," where one would think the magistrates would, if anywhere, be vigilant; even there people were murdered, either in duels, or by secret assassinations and poisonings, or in the courts of justice, under colour of law; and there was no care taken to discover and punish the murderers according to the law, Gen. ix. 6; no, nor so much as the ceremony used to expiate an uncertain murder, Deu. xxi. 1, and so the guilt and pollution remains upon the city. Thus "thou art become guilty in thy blood that thou hast shed," ver. 4. This crime is insisted most upon, for it was Jerusalem's measure-filling sin more than any other: it is said to be that which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4. 1st. The princes of Israel that should have been the protectors of injured innocence, "every one were to their power to shed blood," ver. 6. They thirsted for it, and delighted in it, and whoever came within their power were sure to feel it; whoever lay at their mercy were sure to find none. 2nd. There were those who "carried tales to shed blood," ver. 9. They told lies of men to the princes, to whom they knew it would be pleasing, to incense them against them; or betrayed what passed in private conversation, to make mischief among neighbours, and set them together by the ears, to bite and devour, and worry one another even to death. Note, Those who, by giving invidious characters, and telling ill-natured stories of their neighbours, sow discord among brethren, will be accountable for all the mischief that follows upon it, as he that kindles a fire will be for all the hurt it doth. 3rd. There were those who took "gifts to shed blood," ver. 12, that would be hired with money to swear a man out of his life; or, if they were upon a jury, would be bribed to find an innocent man guilty. When so much barbarous, bloody work of this kind was done in Jerusalem, we may well conclude, First. That men's consciences were become wretchedly profligate and seared, and their hearts hardened; for they would stick at no wickedness that would not stick at this. Secondly. That abundance of quiet, harmless, good people were made away with; whereby, as the guilt of the city was increased, so the number of those that should have stood in the gap to turn away the wrath of God was diminished.

2. Idolatry. "She maketh idols against herself to destroy herself," ver. 3. And again, ver. 4, "Thou hast defiled thyself in thine idols which thou hast made." Note, Those who make idols for themselves will be found to have made them against themselves, for idolaters put a cheat upon themselves, and purpose destruction for themselves. Besides that thereby they pollute themselves, they render themselves odious in the eyes of the just and jealous God, and even their mind and conscience is defiled, so that to them nothing is pure. Those that did not make idols themselves, yet were found guilty of eating upon the mountains or high places, ver. 9, in honour of the idols, and in communion with idolaters.

3. Disobedience to parents; ver. 7, "In thee have the children set light by their father and mother," mocked them, cursed them, and despised to obey them; which was a sign of a more than ordinary corruption of nature as well as manners, and a disposition to all manner of disorder, Isa. iii. 5. They that set light by their parents are in the highway to all wickedness. God had made many wholesome laws for the support of the paternal authority, but no care was taken to put them in execution; nay, the Pharisees in their day taught children, under shew of respect to the Corban, to set light by their parents, and refuse to maintain them, Mat. xv. 5.

4. Oppression and extortion. To enrich themselves they wronged the poor; ver. 7, "They dealt by oppression and deceit with the stranger," taking advantage of his necessities, and his ignorance of the laws and customs of the country. In Jerusalem, that should have been a sanctuary to the oppressed, "they vexed the fatherless and widows" by unreasonable demands and inquisitions, or troublesome lawsuits, in which might prevails against right. "Thou hast taken usury and increase," ver. 12; not only there are those in thee that do it, but thou hast done it. It was an act of the city or community; the public money that should have been employed in public charity is put out to usury and extortion. "Thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by violence and wrong." For neighbours to gain by one another in a fair way of trading is well; but those who are greedy of gain will not be held within the rules of equity.

5. Profanation of the sabbath, and other holy things. This commonly goes along with the other sins for which they here stand indicted; ver. 8, "Thou hast despised mine holy things," holy oracles, holy ordinances. The rites which God appointed were thought too plain, too ordinary; they despised them, and therefore were fond of the customs of the heathen. Note, Immorality and dishonesty is commonly attended with a contempt of religion and the worship of God. "Thou hast profaned my sabbaths." There was not in Jerusalem that face of sabbath sanctification that one would have expected in the holy city. Sabbath breaking is an iniquity that is an inlet to all iniquity. Many have owned it to contribute as much to their ruin as any thing.

6. Uncleanness, and all manner of seventh commandment sins, fruits of those vile affections to which God, in a way of righteous judgment, gives men up, to punish them for their idolatry, and profanation of holy things. Jerusalem had been famous for its purity, but now "in the midst of thee they commit lewdness," ver. 9; it goes barefaced, though in the most scandalous instances, as that of a man's having his father's wife, which is the discovery of the father's nakedness, ver. 10, and is a sin not to be named among Christians, without the utmost detestation, 1 Cor. v. 1, and was made a capital crime by the law of Moses, Lev. xx. 11. The time to refrain from embracing has not been observed; Eccl. iii. 6, "For they have humbled her which was set apart for her pollution." They made nothing of committing lewdness with a neighbour's wife, with a daughter-in-law, or a sister, ver. 11. And shall not God visit for these things?

7. Unmindfulness of God was at the bottom of all this wickedness; ver. 12, "Thou hast forgotten me," else thou wouldest not have done thus. Note, Sinners do that which provokes God, because they forget him; they forget their descent from him, dependence on him, and obligations to him. They forget how valuable his favour is, which they make themselves unfit for; and how formidable his wrath, which they make themselves obnoxious to. They that pervert their ways forget the Lord their God, Jer. iii. 21.

Secondly. He is to pass sentence upon Jerusalem for these crimes.

1. Let her know that she has filled up the measure of her iniquity, and her sins are such as forbid delays, and call for speedy vengeance. She has made her time to come, ver. 3, her days to draw near, and she is come to years of maturity for punishment, ver. 4, as an heir that is come to age, and is ready for his inheritance. God would have been longer with them, but they were arrived at such a pitch of impudence in sin, that God could not in honour give them a farther day. Note, Abused patience will at last be weary of forbearing; and when sinners (as Solomon speaks) grow overmuch wicked, they die before their time, Eccl. vii. 17, and shorten their reprieves.

2. Let her know that she hath exposed herself, and therefore God has justly exposed her, to the contempt and scorn of all her neighbours; ver. 4, "I have made thee a reproach to the heathen;" both those that are near, who are eye-witnesses of Jerusalem's apostacy and degeneracy, and those afar off, who, though at a distance, will think it worth taking notice of, ver. 5; they shall all mock thee. While they were reproached by their neighbours for their adherence to God, it was their honour, and they might be sure that God would roll away their reproach; but, now they are laughed at for their revolt from God, they must lie down in their shame, and must say, "The Lord is righteous." They make a mock at Jerusalem, both because her sins had been very scandalous, (she is infamous, polluted in name, and has quite lost her credit,) and because her punishment is very grievous; she is much vexed, and frets without measure at her troubles. Note, Those that vex most at their troubles have commonly those about them that will be so much the more apt to make a jest of them.

3. Let her know that God is displeased, highly displeased, at her wickedness, and doth and will witness against it; ver. 13, "I have smitten mine hand at thy dishonest gain." God, both by his prophets and by his providence, revealed his wrath from heaven against their ungodliness and unrighteousness; the oppressions they were guilty of, though they got by them, and their murders, "the blood which has been in the midst of thee," and all their other sins. Note, God hath sufficiently discovered how angry he is at the wicked courses of his people; and, that they may not say but they have had fair warning, he smites his hand against the sin before he lays his hand upon the sinner. And this is a good reason why we should despise dishonest gain, even the gain of oppressions, and shake our hands from holding of bribes, because these are sins against which God shakes his hands, Isa. xxxiii. 15.

4. Let her know that, as proud and secure as she is, she is no match for God's judgments, ver. 14. 1st. She is assured that the destruction she has deserved will come; "I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it." He that is true to his promises will be true to his threatenings too; for he is not a man that he should repent. 2nd. It is supposed that she thinks herself able to contend with God, and to stand a siege against his judgments; she bids defiance to the day of the Lord, Isa. v. 19. But, 3rd. She is convinced of her utter inability to make her part good with him. "Can thine heart endure, or can thine hand be strong in the days that I shall deal with thee?" Thou thinkest thou hast to do only with men like thyself, but shalt be made to know thou fallest into the hands of a living God. Observe here. First. There is a day coming when God will deal with sinners, a day of visitation. He deals with some to bring them to repentance, and there is no resisting the force of convictions, when he sets them on; he deals with others to bring them to ruin. He deals with sinners in this life, when he brings upon them his sore judgments. But the days of eternity are especially the days in which God will deal with them, when the full vials of God's wrath will be poured out without mixture. Secondly. The wrath of God against sinners, when he comes to deal with them, will be found both intolerable and irresistible. There is no heart stout enough to endure it; it is none of the infirmities which the spirit of a man will sustain. Damned sinners can neither forget nor despise their torments, nor have they any thing wherewith to support themselves under their torments. There are no hands strong enough either to ward off the strokes of God's wrath, or to break the chains with which sinners are bound over to the day of wrath. Who knows the power of God's anger?

5. Let her know that since she has walked in the way of the heathen, and learned their works, she shall have enough of them, ver. 15. I will not only send thee among the heathen, out of thine own land, but I will scatter thee among them, and disperse thee in the countries, to be abused and insulted over by strangers. And since her filthiness and filthy ones continued in her, notwithstanding all the methods God had taken to refine her, (she would not be made clean, Jer. xiii. 27,) he will by his judgments consume her filthiness out of her; he will destroy those that were incurably bad, and reform those that were inclined to be good.

6. Let her know that God has disowned her, and cast her off. He had been her heritage and portion, but now, ver. 16, "Thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself," shift for thyself, make the best hand thou canst for thyself, for God will no longer undertake for thee. Note, Those that give up themselves to be ruled by their lusts will justly be given up to be portioned by them. They that resolve to be their own masters let them expect no other comfort and happiness but what their own hands can furnish them with; and a miserable portion it will prove. "Verily I say unto you, they have their reward." "Thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things." These are the same with this here, "Thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself," and then, when it is too late, shalt own "in the sight of the heathen that I am the Lord," who alone am a portion sufficient for my people. Note, Those that have lost their interest in God will know how to value it.

17 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
18 Son of man, the house of Israel is to me become dross:
All they are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead, in the midst of the furnace;
They are even the dross of silver.
19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because ye are all become dross, [Jerusalem.
Behold, therefore I will gather you into the midst of 20 As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and
Into the midst of the furnace, [tin,
To blow the fire upon it, to melt it;
So will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury,
And I will leave you there, and melt you. [my wrath,
21 Yea, I will gather you, and blow upon you in the fire of
And ye shall be melted in the midst thereof.
22 As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace,
So shall ye be melted in the midst thereof;
And ye shall know that I the LORD have poured out my fury upon you.

The same melancholy string is harped upon, and various turns given it to make it affecting, that it may be influencing. The prophet must here shew, or at least it is here shewn him, that the whole house of Israel is become as dross, and as dross they shall be consumed. What David has said concerning the wicked ones of the world is here said concerning the wicked ones of the church, now it is corrupt and degenerate; Ps. cxix. 119, "Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross."

First. See here how the wretched degeneracy of the house of Israel is described. That state in David's and Solomon's time had been a head of gold; when the kingdoms were divided it was as the arms of silver. But now, 1. It is degenerated into baser metal, of no value in comparison with what it formerly was. "They are all brass, and tin, and iron, and lead;" which some make to signify divers sorts of sinners among them. Their being brass notes the impudence of some in their wickedness, they are brazen-faced, and cannot blush. Their shoes had been iron and brass, Deu. xxxiii. 25, but now their brow is so, Isa. xlviii. 4. Their being tin notes the hypocritical profession of piety with which many of them cover their iniquity. They have a specious shew, but no intrinsic worth. Their being iron notes the cruel disposition of some, and their delight in war, according to the character of the iron age. Their being lead notes their dulness, sottishness, and stupidity; though soft and pliable to evil, yet heavy and not moveable to good. "How is the gold become dross, how is the most fine gold changed!" So is Jerusalem's degeneracy bewailed, Lam. iv. 1. Yet this is not the worst; these metals, though of less value, yet are of good use: but, 2. "The house of Israel is become dross to me." So she is in God's account, whatever she is in her own and her neighbour's account. They were silver, but now they are "even the dross of silver." The word signifies all the dirt and rubbish and worthless stuff that is separated from the silver in the washing, melting, and refining of it. Note, Sinners, and especially degenerate professors, are in God's account as dross, vile and contemptible, and of no account, as the evil figs which could not be eaten, they were so evil. They are useless and fit for nothing; of no consistency with themselves, and no service to man.

Secondly. How the woful destruction of this degenerate house of Israel is foretold. They are all gathered together in Jerusalem; thither people fled from all parts of the country, as to a city of refuge, not only because it was a strong city, but because it was the holy city. Now God tells them that their flocking into Jerusalem, which they intended for their security, should be as the gathering of various sorts of metal into the furnace, or crucible, to be melted down, and to have the dross separated from them. They are in the midst of Jerusalem, surrounded by the forces of the enemy; and, being thus inclosed, 1. The fire of God's wrath shall be kindled upon this furnace, and it shall be blown to make it burn fiercely and strongly, ver. 20, 21. God will gather them in his anger and fury. The blowing of the fire makes a great noise, so will the judgments of God upon Jerusalem. When God stirs up himself to execute judgments upon a provoking people from the consideration of his own glory, and the necessity of making some examples, then he may be said to blow the fire of his wrath against sin and sinners, to heat the furnace seven times hotter. 2. The several sorts of metal gathered in it shall be melted. By a complication of judgments, as by a raging fire, their constitution shall be dissolved, they shall lose all their former shape and strength, and shall be utterly unable to stand before the wrath of God. The various sorts of sinners shall be melted down together, and united in a common overthrow, as brass and lead in the same furnace, as trees are bound in bundles for the fire. They came together into Jerusalem as a place of defence, but God brought them together there as unto a place of execution. 3. God will leave them in the furnace, ver. 20. I will gather you into the furnace, and will leave you there. When God brings his own people into the furnace, he sits by them as the refiner by his gold, to see that they be not continued there any longer than is fitting and needful; but he will bring these people into the furnace, as men throw dross into it, which they design shall be consumed, and therefore are in no care about it, but leave it there: compare with this, Hos. v. 14, "I will tear and go away." 4. Hereby the dross shall be wholly separated, and the good metal purified, the impenitent shall be destroyed, and the penitent reformed and fitted for deliverance. "Take away the dross from the silver, and there shall come forth a vessel for the finer," Pr. xxv. 4. This judgment shall do that in the house of Israel, for the doing of which other methods had been tried in vain; and "reprobate silver shall they no more be called," Jer. vi. 30.

23 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
24 Son of man, say unto her,
Thou art the land that is not cleansed,
Nor rained upon in the day of indignation. [thereof,
25 There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst

Like a roaring lion ravening the prey;
They have devoured souls;
They have taken the treasure and precious things;
They have made her many widows in the midst thereof.
26 Her priests have violated my law,
And have profaned mine holy things:
They have put no difference between the holy and profane,
Neither have they shewed difference between the unclean and the clean,
And have hid their eyes from my sabbaths,
And I am profaned among them. [the prey,
27 Her princes in the midst thereof are like wolves ravening
To shed blood, and to destroy souls,
To get dishonest gain. [morter,
28 And her prophets have daubed them with untempered
Seeing vanity, and divining lies unto them, saying,
Thus saith the Lord GOD, when the LORD hath not spoken. [cised robbery,
29 The people of the land have used oppression, and exer-
And have vexed the poor and needy:
Yea, they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully.
30 And I sought for a man among them,
That should make up the hedge,
And stand in the gap before me
For the land, that I should not destroy it:
But I found none.
31 Therefore have I poured out mine indignation upon them;
I have consumed them with the fire of my wrath:
Their own way have I recompensed upon their heads,
Saith the Lord GOD.

Here is, First. A general idea given of the land of Israel, how well it deserved the judgments coming to destroy it, and how much it needed these judgments to refine it. Let the prophet tell her plainly, "Thou art the land that is not cleansed," not refined as metal is, and therefore needest to be again put into the furnace. Means and methods of reformation have been ineffectual; Thou art "not rained upon in the day of indignation." This was one of the judgments which God brought upon them in the day of his wrath, he withheld the rain from them, Jer. xiv. 4. Or, when thou art under the tokens of God's displeasure, even in the day of indignation thou art not rained upon; that is, thou hast not received instruction by the prophets, whose doctrine is said to descend as the rain. Or, when thou art corrected, thou art not cleansed, thy filth is not carried away as that in the streets is by a sweeping rain. Nay, though it be a day of indignation with thee, yet thy filthiness, which should be done away, is become more offensive, as that of a city is in dry weather when it is not rained upon. Or, thou hast nothing to refresh and comfort thyself with in the day of indignation; thou art not rained upon by Divine consolations, as the rich man in torment had not a drop of water, or rain, to cool his tongue.

Secondly. A particular charge drawn up against the several orders and degrees of men among them, which shews that they had all helped to fill the measure of the nation's guilt, but none had done anything towards the emptying of it, they are therefore all alike.

1. They have every one corrupted his way, and those who should have been the brightest examples of virtue were ringleaders in iniquity, and patterns of vice.

1st. The prophets that pretended to make known the mind of God to them were not only deceivers, but devourers, ver. 25, and hardened them in their wickedness, both by their preaching, wherein they promised them impunity and prosperity, and by their conversation, wherein they were as profligate as any. "There is a conspiracy of her prophets" against God and religion, against the true prophets and all good men; they conspired together to be all in one song, as Ahab's prophets were, to assure them of peace in their sinful ways. The unity that is among pretenders to infallibility, and which they so much boast of, is only the result of a secret conspiracy against the truth. Satan is not divided against himself. The prophets are in conspiracy with the murderers and oppressors, to patronise and protect them in their wickedness, and justify what they did with their false prophecies, provided they may come in shares with them in the profits of it. They are like a roaring lion ravening the prey; they thunder out threats against them whose ruin is aimed at, terrify them, or make them odious to the people, and so make themselves masters, First. Of their lives. They have devoured souls, have been accessary to the shedding of the blood of many an innocent person, and so have made many to become sorrowful widows that were comfortable wives. They have persecuted those to death who witnessed against their pretensions to prophecy, and would not be imposed upon by their counterfeit commission. Or, they devoured souls by flattering sinners into a false peace and a vain hope, and seducing them into the paths of sin, which would be their eternal ruin. Note, Those who draw men to wickedness, and encourage them in it, are the devourers and murderers of their souls. Secondly. Of their estates. When Naboth is slain they take possession of his vineyard; "They have seized the treasure and precious things," as forfeited. Some way or other they had of devouring the widows' houses, as the Pharisees, Mat. xxiii. 14. Or, they got his treasure, and all these precious things, as fees for false and flattering prophecies; for "he that puts not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him," Mic. iii. 5. It was sad with Jerusalem when such men as these passed for prophets.

2nd. The priests, who were teachers by office, and had the custody of the sacred things, and should have called the false prophets to account, were as bad as they, ver. 26. First. They violated the law of God which they should have observed, and taught others to observe; they made no conscience of the law of the priesthood, but openly broke it, and with contempt, as Hophni and Phinehas. They did what they had a mind, with an express non obstante to the command of God. And how should they teach the people their duty who lived in contradiction to their own? Secondly. They profaned God's holy things, about which they were to minister, and which they ought to have restrained others from the profanation of. They suffered those to eat of the holy things that were unqualified by the law. The table of the Lord was contemptible with them; by dealing in holy things with such unhallowed hands they did themselves profane them. Thirdly. They did not themselves put a difference, nor did they shew the people how to "put a difference, between the holy and profane, the clean and the unclean," according to the directions and distinctions of the law. They did not exclude those from God's courts that were excluded by the law; nor teach the people to observe the difference the law had made between food clean and unclean, between times and places holy and common, but lived at large themselves, and encouraged the people to do so too. Fourthly. They "hid their eyes from God's sabbaths;" that is, they took no care about them; it was all one to them whether God's sabbaths were kept holy or no. They neither gave countenance to those who observed them nor check to those that profaned them, nor did they themselves shew any regard to them, or veneration for them. They winked at those who did servile works on that day, and looked another way when they should have inspected the behaviour of the people on sabbath days. God's sabbaths have such a beauty and glory put upon them by the Divine institution as may command respect; but they hid their eyes from them, and would not see that excellency in them. Fifthly. By all this God himself was profaned among them; his authority was slighted, his goodness made light of, and the highest affront and contempt imaginable put upon his holiness. Note, The profanation of the honour of the Scriptures, of sabbaths, and sacred things, is a profanation of the honour of God himself, who is interested in them.

3rd. The princes, who should have interposed with their authority to redress these grievances, were as daring transgressors of the law as any other; ver. 17, "They are like wolves ravening the prey;" for such is power without justice and goodness to direct it. All their business was to gratify, First. Their own pride and ambition, by making themselves arbitrary and formidable. Secondly. Their own malice and revenge, by shedding blood, and destroying souls, sacrificing to their cruelty all those that stood in their way, or had in anything disobliged them. Thirdly. Their own avarice. All they aim at is to get dishonest gain, by crushing and oppressing their subjects. Lucri bonus est odor ex re qualibet. Rem, rem, quocunque modo rem,—'Sweet is the odour of gain, from whatever substance it ascends. Money, money, by fairness or by fraud get money.' But, though they had not power sufficient to carry them on in their oppressive courses, yet how could they answer it both to their credit and to their consciences? We are told how (ver. 28) the prophets daubed them with untempered mortar; told them in God's name, (horrid wickedness!) that there was no harm in what they did, they might dispose of the lives and estates of their subjects as they pleased, and could do no wrong; nay, that in prosecuting such and such, whom they had marked out, they did God service; and thus they stopped the mouth of their consciences. They also justified what they did to the people, nay, and magnified it, as if it were all for the public good, and so saved their reputation, and kept their oppressed subjects from murmuring. Note, Daubing prophets are the great supporters of ravening princes, but will prove at last their great deceivers; for they daub with untempered mortar, which will not hold, nor will the wall stand long that is built up with it. They pretend to be seers, but they see vanity; they pretend to be diviners, but they divine lies; they pretend a warrant from heaven for what they say, and that it is all as true as Gospel. They say, "Thus saith the Lord God," but it is all a sham, for "the Lord hath not spoken any such thing."

4th. The people that had any power in their hands learned of their princes to abuse it, ver. 29. They that should have complained of the oppression of the subject, and have put in a claim of rights on behalf of the injured, that should have stood up for liberty and property, were themselves invaders of it; "The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery." The rich oppress the poor, masters their servants, landlords their tenants, and even parents their own children; nay, the buyers and sellers will find some way to oppress one another. This is such a sin as, when it is national, is indeed a national judgment, and is threatened as such; Isa. iii. 5, "The people shall be oppressed every one by his neighbour." It is an aggravation of the sin that they have vexed the poor and needy, whom they should have relieved, and have oppressed the stranger, and deprived him of his right, to whom they ought to have been not only just, but kind. Thus was the apostacy universal, and the disease epidemical.

2. There is none that appears as an intercessor for them; ver. 30, "I sought for a man among them that should stand in the gap, but I found none." Note, 1st. Sin makes a gap in the hedge of protection that is about a people, at which good things run out from them, and evil things pour in upon them; a gap by which God enters to destroy them. 2nd. There is a way of standing in the gap, and making up the breach against the judgments of God, by repentance, and prayer, and reformation. Moses stood in the gap when he made intercession for Israel, to turn away the wrath of God, Ps. cvi. 23. 3rd. When God is coming forth against a sinful people to destroy them he expects some to intercede for them, and inquires if there be but one that doth; so much is it his desire and delight to shew mercy. If there be but a man that stands in the gap, as Abraham for Sodom, he will discover him, and be well pleased with him. 4th. It bodes ill to a people when judgments are breaking in upon them, and the spirit of prayer is restrained, so that not one is found that will either give them a good word or speak a good word for them. 5th. When it is so what can be expected but utter ruin? ver. 31, "Therefore have I poured out mine indignation upon them," have given it full scope that it may come upon them in a full stream; yet, whatever God's wrath inflicts upon a people, it is their own way that is therein recompensed upon their heads, and God deals with them no worse,—look how much better,—than their iniquity deserves.

CHAPTER XXIII.

This long chapter, as before, ch. xvi., xx., is a history of the apostacies of God's people from him, and the aggravations of those apostacies, under the similitude of corporal whoredom and adultery. Here the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, the ten tribes and the two, with their capital cities, Samaria and Jerusalem, are considered distinctly. Here is, I. The apostacy of Israel and Samaria from God, ver. 1—8; and their ruin for it, ver. 9, 10. II. The apostacy of Judah and Jerusalem from God, ver. 11—21; and sentence passed upon them, that they shall in like manner be destroyed for it, ver. 22—35. III. The joint wickedness of them both together, ver. 36—44; and the joint ruin of them both, ver. 45—49. And all that is written for warning against the sins of idolatry, and confidence in an arm of flesh, and sinful leagues and confederacies with wicked people, which are the sins here meant by committing whoredom, is, that others may hear and fear, and not sin after the similitude of the transgressions of Israel and Judah.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, there were two women,
The daughters of one mother:
3 And they committed whoredoms in Egypt;
They committed whoredoms in their youth:
There were their breasts pressed,
And there they bruised the teats of their virginity.
4 And the names of them were Aholah the elder, and Aholibah her sister:
And they were mine, and they bare sons and daughters.
Thus were their names; Samaria is Aholah, and Jerusalem Aholibah.
5 And Aholah played the harlot when she was mine;
And she doted on her lovers, on the Assyrians her neighbours,
6 Which were clothed with blue, captains and rulers,
All of them desirable young men, horsemen riding upon horses.
7 Thus she committed her whoredoms with them,
With all them that were the chosen men of Assyria,
And with all on whom she doted:
With all their idols she defiled herself.
8 Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt:
For in her youth they lay with her,
And they bruised the breasts of her virginity,
And poured their whoredom upon her.
9 Wherefore I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers,
Into the hand of the Assyrians, upon whom she doted.

ASSYRIAN.—FROM A ROCK.

10 These discovered her nakedness:
They took her sons and her daughters, and slew her with the sword:
And she became famous among women;
For they had executed judgment upon her.

God had often spoken to Ezekiel, and by him to the people, to this effect, but now his word comes again; for God speaketh the same thing once, yea twice, yea many a time, and all little enough, and too little, for man perceiveth it not. Note, To convince sinners of the evil of sin, and of their misery and danger by reason of it, there is need of line upon line; so loth we are to know the worst by ourselves. The sinners that are here to be exposed are two women, two kingdoms, sister kingdoms, Israel and Judah, daughters of one mother, having been for a long time but one people. Solomon's kingdom was so large, so populous, that immediately after his death it divided into two. Observe,

First. Their character when they were one; ver. 3, "They committed whoredoms in Egypt," for there they were guilty of idolatry, as we read before, ch. xx. 8. The representing of these sins which are most provoking to God, and most ruining to a people, by the sin of whoredom plainly intimates what an exceeding sinful sin uncleanness is, how offensive, how destructive. Doubtless it is itself one of the worst of sins; for other the worst of sins are compared to it here, and often elsewhere, which should increase our detestation and dread of all manner of fleshly lusts, all appearances of them, and approaches to them, as warring against the soul, infatuating sinners, bewitching them, alienating their minds from God and all that is good, debauching conscience, rendering them odious in the eyes of the pure and holy God, and drowning them at last in destruction and perdition.

Secondly. Their names when they became two, ver. 4. The kingdom of Israel is called the elder sister, because that first made the breach, and separated from the family both of kings and priests that God had appointed; the greater sister, so the word is, for ten tribes belonged to that kingdom, and only two to the other. God saith of them both, "They were mine," for they were the seed of Abraham his friend, and of Jacob his chosen; they were in covenant with God, and carried about with them the sign of their circumcision, the seal of the covenant. "They were mine," and therefore their apostacy was the highest injustice; it was alienating God's property, it was the basest ingratitude to the best of benefactors, and a perfidious treacherous violation of the most sacred engagements. Note, Those who have been in profession the people of God, but revolted from him, have a great deal to answer for more than those who never made any such profession. "They were mine;" that is, they were espoused to me, and to me they bare sons and daughters. There were many among them that were devoted to God's honour, and employed in his service, and were the strength and beauty of these kingdoms, as children are of the families they are born in. In this parable Samaria and the kingdom of Israel shall bear the name of Aholah, her own tabernacle; because the places of worship which that kingdom had were of their own devising, their own choosing, and the worship itself their own invention; God never owned it. 'Her tabernacle to herself,' so some render it; let her take it to herself, and make her best of it. Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah bear the name of Aholibah, 'my tabernacle is in her;' because their temple was the place which God himself had chosen to put his name there. He acknowledged it to be his, and honoured them with the tokens of his presence in it. Note, Of those that stand in relation to God, and make profession of his name, some have greater privileges and advantages than others; and, as those who have greater are rendered the more inexcusable if they revolt from God, so those that have lesser yet will not thereby be rendered excusable.

Thirdly. The treacherous departure of the kingdom of Israel from God; ver. 5, "Aholah played the harlot when she was mine." Though the ten tribes had deserted the house of David, yet God owned them for his still. Though Jeroboam, in setting up the golden calves, sinned and made Israel to sin, yet as long as they worshipped the God of Israel only, though by images, he did not quite cast them off. But the way of sin is down-hill. Aholah played the harlot, brought in the worship of Baal, 1 Kin. xvi. 31; set up that other god, that dunghill god, in competition with Jehovah, 1 Kin. xviii. 21; as a vile adulteress dotes on her lovers, because they are well dressed, and make a figure, because they are young and handsome; ver. 6, "clothed with blue, captains and rulers, desirable young men," genteel, and that pass for men of honour. So she doted upon her neighbours, particularly the Assyrians, who had extended their conquests near them. She admired their idols, and worshipped them, admired the pomp of their courts, and their military strength, and courted alliances with them upon any terms, as if their own God were not sufficient to be depended upon. We find one of the kings of Israel giving a thousand talents to the king of Assyria, to engage him in his interests, 2 Kin. xv. 19. She doted on the chosen men of Assyria, as worthy to be trusted and employed in the service of the state; ver. 7, and "on all their idols with which she defiled herself." Note, Whatever creature we dote upon, pay homage to, and put a confidence in, we make an idol of that creature; and whatever we make an idol of we defile ourselves with. And now again, the conviction looks back as far as the original of their nation; "Neither left she her whoredoms which she brought from Egypt," ver. 9. Their being idolaters in Egypt was a thing never to be forgotten, that they should be in love with Egypt's idols, even when they were continually in fear of Egypt's tyrants and taskmasters; but (as some have observed) therefore at that time, when Satan boasted of his having walked through the earth as all his own, to disprove his pretensions God did not say, Hast thou considered my people Israel in Egypt? for they were become idolaters and were not bragged of; but, "Hast thou considered my servant Job in the land of Uz?" And this corrupt disposition in them, when they were first formed into a people, is an emblem of that original corruption which is born with us, and is woven into our constitution, a strong bias towards the world and the flesh, like that of the Israelites towards idolatry. It was bred in the bone with them, and was charged upon them long after, that they left not their whoredoms brought from Egypt; it would never out of the flesh, though Egypt had been a house of bondage to them. Thus the corrupt affections and inclinations which we brought into the world with us we have not lost nor got clear of, but still retain them, though the iniquity we were born in is the source of all the calamities which human life is liable to.

Fourthly. The destruction of the kingdom of Israel for their apostacy from God, ver. 9, 10, "I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers." God first justly gave her up to her lust, "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone;" and then gave her up to "her lovers." The neighbour nations, whose idolatries she had conformed to, and whose friendship she had confided in, and in both had affronted God, are now made use of as the instruments of her destruction. The Assyrians, on whom she doted, soon spied out the nakedness of the land, discovered her blind side on which to attack her, stripped her of all her ornaments, and all her defences, and so uncovered her, and made her naked and bare; carried her sons and daughters into captivity; slew her with the sword, and quite destroyed that kingdom, and put an end to it. We have the story at large, 2 Kin. xvii. 6, &c., where the cause of the ruin of that once flourishing kingdom by the Assyrians is shewed to be their forsaking the God of Israel, "fearing other gods, and walking in the statutes of the heathens." It was for this that God was "very angry with them, and removed them out of his sight," ver. 18; and that the Assyrians, whom they had been so fond of, should be employed in executing judgments upon them, was very remarkable, and shews how God doth often, in a way of righteous judgment, make that a scourge to sinners which they have inordinately set their hearts upon. The devil will for ever be a tormentor to those impenitent sinners who now hearken to him, and comply with him as a tempter.

Thus Samaria became "famous among women," or infamous rather. She 'became a name,' so the word is; not only she came to be the subject of discourse, and much talked of, as the desolations of cities and kingdoms fill the newspapers; but she was thus ruined for her idolatries in terrorem, for warning to all people to take heed of doing likewise; as the public execution of notorious malefactors make them such a name, such an ill name, as may serve to frighten others from those wicked courses which have brought them to a miserable and shameful end; Deu. xxi. 21, "All Israel shall hear and fear."

11 And when her sister Aholibah saw this,
She was more corrupt in her inordinate love than she,
And in her whoredoms more than her sister in her whoredoms.
12 She doted upon the Assyrians her neighbours,

Captains and rulers clothed most gorgeously,
Horsemen riding upon horses,
All of them desirable young men.
13 Then I saw that she was defiled,
That they took both one way,
14 And that she increased her whoredoms:
For when she saw men pourtrayed upon the wall,
The images of the Chaldeans pourtrayed with vermilion,
15 Girded with girdles upon their loins,
Exceeding in dyed attire upon their heads,
All of them princes to look to,
After the manner of the Babylonians of Chaldea, the land of their nativity: [upon them,
16 And as soon as she saw them with her eyes, she doted
And sent messengers unto them into Chaldea.
17 And the Babylonians came to her into the bed of love,
And they defiled her with their whoredom,
And she was polluted with them, and her mind was alienated from them.
18 So she discovered her whoredoms, and discovered her nakedness:
Then my mind was alienated from her,
Like as my mind was alienated from her sister.
19 Yet she multiplied her whoredoms,
In calling to remembrance the days of her youth,
Wherein she had played the harlot in the land of Egypt.
20 For she doted upon their paramours,
Whose flesh is as the flesh of asses,
And whose issue is like the issue of horses.
21 Thus thou calledst to remembrance the lewdness of thy youth,
In bruising thy teats by the Egyptians [for the paps of thy youth.

ASSYRIANS.—FROM THE ASSYRIAN MARBLES.

The prophet Hosea in his time observed, that the two tribes retained their integrity in a great measure, when the ten tribes had apostatized; Hos. xi. 12, "Ephraim indeed compasseth me about with lies, but Judah yet rules with God, and is faithful with the saints;" and this was justly expected from them, Hos. iv. 15, "Though thou Israel play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend." But this lasted not long; by some unhappy matches made between the house of David and the house of Ahab the worship of Baal had been brought into the kingdom of Judah, but had been by the reforming kings worked out again; and at the time of the captivity of the ten tribes, which was in the reign of Hezekiah, things were in a good posture. But it lasted not long; in the reign of Manasseh, soon after the kingdom of Judah had seen the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, they became more corrupt than Israel had been in their inordinate love of idols, ver. 11. Instead of being made better by the warning which that destruction gave them, they were made worse by it, as if they were displeased "because the Lord had made that breach upon Israel," and for that reason became disaffected to him and to his service. Instead of being made to stand in awe of him as a jealous God, they therefore grew strange to him, and liked those gods better that would admit of partners with him. Note, Those may justly expect God's judgments upon themselves who do not take warning by his judgments upon others, who see in others what is the end of sin, and yet continue to make a light matter of it; but it is bad indeed with those who are made worse by that which should make them better; and have their lusts irritated and exasperated by that which was designed to suppress and subdue them. Jerusalem grew worse in her whoredoms than her sister Samaria had been in her whoredoms. This was observed before, ch. xvi. 51, "Neither hath Samaria committed half of thy sins."

First. Jerusalem, that had been a faithful city, became a harlot, Isa. i. 21. She also doted upon the Assyrians, ver. 12; joined in league with them, joined in worship with them, grew to be in love with their captains and rulers, and cried them up as finer and more accomplished gentlemen than any that ever the land of Israel produced. See how richly, how neatly they are dressed, "clothed most gorgeously;" how well they sit a horse, they are "horsemen riding upon horses;" how charmingly they look, "all of them desirable young men." And thus they grew to affect every thing that was foreign, and to despise their own nation; and even the religion of it was mean and homely, and not to be compared with the curiosity and gaiety that was in the heathen temples. Thus she increased her whoredoms. She fell in love, fell in league, with the Chaldeans. Hezekiah himself was faulty this way when he was proud of the court which the kings of Babylon made to him, and complimented his ambassadors with the sight of all his treasures, Isa. xxxix. 2; and the humour increased, ver. 14. She doted upon the pictures of the Babylonian captains, ver. 15, 16; joined in alliance with that kingdom, invited them to come and settle in Jerusalem, that they might refine the genius of the Jewish nation, and make it more polite; nay, they sent for patterns of their images, altars, and temples, and made use of them in their worship. Thus was she polluted with their whoredoms, ver. 17; and thereby she discovered her own whoredom, ver. 18; that is, her own strong inclination to idolatry. And when she had had enough of the Chaldeans, and grew sick of them, and disposed to break her league with them, as Jehoiakim and Zedekiah did, her mind being alienated from them, she courted the Egyptians, doted upon their paramours, ver. 20; would come into an alliance with them; and, to strengthen their alliance, would join with them in their idolatries, and then depend upon them to be their protectors from all other nations: for so wise, so rich, so strong was the Egyptian nation, and came to such perfection in idolatry, that there is no nation now they can take such satisfaction in as in Egypt. Thus they "called to remembrance the days of their youth," ver. 19; the "lewdness of their youth," ver. 21; that is, 1. They pleased themselves with the remembrance of it. When they began to set their affections upon Egypt, they encouraged themselves to put a confidence in that kingdom, because of the old acquaintance they had with it, as if they still retained the gust and relish of the leeks and onions they ate there; or rather of the idolatrous worship they learned there, and brought up with them from thence. When they began an acquaintance with Egypt they remembered how merrily their fathers worshipped the golden calf, what music and dancing they had at that sport, which they learned in Egypt; and hoped they should now have a fair pretence to come to that again. Thus she multiplied her whoredoms, repeated her former whoredoms, and encouraged herself to close with present temptations, by calling to remembrance the days of her youth. Note, Those who, instead of reflecting upon their former sins with sorrow and shame, reflect upon them with pleasure and pride, contract new guilt, thereby strengthen their own corruptions, and in effect bid defiance to repentance. This is returning with the dog to his vomit. 2. They called it God's remembrance, and provoked him to remember it against them. God had said indeed that he would reckon with them for the golden calf, that idol of Egypt, Ex. xxxii. 34; but such was his patience, that he seemed to have forgotten it, till they, by their league now with the Egyptians against the Chaldeans, did as it were put him in mind of it; and in the day when he visits he will now, as he hath said, visit for that. It is very observable how this adulteress changed her lovers. She dotes first on the Assyrians, then she thought the Chaldeans finer, and courted them. After awhile her mind was alienated from them, and she thought the Egyptians more powerful, ver. 20, and she must contract an intimacy with them, which shews the folly, 1st. Of fleshly lusts. When they are indulged they grow humoursome and fickle, are soon surfeited, but never satisfied; they must have variety, and what is loved one day, is loathed the next; unius adulterium matrimonium vocant,—'one adultery is called marriage,' saith Seneca. 2nd. Of idolatry. Those who think one god too little will not think a hundred enough, but will still be for trying more, as finding all insufficient. 3rd. Of seeking to creatures for help. We go from one to another, but are disappointed in them all, and can never rest till we have made the God of Israel our help.

Secondly. The faithful God justly gives a bill of divorce to this now faithless city that is become a harlot. His jealousy soon discovered her lewdness; ver. 13, "I saw that she was defiled," that she was debauched, saw which way her inclination was, that the two sisters both took one way, and that Jerusalem grew worse than Samaria; for "if we stretch out our hand to a strange god, shall not God search this out?" No doubt he shall; and when he has found it can he be pleased with it? No, ver. 18, "Then my mind was alienated from her, as it was from her sister." How could the pure and holy God any longer take delight in such a lewd generation? Note, Sin alienates God's mind from the sinner, and justly, for it is the alienation of the sinner's mind from God; but woe, and a thousand woes, to those from whom God's mind is alienated; for whom he turns from he will turn against.

22 Therefore, O Aholibah, thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will raise up thy lovers against thee,
From whom thy mind is alienated,
And I will bring them against thee on every side;
23 The Babylonians, and all the Chaldeans,
Pekod, and Shoa, and Koa, and all the Assyrians with them;
All of them desirable young men, [

Captains and rulers, great lords and renowned,
All of them riding upon horses.
24 And they shall come against thee with chariots, wagons,
And with an assembly of people, [and wheels,
Which shall set against thee buckler and shield and helmet round about:
And I will set judgment before them,
And they shall judge thee according to their judgments.
25 And I will set my jealousy against thee,
And they shall deal furiously with thee:
They shall take away thy nose and thine ears;
And thy remnant shall fall by the sword:
They shall take thy sons and thy daughters;
And thy residue shall be devoured by the fire.
26 They shall also strip thee out of thy clothes,
And take away thy fair jewels.
27 Thus will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee,
And thy whoredom brought from the land of Egypt:
So that thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto them,
Nor remember Egypt any more.
28 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [thou hatest,
Behold, I will deliver thee into the hand of them whom
Into the hand of them from whom thy mind is alienated:
29 And they shall deal with thee hatefully,
And shall take away all thy labour,
And shall leave thee naked and bare:
And the nakedness of thy whoredoms shall be discovered,
Both thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.
30 I will do these things unto thee,
Because thou hast gone a whoring after the heathen,
And because thou art polluted with their idols.
31 Thou hast walked in the way of thy sister;
Therefore will I give her cup into thine hand.
32 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Thou shalt drink of thy sister's cup deep and large:
Thou shalt be laughed to scorn and had in derision; it containeth much.
33 Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow,
With the cup of astonishment and desolation,
With the cup of thy sister Samaria.
34 Thou shalt even drink it and suck it out,
And thou shalt break the sherds thereof,
And pluck off thine own breasts:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.
35 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [back,
Because thou hast forgotten me, and cast me behind thy
Therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.

Jerusalem stands indicted by the name of Aholibah, for that she was a false traitor to her sovereign Lord the God of heaven, not having his fear before her eyes, but, moved by the instigation of the devil, had revolted from her allegiance to him, and compassed and imagined to shake off his government, had kept up a correspondence, and joined in confederacy with his enemies, and the pretenders to a deity, in contempt of his crown and dignity. To this indictment she has pleaded, Not guilty: "I am not polluted, I have not gone after Baalim." But it is found against her by the notorious evidence of the fact, and she stands convicted of it, nor has any thing material to offer why judgment should not be given, and execution awarded by law. In these verses therefore we have the sentence.

First. Her old confederates must be her executioners; and those whom she had courted to be her leaders in sin are now to be employed as instruments of her punishment; ver. 22, "I will raise up thy lovers against thee," the Chaldeans, whom formerly thou didst so much admire and covet an acquaintance with, but from whom thy mind is since alienated, and with whom thou hast perfidiously broken covenant. They are called "thy lovers," ver. 22; and yet, ver. 20, "them whom thou hatest." Note, It is common for sinful love soon to turn into hatred, as Amnon's to Tamar. Those of headstrong and unreasonable passions are often very hot against those persons and things that a little before they were as hot for. Fools run into extremes; nay, and wise men may see cause to change their sentiments; and therefore, as we should rejoice and weep as if we rejoiced not and wept not, so we should love and hate as if we loved not and hated not; ita ama tanquam osurus,—'love as one who may have cause to feel aversion.'

Secondly. The execution to be done upon her is very terrible; her enemies shall come against her on every side, ver. 22. Those of the several nations that constituted the Chaldean army, ver. 23, all of them great lords and renowned, whose pomp, and grandeur, and splendid appearance, made them look the more amiable, when they came as friends to protect and patronise Jerusalem, but the more formidable when they came to chastise its treachery, and aimed at no less than its ruin. 1. They shall come with a great deal of military forces, ver. 24, with chariots and wagons, furnished with all necessary provisions for a camp, with arms and ammunition, bag and baggage, with a vast army, and well armed. 2. They shall have justice on their side; "I will set judgment before them." They shall have right with them as well as might, for the king of Babylon had just cause to make war upon the king of Judah, because he had broken his league with him; and therefore they shall judge thee, not only according to God's judgments, as the instruments of his justice, to punish thee for the indignities done to him, but according to their judgments, according to the law of nations, to punish thee for thy perfidious dealings with them. 3. They shall prosecute the war with a great deal of fury and resentment. Being a war of revenge, "they shall deal with thee hatefully," ver. 29. This will make the execution the more severe, that their swords will be dipped in poison. Thou hatest them, and they shall deal hatefully with thee; those that hate will be hated, and hatefully dealt with. 4. God himself will lead them on, and his anger shall be mingled with theirs; ver. 25, "I will set my jealousy against thee," that shall kindle this fire, and then "they shall deal furiously with thee." If men never so hatefully, never so furiously deal with us, if we have God on our side we need not fear them, they can do us no real hurt; but if men deal furiously with us, and God sets his jealousy against us too, what will become of us?

The particulars of the sentence here passed upon this notorious adulteress are, 1st. That all she has shall be seized on. The clothes and the fair jewels with which she had endeavoured to recommend herself to her lovers, these shall she be stripped of, ver. 26; all those things that were the ornaments of their state shall be taken away. "They shall take away all thy labour," all that thou hast gotten by thy labour, "and shall leave thee naked and bare," ver. 29. Both city and country shall be impoverished, and all the wealth of both swept away. 2nd. That her children shall go into captivity. "They shall take thy sons and thy daughters" and make slaves of them, ver. 25, for they are children of whoredoms, unworthy the dignities and privileges of the Israelites, Hos. ii. 4. 3rd. That she shall be stigmatised and deformed. "They shall take away thy nose and thy ears," shall mark thee for a whore, and render thee for ever odious, ver. 25. This intimates the many cruelties of the Chaldean soldiers towards the Jews that fall into their hands, whom, it is probable, they used barbarously. Some will have this to be used figuratively; and by the nose they think is meant the kingly dignity, and by the ears that of the priesthood. 4th. That she shall be exposed to shame. "Thy lewdness and thy whoredoms shall be discovered," ver. 29, as, when a malefactor is punished, all his crimes are ripped up, and repeated to his disgrace; what was secret then comes to light, and what was done long since is then called to mind. 5th. That she shall be quite cut off and ruined. "The remnant" of thy people that have escaped the famine and pestilence "shall fall by the sword;" "and the residue" of thy houses, that have not been battered down about thy ears, "shall be devoured by fire," ver. 25. And this shall be the end of Jerusalem.

Thirdly. Because she has trod in the steps of Samaria's sins, she must expect no other but Samaria's fate. It is common in giving judgment to have an eye to precedents, so has God in passing this sentence on Jerusalem; ver. 31, &c., "Thou hast walked in the way of thy sister," notwithstanding the warning thou hast had given thee by the fatal consequences of her wickedness; and therefore "I will give her cup," her portion of miseries, "into thy hand." The cup of the Lord's fury, which will be to thee a cup of trembling. Now, 1. This cup is said to be deep and large, and to contain much, ver. 32; abundance of God's wrath, and abundance of miseries, the fruits of that wrath. It is such a cup as that which we read of, Jer. xxv. 15, 16. The cup of Divine vengeance holds a great deal, and so they will find into whose hand it shall be put. 2. They shall be made to drink the very dregs of this cup, as the wicked are said to do, Ps. lxxv. 8, "Thou shalt drink it, and suck it out," not because it is pleasant, but because it is forced upon thee; ver. 34, "Thou shalt break the sherds thereof, and pluck off thine own breasts," for indignation at the extreme bitterness of this cup, being full of the fury of the Lord, Isa. li. 20; as men in great anguish tear their hair, and throw every thing from them. Finding there is no remedy but it must be drank, "For I have spoken it, saith the Lord God," thou shalt have no manner of patience in the drinking of it. 3. They shall be intoxicated by it, made sick, and be at their wits' end, as men in drink are, staggering and stumbling, and ready to fall; ver. 33, "Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow." Note, Drunkenness hath sorrow attending it to such a degree, that the utmost confusion and astonishment is here represented by it. Who would think that that which is such a force upon nature, such a scandal to it, which deprives men of their reason, disorders them to the last degree, and is therefore expressive of the greatest misery, should yet be with many a beloved sin; that they should damn their own souls to distemper their own bodies? Who has woe and sorrow like them? Pr. xxiii. 29. 4. Being intoxicated they shall become as drunkards deserve to be, a laughing-stock to all about them, "Thou shalt be laughed to scorn, and had in derision," ver. 32, as acting ridiculously in every thing thou goest about. When God is about to ruin a people he makes their judges fools, and pours contempt on their princes, Job xii. 17, 21.

Fourthly. In all this God will be justified, and by all this they will be reformed, and so the issue even of this will be God's glory and their good. 1. They have been bad, very bad, and that justifies God in all that is brought upon them; ver. 30, "I will do these things unto thee, because thou hast gone a whoring after the heathen;" and, ver. 35, "Because thou hast forgotten me, and cast me behind thy back." Note, Forgetfulness of God, and a contempt of him, of his eye upon us, and authority over us, is at the bottom of all our treacherous and adulterous departures from him. Therefore men wander after idols, because they forget God, and their obligations to him; nor could they look with so much desire and delight upon the baits of sin, if they did not first cast God behind their back, as not worthy to be regarded. And those who put such an affront upon God, how can they think but that it should turn upon themselves at last? "Therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms;" that is, thou shalt suffer the punishment of it, and thou alone must bear the blame. Men need no more to sink them than the weight of their own sins; and they who will not part with their lewdness and their whoredoms must bear them. 2. They shall be better, much better, and this fire, though consuming to many, shall be refining to a remnant; ver. 27, "Thus will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee." The judgments which were brought upon them by their sins parted between them and their sins, and taught them at length to say, "What have we to do any more with idols?" Observe, 1st. How inveterate the disease was. "Thy whoredoms were brought from the land of Egypt." Their disposition to idolatry was early and innate, their practice of it was ancient, and had gained a sort of prescription by long usage. 2nd. How complete the cure was notwithstanding. Though it has taken root, yet it shall be made to cease, so that thou shalt not so much as lift up thine eyes to the idols again, nor remember Egypt with pleasure any more. They shall avoid the occasions of this sin, for they shall not so much as look upon an idol, lest their hearts should unawares walk after their eyes. And they shall abandon all inclinations to it; they shall not remember Egypt; that is, they shall not retain any of that affection for idols which they had from the very infancy of their nation. They got it through the corruption of nature in their bondage in Egypt, and lost it through the grace of God in their captivity in Babylon, which this was the blessed fruit of, even the taking away of sin, of that sin; so that, whereas before the captivity no nation (all things considered) was more impetuously bent upon idols and idolatry than they were, after that captivity no nation was more vehemently set against idols and idolatry than they were; insomuch that at this day the image-worship which is practised in the church of Rome confirms the Jews as much as any thing in their prejudices against the Christian religion.

36 The LORD said moreover unto me;
Son of man, wilt thou judge Aholah and Aholibah?
Yea, declare unto them their abominations;
37 That they have committed adultery, and blood is in their hands,
And with their idols have they committed adultery,
And have also caused their sons, whom they bare unto me,
To pass for them through the fire, to devour them.
38 Moreover this they have done unto me:
They have defiled my sanctuary in the same day,
And have profaned my sabbaths.
39 For when they had slain their children to their idols,
Then they came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it;
And, lo, thus have they done in the midst of mine house.
40 And furthermore, that ye have sent for men to come from far,
Unto whom a messenger was sent; and, lo, they came:
For whom thou didst wash thyself,
Paintedst thy eyes, and deckedst thyself with ornaments,
41 And satest upon a stately bed, and a table prepared before it,
Whereupon thou hast set mine incense and mine oil.
42 And a voice of a multitude being at ease was with her:
And with the men of the common sort
Were brought Sabeans from the wilderness,
Which put bracelets upon their hands,
And beautiful crowns upon their heads.
43 Then said I unto her that was old in adulteries,
Will they now commit whoredoms with her, and she with 44 Yet they went in unto her, [them?
As they go in unto a woman that playeth the harlot:
So went they in unto Aholah and unto Aholibah, the lewd women.
45 And the righteous men, they shall judge them after the manner of adulteresses,
And after the manner of women that shed blood;
Because they are adulteresses, and blood is in their 46 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [hands.
I will bring up a company upon them,
And will give them to be removed and spoiled.
47 And the company shall stone them with stones,
And dispatch them with their swords;
They shall slay their sons and their daughters,
And burn up their houses with fire.
48 Thus will I cause lewdness to cease out of the land,
That all women may be taught not to do after your lewdness.
49 And they shall recompense your lewdness upon you,
And ye shall bear the sins of your idols:
And ye shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

After the ten tribes were carried into captivity, and that kingdom was made quite desolate, the remains of it by degrees incorporated with the kingdom of Judah, and gained a settlement (many of them) in Jerusalem, so that the two sisters were in effect become one again; and therefore in these verses the prophet takes those to task jointly who were thus conjoined. "Wilt thou judge Aholah and Aholibah" together? ver. 36. Wilt thou go about to excuse for them? Thou seest the matter is so bad as not to bear an excuse. Or rather, thou shalt now be employed in God's name to judge them, ch. xx. 4. The matter is rather worse than better since the union.

First. Let them be made to see the sins they are guilty of. Declare unto them openly and boldly their abominations.

1. They have been guilty of gross idolatry, here called adultery. "With their idols they have committed adultery," ver. 37; have broken their marriage covenant with God, have lusted after the gratifications of a carnal, sensual mind in the worship of God. This is the first and worst of the abominations he is to charge them with.

2. They have committed the most barbarous murders in sacrificing their children to Moloch, a sin so unnatural that they deserve to hear of it on all occasions. "Blood is in their hands;" innocent blood, the blood of their own children, which they have caused to pass through the fire, ver. 37; not that they might be dedicated to the idols, but that they might be devoured; a sign they loved their idols better than that which was dearest to them in the world.

3. They have profaned the sacred things with which God had dignified and distinguished them. "This they have done unto me," this indignity, this injury, ver. 38. Every contempt put upon that which is holy reflects upon him who is the fountain of holiness, and from a relation to whom whatever is called holy has its denomination. God hath set up his sanctuary among them, but they defiled it by making it a house of merchandise, a den of thieves; nay, and much worse, there they set up their idols and worshipped them, and there they shed the blood of God's prophets. God had revealed to them his holy sabbaths, but they profaned them by doing all manner of servile work therein, or perhaps by sports and recreations on that day, not only practised, but allowed and encouraged by authority. They defiled the sanctuary on the same day that they profaned the sabbath. To defile the sanctuary was bad enough on any day, but to do it on the sabbath day was an aggravation. We used to say, 'The better day the better deed;' but here, the better day the worse deed. God takes notice of the circumstances of sin which add to the guilt. He shews (ver. 39) what was their profanation, both of the sanctuary and of the sabbath. They slew their children, and sacrificed them to their idols, to the great dishonour both of God and of human nature; and then came the same day, their hands imbrued with the blood of their children, and their clothes stained with it, to attend in God's sanctuary, not to ask pardon for what they had done, but to present themselves before him, as other Israelites did, expecting acceptance with him, notwithstanding these villanies they were guilty of, as if God either did not know their wickedness or did not hate it. Thus they profaned the sanctuary, as if that were a protection to the worst of malefactors, for thus they did in the midst of his house. Note, It is a profanation of God's solemn ordinances, when those that are grossly and openly profane and vicious impudently and impenitently so intrude upon the services and privileges of them. "Give not that which is holy unto dogs." "Friend, how camest thou in hither?"

4. They have courted foreign alliances, been proud of them, and reposed a confidence in them. This is also represented by the sin of adultery, for it was a departure from God, not only to whom alone they ought to pay their homage, and not to idols, but in whom alone they ought to put their trust, and not in creatures. Israel was a peculiar people, must dwell alone, and not be reckoned among the nations; and they profane their crown, and lay their honour in the dust, when they covet to be like them, or in league with them. But this they have now done; they have entered into strait alliances with the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Egyptians, the most renowned and potent kingdoms at that time; but they scorned alliances with the petty kingdoms and states that lay near them, which yet might have been of more real service to them. Note, Affecting an acquaintance and correspondence with great people has often been a snare to good people. Let us see how Jerusalem courts her high allies, thinking thereby to make herself considerable.

1st. She privately requested that a public embassy might be sent to her; ver. 40, You sent a messenger "for men to come from far." It seems then the neighbours had no desire to come into a confederacy with Jerusalem, but she thrust herself upon them, and sent underhand to desire them to court her; and, lo, they came. The wisest and best may be drawn unavoidably into company and conversation with profane and wicked people; but it is no sign either of wisdom or goodness to covet an intimacy with such, and to court it.

2nd. Great preparation was made for the reception of these foreign ministers, for their public entry and public audience, which is compared to the pains that an adulteress takes to make herself look handsome. Jezebel-like, thou paintedst thy face, and deckedst thyself with ornaments, ver. 40. The kings and princes made themselves new clothes, fitted up the rooms of state, beautified the furniture, and made it look fresh. Thou "satest upon a stately bed," ver. 41, a stately throne; "a table was prepared whereon thou hast set mine oil and mine incense." That was either, First. A feast for the ambassadors, a noble treat, agreeable to the other preparations. There was incense to perfume the room, and oil to anoint their heads. Or, Secondly. An altar ready furnished for the ambassadors' use in the worship of their idols, to let them know that the Israelites were not so straitlaced but that they could allow foreigners the free exercise of their religion among them, and furnish them with chapels, yea, and compliment them so far as to join with them in their devotions. Though the law of their God was against it, yet they could easily dispense with it themselves to oblige a friend. The oil and incense God calls his, not only because it was the gift of his providence, but because it should have been offered at his altar, which was an aggravation of their sin in serving idols and idolaters with it: see Hos. ii. 8.

3rd. There was great joy at their coming, as if it were such a blessing as never happened to Jerusalem before; ver. 42, "A voice of a multitude being at ease was with her." The people were very easy, for they thought themselves very safe and happy now that they had such powerful allies, and therefore attended the ambassadors with loud huzzas and acclamations of joy. A great confluence of people there was to the court upon this occasion. The men of the common sort were there to grace the solemnity, and to increase the crowd; and "with them were brought Sabeans from the wilderness." The margin reads it, 'Drunkards from the wilderness,' that would drink healths to the prosperity of this grand alliance, and force them upon others, and be most noisy in shouting upon this occasion. Whoever they were, in honour of the ambassadors they put "bracelets on their hands, and beautiful crowns upon their heads," which made the cavalcade appear very splendid.

4th. God, by his prophets, warned them against making these dangerous leagues with foreigners; ver. 43, "Then said I unto her that was old in adulteries," that from the first was fond of leagues with the heathen, of matching with their families, Jud. iii. 6, and afterwards of making alliances with their kingdoms; and though often disappointed herein would never be dissuaded from it. This was the adultery she was old in. I said, "Will they now commit whoredoms with her, and she with them?" Surely experience and observation will by this time have convinced both them and her that an alliance between the nation of the Jews and a heathen nation can never be for the advantage of either. They are iron and clay, that will not mix, nor will God bless it or smile upon it. But it seems her being old in these adulteries, instead of weaning her from them, as one would expect, doth but make her the more impudent and insatiable in them; for, though she was thus admonished of the folly of it, "yet they went in unto her," ver. 44. A bargain was soon clapped up, and a league made first with this and then with the other foreign state. Samaria did so, Jerusalem did so, like lewd women. They could not rest satisfied in the embraces of God's laws and care, and the assurances of protection he gave them; they could not think his covenant with them security enough; but there must be treaties and leagues, politic ones, they thought, and well concerted,—throw themselves into the arms of foreign princes, and put their interests under their protection. Note, Those hearts go a whoring from God that take a complacency in the pomp of the world, and put a confidence in its wealth, and in an arm of flesh, Jer. xvii. 5.

Secondly. Let them be made to foresee the judgments that are coming upon them for these sins; ver. 45, "The righteous men, they shall judge them." Some make the instruments of their destruction to be the righteous men that shall judge them; the Assyrians that destroyed Samaria, the Chaldeans that destroyed Jerusalem. Those were comparatively righteous, had a sense of justice between man and man, and justly resented the treachery of the Jewish nation; however, they executed God's judgments, which we are sure are all righteous. Others understand it of the prophets, whose office it was, in God's name, to judge them, and to pass sentence upon them. Or we may take it as an appeal to all righteous men, to all that have a sense of equity; they shall all judge concerning these cities, and agree in their verdict, that forasmuch as they have been notoriously guilty of adultery and murder, and the guilt is national, that therefore they ought to suffer the pains and penalties which by law are inflicted upon women in their personal capacity that shed blood and are adulteresses. Righteous men will say, Why should bloody, filthy cities escape any better than bloody, filthy persons? "Judge, I pray thee," Isa. v. 3.

This judgment being given by the righteous men, the righteous God will award execution. See here, 1. What the execution will be, ver. 46, 47. The same as before, ver. 23, &c., and ver. 28, &c. God will bring a company of enemies upon them who shall be made to serve his holy purposes even then, when they are serving their own sinful appetites and passions. These enemies shall easily prevail, for God will give them into their hands to be removed and spoiled. This company shall stone them with stones as malefactors, shall single them out, and dispatch them with their swords; and, as was sometimes done in severe executions,—witness that of Achan,—they shall "slay their children, and burn their houses." 2. What will be the effects of it. 1st. Thus they shall suffer for their sins. Their "lewdness shall be recompensed upon them," ver. 49, and they shall "bear the sins of their idols," as before, ver. 35. Thus God will assert the honour of his broken law and injured government, and let the world know what a just and jealous God he is. 2nd. Thus they shall be broken off from their sins. "I will cause lewdness to cease out of the land," ver. 48, as before, ver. 27. The destruction of God's city, like the death of God's saints, shall do that for them which ordinances and providences before could not do, it shall quite take away their sin; so that Jerusalem shall rise out of its ashes a new lump, as gold comes out of the furnace purified from its dross. 3rd. Thus other cities and nations will have fair warning given them to keep themselves from idols; that "all women may be taught not to do after your lewdness." This is the end of the punishment of malefactors, that they may be made examples to others, who will see and fear. "Smite the scorner, and the simple will beware." The judgments of God upon some are designed to teach others; and happy they who receive instruction from them not to tread in the steps of sinners, lest they be taken in their snares. And those who would be taught this must know God is the Lord, ver. 49; that he is the governor of the world, a God that judgeth in the earth, and with whom there is no respect of persons.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Here are two sermons in this chapter preached on a particular occasion, and they are both from mount Sinai, the mount of terror; both from mount Ebal, the mount of curses; both speak the approaching fate of Jerusalem. The occasion of them was the king of Babylon's laying siege to Jerusalem; and the design of them is to shew that, in the issue of that siege, he should be not only master of the place, but destroyer of it. I. By the sign of flesh boiling in a pot over the fire is shewed the miseries that Jerusalem should suffer during the siege, and justly, for her filthiness, ver. 1—14. II. By the sign of Ezekiel's not mourning for the death of his wife is shewed that the calamities coming upon Jerusalem were too great to be lamented; so great that they should sink down under them into a silent despair, ver. 15—27.

AGAIN in the ninth year, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, write thee the name of the day, even of this same day: the king of Babylon set himself against Jerusalem this same day. 3 And utter a parable unto the rebellious house, and say unto them,

Thus saith the Lord GOD; Set on a pot,
Set it on, and also pour water into it:
4 Gather the pieces thereof into it,
Even every good piece, the thigh, and the shoulder;
Fill it with the choice bones.
5 Take the choice of the flock, and burn also the bones [under it,
And make it boil well, and let them seethe the bones of [it therein.
6 Wherefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Woe to the bloody city,
To the pot whose scum is therein, and whose scum is not gone out of it!
Bring it out piece by piece; let no lot fall upon it.
7 For her blood is in the midst of her;
She set it upon the top of a rock;
She poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with dust;
8 That it might cause fury to come up to take vengeance;
I have set her blood upon the top of a rock,
That it should not be covered.
9 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [great.
Woe to the bloody city! I will even make the pile for fire
10 Heap on wood, kindle the fire,
Consume the flesh, and spice it well, and let the bones [be burned.
11 Then set it empty upon the coals thereof,
That the brass of it may be hot, and may burn,
And that the filthiness of it may be molten in it,
That the scum of it may be consumed.

SACRIFICIAL SEETHING POTS.

12 She hath wearied herself with lies,
And her great scum went not forth out of her:
Her scum shall be in the fire.
13 In thy filthiness is lewdness:
Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged,
Thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more,
Till I have caused my fury to rest upon thee.
14 I the LORD have spoken it:
It shall come to pass, and I will do it; [pent;
I will not go back, neither will I spare, neither will I re-
According to thy ways, and according to thy doings, shall they judge thee,
Saith the Lord GOD.

SEETHING THE SHOULDER.—ver. 4.

We have here,

First. The notice God gives to Ezekiel in Babylon of Nebuchadnezzar's laying siege to Jerusalem, just at the time when he was doing it; ver. 2, Son of man take notice, "the king of Babylon," that is now abroad with his army, thou knowest where, "sets himself against Jerusalem this same day." It was many miles, it was many days' journey, from Jerusalem to Babylon; perhaps the last intelligence they had from the army was, that the design was upon Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and that the campaign was to be opened with the siege of that city. But God knew, and could tell the prophet, This day, at this time, Jerusalem is invested, and the Chaldean army is set down before it. Note, As all times, so all places, even the most remote, are present with God, and under his view. He tells it the prophet, that the prophet might tell it the people, that so when it proved to be punctually true, as they would find by the public intelligence in a little time, it might be a confirmation of the prophet's mission, and they might infer that, since he was right in his news, he was so in his predictions, for he owed both to the same correspondence he had with heaven.

Secondly. The notice which he orders him to take of it. He must enter it in his book, Memorandum, that in the ninth year of Jehoiakim's captivity, (for thence Ezekiel dated ch. i. 2, which was also the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, for he began to reign when Jehoiakim was carried off,) in the tenth month, on the tenth day of the month, the king of Babylon laid siege to Jerusalem; and the date here agrees exactly with the date in the history, 2 Kin. xxv. 1. See how God revealed things to his servants the prophets, especially those things which serve to confirm their word, and so to confirm their own faith. Note, It is good to keep an exact account of the date of remarkable occurrences, which may sometimes contribute to the manifesting of God's glory so much the more in them, and the explaining and confirming of Scripture prophecies. "Known unto God are all his works."

Thirdly. The notice which he orders him to give to the people thereupon, the purport of which is, that this siege of Jerusalem now begun will infallibly end in the ruin of it. This he must say to the rebellious house, to those of them that were in Babylon, to be by them communicated to those who were yet in their own land. A rebellious house will soon be a ruinous house.

1. He must shew them this by a sign, for that stupid people needed to be taught as children are. The comparison made use of is that of a boiling pot. This agrees with Jeremiah's vision many years before, when he first began to be a prophet, and probably was designed to put them in mind of that, Jer. i. 13, "I see a seething pot, with the face towards the north;" and the explanation of it, ver. 15, makes it to signify the besieging of Jerusalem by the northern nations. And, as this comparison is intended to confirm Jeremiah's vision, so also to confront the vain confidence of the princes of Jerusalem, who had said, ch. xi. 3, "This city is the caldron, and we are the flesh," meaning, We are as safe here as if we were surrounded with walls of brass. Well, saith God, it shall be so, you shall be boiled in Jerusalem as the flesh in the caldron, boiled to pieces; let the pot be set on with water in it, ver. 4; let it be filled with the flesh of the choice of the flock, ver. 5, with the choice pieces, ver. 6, and the marrow bones; and let the other bones serve for fuel, that one way or other, either in the pot or under it, the whole beast may be made use of. A fire of bones, though it be a slow fire, for the siege was to be long, yet it is a sure and lasting fire; such was God's wrath against them, and not like the crackling of thorns under a pot, which has noise and blaze, but no intense heat. They that from all parts of the country fled into Jerusalem for safety would be sadly disappointed, when the siege laid to it would soon make the place too hot for them; and yet there was no getting out of it, but they must be forced to abide by it, as the flesh in a boiling pot.

2. He must give them a comment upon this sign. It is to be construed as a "woe to the bloody city," ver. 6, and again, ver. 9; being bloody, let it go to pot to be boiled, it is the fittest place for it. Let us here see,

1st. What is the course God takes with it. Jerusalem during the siege is like a pot boiling over the fire, all in a heat, all in a hurry. First. Care is taken to keep a good fire under the pot, which signifies the closeness of the siege, and the many vigorous attacks made upon the city by the besiegers, and especially the continued wrath of God burning against them; ver. 9, "I will make the pile for fire great." Commission is given to the Chaldeans, ver. 10, to "heap on wood, and kindle the fire," make Jerusalem more and more hot to the inhabitants. Note, The fire which God kindles for the consuming of impenitent sinners shall never abate, much less go out for want of fuel. "Tophet has fire and much wood," Isa. xxx. 33. Secondly. The meat as it is boiled is taken out, and given to the Chaldeans for them to feast upon. "Consume the flesh," that is, let it be thoroughly boiled, boiled to rags; spice it well, and make it savoury, for those that will feed sweetly upon it. "Let the bones be burnt," either the bones under the pot, let them be consumed with the other fuel, or, as some think, the bones in the pot; let it boil so furiously as that not only the flesh may be sodden, but even the bones softened. Let all the inhabitants of Jerusalem be, by sickness, sword, and famine, reduced to the extremity of misery; and then, ver. 6, "Bring it out piece by piece," let every man be delivered into the enemy's hand, to be either put to the sword or made a prisoner; let them be an easy prey to them, and let the Chaldeans fall upon them as eagerly as a hungry man doth upon a good dish of meat when it is set before him. "Let no lot fall upon it;" every piece in the pot shall be fetched out and devoured first or last, and therefore it is no matter for casting lots which shall be fetched out first. It was a very severe military execution, when David measured Moab with "two lines to put to death, and one full line to keep alive," 2 Sam. viii. 2; but here is no line, no lot of mercy made use of, all goes one way, and that is to destruction. Thirdly. When all the broth is boiled away, the pot is set empty upon the coals that it may burn too, which signifies the setting the city on fire, ver. 11. The scum of the meat, or, as some translate it, the rust of the metal, is so got into the pot, that there is no making it clean by washing or scouring it, and therefore it must be done by fire; so let the filthiness be burnt out of it, or rather, molten in it, and burnt with it. Let the vipers and their nest be consumed together.

2nd. What is the quarrel God has with it. He would not take these severe methods with Jerusalem but that he is provoked to it; she deserves to be thus dealt with, for,

First. It is a bloody city; ver. 7, 8, "Her blood is in the midst of her." Many a barbarous murder has been committed in the very heart of the city, nay, they have a disposition to cruelty in their hearts; they inwardly delight in bloodshed, and so it is in the midst of them. Nay, they commit their murders in the face of the sun, and openly and impudently avow them, in defiance of the justice both of God and man. She did not pour out the blood she shed upon the ground to cover it with dust, as being ashamed of the sin or afraid of the punishment. She did not look upon it as a filthy thing, fit to be concealed, Deu. xxiii. 13, much less dangerous; nay, she poured out the innocent blood she shed upon a rock where it would not sink in, upon the top of a rock, in despite of Divine views and vengeance. They shed innocent blood under colour of justice, so that they gloried in it, as if they had done God and the country good service; so put it, as it were, on the top of a rock. Or it may refer to the sacrificing of their children on their high places, perhaps on the top of rocks. Now thus they "caused fury to come up and take vengeance," ver. 8. It could not be avoided but that God must in anger visit for these things; his soul must be avenged on such a nation as this. If such impudent murders as these, that even dare Divine vengeance, go unpunished, it will be said that God has forsaken the earth. It is absolutely necessary that such a bloody city as this should have blood given her to drink, for she is worthy, for the vindicating of the honour of Divine justice. And, the crime having been public and notorious, it is fit their punishment should be so too; "I have set their blood on the top of a rock." Jerusalem was to be made an example, and therefore was made a spectacle to the world; God dealt with her according to the law of retaliation. Those that sin before all, it is fit they should be rebuked before all; and that their reputation should not be consulted by the concealment of their punishment, who were so impudent as not to desire the concealment of their sin.

Secondly. It is a filthy city. Great notice is taken of this reddition of the comparison of the scum of this pot, which signifies the sin of Jerusalem working up and appearing when the judgments of God were upon her. It is "the pot whose scum is therein, and is not gone out of it," ver. 6; "the great scum that went not forth out of her," ver. 12; that stuck to the pot when all was boiled away, and was molten in it, ver. 11; some of this runs over into the fire, ver. 12, inflames that, and makes it burn the more furiously, but "it shall all be consumed at last," ver. 11. When the hand of God was gone out against them, instead of humbling themselves under it, repenting and reforming, and accepting the punishment of their iniquity, they grew more impudent and outrageous in sin, quarrelled with God, persecuted his prophets, were fierce to one another, enraged to the last degree against the Chaldeans, snarled at the stone, gnawed their chain, and were like a wild bull in a net. This was their scum; in their distress they trespassed yet more against the Lord, like that king Ahaz, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. There is little hope of those who are made worse by that which should make them better, whose corruptions are excited and exasperated by those rebukes, both of the word and of the providence of God, which were designed for the suppressing and subduing of them; nor of those whose scum boiled up once in convictions and confessions of sin, as if it would be taken off by reformation, but afterwards returned again in a revolt from their good overtures, and the heart that seemed softened is hardened again.

This was Jerusalem's case; "She was wearied with lies," wearied her God with purposes and promises of amendment which she never stood to, wearied herself with her carnal confidences, which have all deceived her, ver. 12. Note, Those that follow after lying vanities weary themselves with the pursuit. Now see her doom, ver. 13, 14: because she is incurably wicked, she is abandoned to ruin without remedy. 1. Methods and means of reformation had been tried in vain; ver. 13, "In thy filthiness is lewdness," that is, thou art become obstinate and impudent in it; thou hast got a habit of it, which is confirmed by frequent acts. "In thy filthiness" there is a rooted lewdness, as appears by this, "I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged;" I have given thee purging physic, but it has not worked; I have used the means of cleansing thee, but they have been ineffectual, the intention of them has not been answered. Note, It is sad to think how many there are on whom ordinances and providences are all lost. 2. It is therefore resolved that no more such methods shall be used; "Thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more." The fire shall no longer be a refining fire, but a consuming fire, and therefore shall not be mitigated and shortened as it has been, but it shall be continued in extremity, till it has done its destroying work. Note, Those that will not be healed are justly given up, and their case adjudged desperate. There is a day coming when it will be said, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." 3. Nothing remains then but to bring them to utter ruin; "I will cause my fury to rest upon thee." This is the same with what is said of the latter Jews, that "wrath is come upon them to the uttermost," 1 Thes. ii. 16. They deserve it: "According to thy doings they shall judge thee," ver. 14; and God will do it. The sentence is bound on with repeated ratifications, that they might be awakened to see how certain their ruin was; "I the Lord have spoken it," who am able to make good what I have spoken; it shall come to pass, nothing shall prevent it, for I will do it myself, I will not go back upon any entreaties; the decree is gone forth, and I will not spare in compassion to them, neither will I repent. He will neither change his mind nor change his way. Hereby the prophet was forbidden to intercede for them, and they were forbidden to flatter themselves with hopes of an escape. God hath said it, and he will do it. Note, The declarations of God's wrath against sinners are as inviolable as the assurances he hath given of favour to his people; and the case of such is sad indeed who have brought it to this issue, that either God must be false or they must be damned.

15 Also the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
16 Son of man, behold, I take away from thee
The desire of thine eyes with a stroke:
Yet neither shalt thou mourn nor weep,
Neither shall thy tears run down.
17 Forbear to cry, make no mourning for the dead,
Bind the tire of thine head upon thee, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet,
And cover not thy lips, and eat not the bread of men.
18 So I spake unto the people in the morning: and at even my wife died; and I did in the morning as I was commanded. 19 And the people said unto me, Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou doest so? 20 Then I answered them, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
21 Speak unto the house of Israel,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will profane my sanctuary, the excellency of your strength,
The desire of your eyes,
And that which your soul pitieth;

And your sons and your daughters whom ye have left shall fall by the sword.
22 And ye shall do as I have done:
Ye shall not cover your lips, nor eat the bread of men.
23 And your tires shall be upon your heads, and your shoes upon your feet:
Ye shall not mourn nor weep;
But ye shall pine away for your iniquities,
And mourn one toward another.
24 Thus Ezekiel is unto you a sign:
According to all that he hath done shall ye do:
And when this cometh, ye shall know that I am the Lord
25 Also, thou son of man, shall it not be [GOD.
In the day when I take from them their strength,
The joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes,
And that whereupon they set their minds,
Their sons and their daughters,
26 That he that escapeth in that day shall come unto thee,
To cause thee to hear it with thine ears? [escaped,
27 In that day shall thy mouth be opened to him which is
And thou shalt speak, and be no more dumb:
And thou shalt be a sign unto them;
And they shalt know that I am the LORD.

These verses conclude what we have been upon all along from the beginning of this book, to wit, Ezekiel's prophecies of the destruction of Jerusalem; for after this, though he prophesied much concerning other nations, yet he said no more concerning Jerusalem, till he heard of the destruction of it, almost three years after, ch. xxxiii. 21. He had assured them in the former part of this chapter that there was no hope at all of the preventing of the trouble; here he assures them that they should not have the ease of weeping for it. Observe here,

First. The sign by which this was represented to them, and it was a sign that cost the prophet very dear; the more shame for them that, when he by a Divine appointment was at such an expense to affect them with what he had to deliver, yet they were not affected by it.

1. He must lose a good wife, that should suddenly be taken from him by death. God gave him notice of it before, that it might be the less surprise to him; ver. 16, "Behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke." Note, 1st. A married state may very well agree with the prophetical office; it is honourable in all, and therefore not sinful in ministers. 2nd. Much of the comfort of human life lies in agreeable relations; no doubt Ezekiel found a prudent, tender yoke-fellow, that shared with him in his griefs and cares, to be a happy companion in his captivity. 3rd. Those in the conjugal relation must be to each other not only a covering of the eyes, (Gen. xx. 16,) to restrain wandering looks after others, but a desire of the eyes, to engage pleasing looks on one another. A beloved wife is the desire of the eyes, which find not any object more grateful. 4th. That is least safe which is most dear; we know not how soon the desire of our eyes may be removed from us, and may become the sorrow of our hearts; which is a good reason why those that have wives should be as though they had none, and those who rejoice in them as though they rejoiced not, 1 Cor. vii. 29, 30. Death is a stroke which the most pious, the most useful, the most amiable, are not exempted from. 5th. When the desire of our eyes is taken away with a stroke, we must see and own the hand of God in it. "I take away the desire of thine eyes." He takes our creature comforts from us when and how he pleaseth; he gave them to us, but reserved to himself a property in them, and may he not do what he will with his own? 6th. Under afflictions of this kind it is good for us to remember that we are sons of men; for so God calls the prophet here. If thou art a son of Adam, thy wife is a daughter of Eve, and therefore a dying creature. It is an affliction which the children of men are liable to, and shall the earth be forsaken for us? According to this prediction he tells us, ver. 18, "I spake unto the people in the morning;" for God sent his prophets rising up early, and sending them then, he thought, if ever, they would be disposed to hearken to him. Observe, First. Though God had given Ezekiel a certain prospect of this affliction coming upon him, yet it did not take him off from his work, but he resolved to go on in that. Secondly. We may the easier bear an affliction if it find us in the way of our duty; for nothing can hurt us, nothing come amiss to us, while we keep ourselves in the love of God.

2. He must deny himself the satisfaction of mourning for his wife, which would have been both an honour to her and an ease to the oppression of his own spirit. He must not use the natural expressions of sorrow, ver. 16; he must not give vent to his passion by weeping, or letting his tears run down; though tears are a tribute due to the dead, and when the body is sown it is fit it should thus be watered. But Ezekiel is not allowed to do this, though he thought he had as much reason to do it as any man, and would perhaps be evil thought of by the people if he did not. Much less might he use the customary formalities of manners; he must dress himself in his usual attire, must bind his turban on him, here called the tire of his head; must put on his shoes, and not go barefoot, as was usual in such cases; he must not cover his lips, nor throw a veil over his face, as mourners were wont to do, Lev. xiii. 45; must not be of a sorrowful countenance, appearing unto men to fast, Mat. vi. 18. He must not eat the bread of men, nor expect that his neighbours and friends should send him in provisions, as usually they did in such cases, presuming the mourners had no heart to provide meat for themselves; but if it were sent he must not eat of it, but go on in his business as at other times. It could not but be sore against the grain to flesh and blood not to lament the death of one he loved so dearly; but so God commands, and "I did in the morning as I was commanded." He appeared in public in his usual habit, and looked as he used to do, without any signs of mourning. 1st. Here there was something peculiar, and Ezekiel, to make himself a sign to the people, must put a force upon himself, and exercise an extraordinary piece of self-denial. Note, Our dispositions must always submit to God's directions, and his command must be obeyed even in that which is most difficult and displeasing to us. 2nd. Though mourning for the dead be a duty, yet it must always be kept under the government of religion and right reason; and we must not sorrow as those that have no hope, nor lament the loss of any creature, even the most valuable, and that which we could worst spare, as if we had lost our God, or as if all our happiness were gone with it; and of this moderation in mourning, ministers, when it is their case, ought to be examples. We must at such a time study to improve the affliction, to accommodate ourselves to it, and to get our acquaintance with the other world increased by the removal of our dear relations, and learn with holy Job to bless the name of the Lord, even when he takes, as well as when he gives.

Secondly. The explication and application of this sign. The people inquired the meaning of it; ver. 19, "Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou doest so?" They knew Ezekiel was a loving husband, that the death of his wife was a great affliction to him, and that he would not appear so unconcerned at it but for some good reason, and for instruction to them; and perhaps were in hopes that it had a favourable signification, and gave them an intimation that God would now comfort them again according to the time he had afflicted them, and make them look pleasant again. Note, When we are inquiring concerning the things of God, our inquiry must be what those things are to us. What are we concerned in them? What conviction, what counsel, what comfort do they speak to us? Wherein do they reach our case? Ezekiel gives them an answer verbatim, as he had received it from the Lord, who had told him what he must speak to the house of Israel.

1. Let them know that, as Ezekiel's wife was taken from him by a stroke, so would God take from them all that which was dearest to them, ver. 21. If this were "done to a green tree, what shall be done to the dry?" If a faithful servant of God was thus afflicted only for his trial, shall such a generation of rebels against God go unpunished? By this awakening providence God shewed that he was in earnest in his threatenings, and inexorable. We may suppose Ezekiel prayed that, if it were the will of God, his wife might be spared to him, but God would not hear him; and should he be heard then in his intercessions for this provoking people? No, it is determined; "God will take away the desire of your eyes." Note, The removal of others' comforts should awaken us to think of parting with ours too, for "are we better than they?" We know not how soon the same cup, or a more bitter one, may be put into our hands, and should therefore weep with them that weep, as being ourselves also in the body. God will "take away that which their soul pitieth;" that is, of which they say, what pity is it that it should be cut off and destroyed. That 'for which your souls are afraid,' so some read it; you shall lose that which you most dread the loss of. And what is that? 1st. That which was their public pride, the temple; "I will profane my sanctuary," by giving that into the enemy's hand to be plundered and burnt. This was signified by the death of a wife, a dear wife, to teach us that God's sanctuary should be dearer to us, and more the desire of our eyes, than any creature comfort whatsoever. Christ's church, that is, his spouse, should be ours too. Though this people were very corrupt, and had themselves profaned the sanctuary, yet it is called the desire of their eyes. Note, Many that are destitute of the power of godliness yet are very fond of the form of it; and it is just with God to punish them for their hypocrisy by depriving them of that too. The sanctuary is here called the excellency of their strength; they had many strongholds, and places of defence, but the temple excelled them all. It was the pride of their strength; that is, they prided in it as their strength, that they were the temple of the Lord, Jer. vii. 4. Note, The church privileges that men are proud of are profaned by their sins; and it is just with God to profane them by his judgments. And with these God will take away, 2nd. That which was their family pleasure, which they looked upon with delight; "Your sons and your daughters" (which are the dearer to you because they are but a few left of many, the rest having perished by famine and pestilence,) "shall fall by the sword of the Chaldeans." What a dreadful spectacle would it be to see their own children, pieces, pictures of themselves, whom they had taken such care and pains to bring up, and whom they loved as their souls, sacrificed to the rage of the merciless conquerors! This, this was the punishment of sin.

2. Let them know that, as Ezekiel wept not for his affliction, so neither should they weep for theirs. He must say, "Ye shall do as I have done," ver. 22; "You shall not mourn or weep," ver. 23. Jeremiah had told them the same, that men "shall not lament for the dead, nor cut themselves," Jer. xvi. 6. Not that there shall be any such merciful circumstances without, or any such degrees of wisdom and grace within, as shall mitigate and moderate the sorrow; but they shall not mourn; for, 1st. Their grief shall be so great that they shall be quite overwhelmed with it; their passions shall stifle them, and they shall have no power to ease themselves by giving vent to it. 2nd. Their calamities shall come so fast upon them, one upon the neck of another, that by long custom they shall be hardened in their sorrows, Job vi. 10, and perfectly stupified, and moped, as we say, with them. 3rd. They shall not dare to express their grief, for fear of being deemed disaffected to the conquerors, who would take their lamentations as an affront and disturbance to their triumphs. 4th. They shall neither have hearts, nor time, nor money, wherewith to put themselves in mourning, and accommodate themselves with the ceremonies of grief. You will be so entirely taken up with solid, substantial grief, that you will have no room for the shadow of it. 5th. Particular mourners shall not need to distinguish themselves by covering their lips, and laying aside their ornaments, and going barefoot; for it is well known every body is a mourner. 6th. There shall be none of that sense of their affliction and sorrow for it which would help to bring them to repentance, but that only which shall drive them to despair; so it follows, "Ye shall pine away for your iniquities," with seared consciences, and reprobate minds. And you shall mourn, not to God in prayer and confession of sin, but one towards another, murmuring and fretting, and complaining of God; thus making their burthen heavier, and their wound more grievous, as impatient people use to do under their afflictions, by mingling their own passions with them.

3. An appeal to the event for the confirmation of all this; ver. 24, "When this cometh," as it is foretold, when Jerusalem, which is this day besieged, is quite destroyed and laid waste, which now you cannot believe will ever be, "then ye shall know that I am the Lord God," who have given you this fair warning of it; then you will remember that Ezekiel was to you a sign. Note, Those who regard not the threatenings of the word when they are preached will be made to remember them when they are executed. Observe,

1st. The great desolation which the siege of Jerusalem should end in; ver. 25, "In that day," that terrible day when the city shall be broken up, "I will take from them," First. That which they depended on; their strength, their walls, their treasures, their fortifications, their men of war,—none shall stand them in stead. Secondly. That which they boasted of; the joy of their glory, that which they looked upon as most their glory, and which they most rejoiced in, the temple of their God, and the palaces of their princes. Thirdly. That which they delighted in; which was the desire of their eyes, and on which they set their minds. Note, Carnal people set their minds upon that on which they can set their eyes; they look at, and dote upon, the things that are seen; and it is their folly to set their minds upon that which they have no assurance of, and which may be taken from them in a moment, Pr. xxiii. 5. Their sons and their daughters were all this, their strength, and joy, and glory, and these shall go into captivity.

2nd. The notice that should be brought to the prophet, not by revelation, as the notice of the siege was brought him, ver. 2, but in an ordinary way; ver. 26, "He that escapes in that day shall," by a special direction of providence, "come to thee" to bring thee intelligence of it; which we find now done, ch. xxxix. 21. The ill news came slowly, and yet to Ezekiel and his fellow-captives it came too soon.

3rd. The Divine impression which he should be under upon the receiving of that notice, ver. 27. Whereas from this time to that Ezekiel was thus far dumb, that he prophesied no more against the land of Israel, but against the neighbouring nations, as we shall find in the following chapters, then he shall have orders given him to speak again to the children of his people, ch. xxxiii. 23, 24; then his mouth shall be opened. He was suspended from prophesying against them in the meantime, because, Jerusalem being besieged, his prophecies could not be sent into the city; because, when God was speaking so loud by the rod, there was the less need of speaking by the word; and because then the accomplishments of his prophecies would be the full confirmation of his mission, and would the more effectually clear the way for him to begin again. It being referred to that issue, that issue must be waited for. Thus Christ forbade his disciples to preach openly that he was Christ till after his resurrection, because that was to be the full proof of it. But then thou shalt speak with the greater assurance, and the more effectually, either to their conviction or to their confusion. Note, God's prophets are never silenced but for wise and holy ends. And when God gives them the opening of the mouth again, (as he will in due time, for even the witnesses that are slain shall arise,) it shall appear to have been for his glory that they were for awhile silent, that the people may the more certainly and fully know that God is the Lord.

CHAPTER XXV.

Judgment began at the house of God, and therefore with them the prophets began, who were the judges; but it must not end there, and therefore they must not. Ezekiel had finished his testimony which related to the destruction of Jerusalem. As to that, he was ordered to say no more, but stand upon his watch-tower and wait the issue; and yet he must not be silent. There are divers nations bordering upon the land of Israel which he must prophesy against, as Isaiah and Jeremiah had done before; and must proclaim God's controversy with them, chiefly for the injuries and indignities which they had done to the people of God in the day of their calamity. In this chapter we have his prophecy, I. Against the Ammonites, ver. 1—7. II. Against the Moabites, ver. 8—11. III. Against the Edomites, ver. 12—14. IV. Against the Philistines, ver. 15—17. That which is laid to the charge of each of them is their barbarous and insolent carriage towards God's Israel, for which God threatens to put the same cup of trembling into their hand. God's resenting it thus would be an encouragement to Israel to believe that, though he had dealt thus severely with them, yet he had not cast them off, but would still own them, and plead their cause.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against the Ammonites, and prophesy against them; 3 And say unto the Ammonites,

Hear the word of the Lord GOD;
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thou saidst, Aha,
Against my sanctuary, when it was profaned;
And against the land of Israel, when it was desolate;
And against the house of Judah, when they went into captivity;
4 Behold, therefore I will deliver thee to the men of the east for a possession,
And they shall set their palaces in thee, and make their dwellings in thee:
They shall eat thy fruit, and they shall drink thy milk.
5 And I will make Rabbah a stable for camels,
And the Ammonites a couchingplace for flocks:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
6 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [the feet,
Because thou hast clapped thine hands, and stamped with
And rejoiced in heart with all thy despite against the land of Israel;
7 Behold, therefore I will stretch out mine hand upon thee,
And will deliver thee for a spoil to the heathen;
And I will cut thee off from the people,
And I will cause thee to perish out of the countries:
I will destroy thee; and thou shalt know that I am the LORD.

Here, First. The prophet is ordered to address himself to the Ammonites in the name of the Lord Jehovah, the God of Israel, who is also the God of the whole earth. But what can Chemosh, the god of the children of Ammon, say in answer to it? He is bidden to set his face against the Ammonites, for he is God's representative as a prophet, and thus he must signify that God set his face against them; for "the face of the Lord is against them that do evil," Ps. xxxiv. 16. He must speak with boldness and assurance, as one that knew whose errand he went upon, and that he should be borne out in delivering it. He must therefore set his face as a flint, Isa. l. 7. He must shew his displeasure against these proud enemies of Israel, and face them down, though they were very impudent; and thus must shew that, though he had prophesied so much and so long against Israel, yet still he was for Israel; and while he witnessed against their corruptions yet adhered to, and gloried in, God's covenant with them. Note, Those are miserable that have the preaching and praying of God's prophets against them,—against whom their faces are set.

Secondly. He is directed what to say to them. Ezekiel is now a captive in Babylon, and has been so many years, and knows little of the state of his own nation, much less of the nations that were about it; but God tells him both what they were doing and what he was about to do with them. And thus by the spirit of prophecy he is enabled to speak as pertinently to their case as if he had been among them.

1. He must upbraid the Ammonites with their insolent and barbarous triumphs over the people of Israel in their calamities, ver. 3. The Ammonites said, when all went against the Jews, "Aha, so would we have it." They were glad to see, 1st. The temple burned, the sanctuary profaned by the victorious Chaldeans. This is put first to intimate what was the cause of the controversy; they had an enmity to the Jews for the sake of their religion, though it was only some poor remains of the profession of it that were to be found among them. 2nd. The nation ruined. They rejoiced when "the land of Israel was made desolate," the cities burnt, and the country wasted, and both depopulated, and when the house of Judah went into captivity. When they had not power to oppress God's Israel themselves, they were pleased to see the Chaldeans oppress them; partly because they envied their wealth and the good land they enjoyed, partly because they feared their growing power, and partly because they hated their religion, and the Divine oracles they were favoured with. It is repeated again; ver. 6, "They clapped with their hands," to irritate the rage of the Chaldeans, and to set them on as dogs upon the game; or, they clapped their hands in triumph, attended this tragedy with their plaudits, thinking it well acted; never was there any thing more diverting or entertaining to them. They stamped with their feet, ready to leap and dance for joy upon this occasion. They not only rejoiced in heart, but they could not forbear shewing it, though every one that had any sense of honour and humanity would cry shame upon them for it; especially considering that they rejoiced thus, not for any thing they got by Israel's fall; if so, they had been the more excusable. Most people are for themselves. But this was purely from a principle of malice and enmity; "Thou hast rejoiced in heart with all thy despite," which signifies both scorn and hatred, "against the land of Israel." Note, The people of God have always had a great deal of ill-will borne them by this wicked world; and their calamities have been their neighbours' entertainments. See to what unnatural instances of malice the enmity that is in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman will carry them. The Ammonites, of all people, should not have rejoiced at Jerusalem's ruin, but should rather have trembled, because they themselves had such a narrow escape at the same time; it was but cross or pile which should be besieged first, Rabbah or Jerusalem, ch. xxi. 20; and they had reason to think that the king of Babylon would set upon them next. But thus were their hearts hardened to their ruin, and their insolence against Jerusalem was to them an evident token of perdition, Phil. i. 28. It is a very wicked thing to be glad at the calamities of any, especially of God's people, and a sin that God will surely reckon for; such delight has God in shewing mercy, and so backward is he to punish, that nothing is more pleasing to him than to be stopped in the way of his judgments by intercessions, nor any thing more provoking than to help forward the affliction when he is but a little displeased, Zec. i. 25.

2. He must threaten the Ammonites with utter ruin for this insolence which they were guilty of. God turns away his wrath from Israel against them, as is said, Pr. xxiv. 17, 18. God is jealous for his people's honour, because his own is so nearly interested in it; and therefore they that touch that shall be made to know they touch the apple of his eye. He had before predicted the destruction of the Ammonites, ch. xxi. 28. Had they repented, that had been revoked, but now it is ratified. 1st. A destroying enemy is brought against them. "I will deliver thee to the men of the East; that is, first to the Chaldeans, who came from the north-east, and whose army, under the command of Nebuchadnezzar, destroyed the country of the Ammonites, about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, (as Josephus relates, Antiq. lib. 10, cap. 11;) and then to the Arabians, who were properly the children of the East, who, when the Chaldeans had made the country desolate, and quitted it, came and took possession of it for themselves, probably with the consent of the conquerors. Shepherds' tents were their palaces; these they set up in the country of the Ammonites, where they made their dwellings, ver. 4. They enjoyed the products of the country; "They shall eat thy fruit and drink thy milk," and the milk from the cattle is the fruit of the ground at second-hand. They made use even of the royal city for their cattle; ver. 5, "I will make Rabbah," that was a nice and splendid city, to be "a stable for camels;" for its new masters, whose wealth lies all in cattle, will not think they can put the palaces of Rabbah to a better use. Rabbah had been a habitation of brutish men; justly, therefore, is it now made a stable for camels, and the country "a couchingplace for flocks," more innocent beasts than those with which it had been before replenished. 2nd. God himself acts as an enemy to them; ver. 7, "I will stretch out mine hand upon thee," a hand that will reach far, and strike home; which there is no resisting the blow of, for it is a mighty hand, nor bearing the weight of, for it is a heavy hand. God's hand stretched out against the Ammonites will not only deliver them "for a spoil to the heathen," so that all their neighbours shall prey upon them, but will "cut them off from the people, and make them perish out of the countries," so that there shall be no remains of them in that place: compare with this Jer. xlix. 1, &c. What can sound more terrible than that resolution, ver. 7, "I will destroy thee?" for the almighty God is able both "to save and to destroy," and it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands. Both the threatenings here, ver. 5 and ver. 7, conclude with this, "Ye shall know that I am the Lord;" for, First. Thus God will maintain his own honour, and will make it to appear that he is the God of Israel, though he suffers them for a time to be captives in Babylon. Secondly. Thus he will bring those that were strangers to him into an acquaintance with him, and it will be a blessed effect of their calamities. Better know God and be poor, than be rich and ignorant of him.

8 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because that Moab and Seir do say,
Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen;
9 Therefore, behold, I will open the side of Moab from the cities,
From his cities which are on his frontiers, the glory of the country,
Beth-jeshimoth, Baal-meon, and Kiriathaim,
10 Unto the men of the east with the Ammonites,
And will give them in possession, [nations.
That the Ammonites may not be remembered among the 11 And I will execute judgments upon Moab;

And they shall know that I am the LORD.
12 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance,
And hath greatly offended, and revenged himself upon them;
13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also stretch out mine hand upon Edom,
And will cut off man and beast from it;
And I will make it desolate from Teman;
And they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.
14 And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom by the hand of my people Israel:
And they shall do in Edom according to mine anger and according to my fury;
And they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord GOD.
15 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because the Philistines have dealt by revenge,
And have taken vengeance with a despiteful heart,
To destroy it for the old hatred;
16 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines,
And I will cut off the Cherethims,
And destroy the remnant of the sea coast.
17 And I will execute great vengeance upon them with furious rebukes;
And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall lay my vengeance upon them.

Three more of Israel's ill-natured neighbours are here arraigned, convicted, and condemned to destruction, for contributing to, and triumphing in, Jerusalem's fall.

First. The Moabites. Seir, which was the seat of the Edomites, is joined with them, ver. 5, because they said the same as the Moabites, but they were afterwards reckoned with by themselves, ver. 12. Now observe,

1. What was the sin of the Moabites. They said, "Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen." They triumphed, 1st. In the apostacies of Israel; were pleased to see them forsake their God, and worship idols, and hoped in awhile their religion would be quite lost and forgotten, and the house of Judah would be like all the heathen, perfect idolaters. When those that profess religion walk unworthy of their profession, they encourage the enemies of religion to hope that it will in time sink and be run down and quite abandoned; but let the Moabites know that, though there are those of the house of Judah who have made themselves like the heathen, yet there is a remnant that retain their integrity: the religion of the house of Judah shall recover itself, its peculiarities shall be preserved, it shall not lose itself among the heathen, but distinguish itself from them, till it deliver itself honourably into a better institution. 2nd. They triumphed in the calamities of Israel. They said, "The house of Judah is like all the heathen," in as ill a state as they; their God is no more able to deliver them from this overflowing scourge of these parts of the world than the gods of the heathen are to deliver them. Where are the promises they gloried in, and all the wonders which they and their fathers told us of? What the better are they for the covenant of peculiarity, upon which they so much valued themselves? They that looked with so much scorn upon all the heathen are now set upon a level with them, or rather sunk below them. Note, Those who judge only by outward appearance are ready to conclude that the people of God have lost all their privileges when they have lost their worldly prosperity; which doth not follow, for good men, even in affliction, in captivity among the heathen, yet have graces and comforts within sufficient to distinguish them from all the heathen. Though the event seem one to the righteous and wicked, yet, indeed, it is vastly different.

2. What should be the punishment of Moab for this sin. Because they triumphed in the overthrow of Judah, their country shall be in like manner overthrown with that of the Ammonites, who were guilty of the same sin; ver. 9, 10, "I will open the side of Moab," will uncover its shoulder, will take away all its defences, that it may become an easy prey to any that will make a prey of it. 1st. See here how it shall be exposed. The frontier towns, that were its strength and guard, shall be demolished by the Chaldean forces, and laid open. Some of the cities are here named, which are said to be "the glory of the country," which they trusted in, and boasted of as impregnable; these shall decay, be deserted, or betrayed, or fall into the enemy's hands, so that Moab shall lie exposed, and whoever will may penetrate into the heart of the country. Note, Those who glory in any other defence and protection but that of the Divine power, providence, and promise, will, sooner or later, see cause to be ashamed of their glorying. 2nd. See here to whom it shall be exposed. "The men of the East," when they come to take possession of the country of the Ammonites, shall seize that of the Moabites too. God, the Lord of all lands, will give them that land; for the kingdoms of men he giveth to whomsoever he will. The Arabians, that are shepherds, and live quietly, plain men dwelling in tents, shall, by an overruling providence, be put in possession of the land of the Moabites, who are soldiers, men of war, and cunning hunters, that live turbulently. The Chaldeans shall get it by war, and the Arabians shall enjoy it in peace. Concerning the Ammonites it is said, "They shall no more be remembered among the nations," ver. 10, for they had been accessary to the murder of Gedaliah, Jer. xl. 14. But of the Moabites it is said, "I will execute judgments upon Moab." They shall feel the weight of God's displeasure, but perhaps not to that degree that the Ammonites shall; however, so far as that "they shall know that I am the Lord;" that the God of Israel is a God of power, and that his covenant with his people is not broken

Secondly. The Edomites. The posterity of Esau, betwixt whom and Jacob there had been an old enmity. And here is,

1. The sin of the Edomites, ver. 12. They not only triumphed in the ruin of Judah and Jerusalem, as the Moabites and Ammonites had done, but they took advantage from the present distressed state to which the Jews were reduced to do them some real mischiefs; probably made inroads upon their frontiers, and plundered their country; "Edom has dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance." The Edomites had of old been tributary to the Jews, according to the sentence, that the elder should serve the younger. In Jehoram's time they revolted. Amaziah severely chastised them, 2 Kin. xiv. 7, and for this they took vengeance. Now they would pay off all the old scores; and not only incensed the Babylonians against Jerusalem, crying "Rase it, rase it," Ps. cxxxvii. 7, but cut off those that escaped; as we find in the prophecy of Obadiah, which is wholly directed against Edom, ver. 11, 12, &c. It is called here revenging a revenge, which intimated that they were not only eager upon it, but very cruel in it, and recompensed to the Jews more than double. Herein he was greatly offended. Note, It is a great offence to God for us to revenge ourselves upon our brother; for God has said, "Vengeance is mine." We are forbidden to revenge, or to bear a grudge. Suppose Judah had been hard upon Edom formerly, it was a base thing for the Edomites now in revenge for it to smite them secretly. But the Jews had a Divine warrant to reign over the Edomites, for that therefore they ought not to have made reprisals; and it was the more disingenuous for them to retain the old core, when God had particularly commanded his people to forget it; Deu. xxiii. 7, "Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite."

2. The judgments threatened against them for this sin. God will take them to task for it; ver. 13, "I will stretch out my hand upon Edom." Their country shall be desolate from Teman, which lay in the south part of it; and "they shall fall by the sword unto Dedan," which lay north; the desolations of war should go through the nation. 1st. They had taken vengeance, and therefore God will lay his vengeance upon them; ver. 14, "And they shall know my vengeance." They that will not leave it to God to take vengeance for them may expect that he will take vengeance on them; and they that will not believe and fear his vengeance shall be made to know and feel his vengeance; they shall be dealt with according to God's anger, and according to his fury; not according to the weakness of the instruments that are employed in it, but according to the strength of the arm that employs them. 2nd. They had taken vengeance on Israel, and God will lay his vengeance on them by the hand of his people Israel. They suffered much by the Chaldeans, which seems to be referred to, Jer. xlix. 8. But besides that there were saviours to come upon mount Sion, who should judge the mount of Esau, Oba. 21; and Israel's Redeemer comes with dyed garments from Bozrah, Isa. lxiii. 1. This implies a promise that Israel should recover itself again to that degree as to be in a capacity of curbing the insolence of its neighbours. And we find, 1 Mac. v. 3, that "Judas Maccabeus fought against the children of Esau in Idumea, gave them a great overthrow, abated their courage, and took their spoil." And Josephus saith, (Antiq. l. 13, c. 17,) that Hircanus made the Edomites tributaries to Israel. Note, The equity of God's judgments is to be observed when he not only avenges injuries upon those that did them, but by those against whom they were done.

Thirdly. The Philistines. And, 1. Their sin is much the same with that of the Edomites. They have dealt by revenge with the people of Israel, and have "taken vengeance with a despiteful heart;" not to disturb them only, but to destroy them, for "the old hatred," ver. 15, the old grudge they bore them, or, as the margin reads it, 'with perpetual hatred,' a hatred that began long since, and which they resolved to continue. Their anger was implacable; they dealt by revenge, traded in the acts of malice; it was their constant practice, and their heart, their spiteful heart, was upon it. 2. Their punishment likewise is much the same, ver. 16. They that were for destroying God's people shall themselves be cut off and destroyed; and, ver. 17, they that were for avenging themselves God will execute great vengeance upon them. This was fulfilled when that country was wasted by the Chaldean army, not long after the destruction of Jerusalem, which is foretold Jer. xlvii. It was strange that these nations, which bordered upon the land of Israel, were not alarmed by the success of the Chaldean army, and made to tremble in the apprehension of their own danger,—when their neighbour's house was on fire it was time to look to their own; but their impiety and malice made them forget their politics, till God by his judgments convinced them that the cup was going round; and they were the less safe for their being secure.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The prophet had soon done with those four nations that he set his face against in the foregoing chapters; for they were not at that time very considerable in the world, nor would their fall make any great noise among the nations, nor any figure in history. But the city of Tyre is next set to the bar, which, being a place of vast trade, was known all the world over; and therefore here are three whole chapters, this and the two that follow, spent in the prediction of the destruction of Tyre. We have the burden of Tyre, Isa. xxiii. It is but just mentioned in Jeremiah, as sharing with the natives in the common calamity, ch. xxv. 22; xxvii. 3; xlvii. 4; but Ezekiel is ordered to be large upon that head. In this chapter we have, I. The sin charged upon Tyre, which was triumphing in the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 2. II. The destruction of Tyrus itself foretold. 1. The extremity of this destruction: it shall be utterly ruined, ver. 4—6: and again, ver. 12—14. 2. The instruments of this destruction, many nations, ver. 3: and the king of Babylon by name, with his vast victorious army, ver. 7—11. 3. The great surprise that this should give to the neighbour nations, who would all admire the fall of so great a city, and be alarmed at it, ver. 15—21.

AND it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, because that Tyrus hath said against Jerusalem,
Aha, she is broken that was the gates of the people:
She is turned unto me:
I shall be replenished, now she is laid waste:
3 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus,
And will cause many nations to come up against thee,
As the sea causeth his waves to come up.

4 And they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus,
And break down her towers:

ANCIENT WALLS OF TYRUS.

I will also scrape her dust from her,
And make her like the top of a rock.
5 It shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD:
And it shall become a spoil to the nations.
6 And her daughters which are in the field shall be slain by the sword;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.
7 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will bring upon Tyrus
Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon,
A king of kings, from the north,
With horses, and with chariots,
And with horsemen, and companies, and much people.
8 He shall slay with the sword thy daughters in the field:
And he shall make a fort against thee,
And cast a mount against thee,
And lift up the buckler against thee.
9 And he shall set engines of war against thy walls,
And with his axes he shall break down thy towers.
10 By reason of the abundance of his horses their dust shall cover thee:
Thy walls shall shake at the noise of the horsemen,
And of the wheels, and of the chariots,
When he shall enter into thy gates,
As men enter into a city wherein is made a breach.
11 With the hoofs of his horses shall he tread down all thy [streets:
He shall slay thy people by the sword,
And thy strong garrisons shall go down to the ground.
12 And they shall make a spoil of thy riches,
And make a prey of thy merchandise:
And they shall break down thy walls,
And destroy thy pleasant houses:
And they shall lay thy stones and thy timber and thy [dust
In the midst of the water.
13 And I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease;
And the sound of thy harps shall be no more heard.
14 And I will make thee like the top of a rock:
Thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon;
Thou shalt be built no more:
For I the LORD have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.

This prophecy is dated in the eleventh year, which was the year that Jerusalem was taken, and "in the first day of the month;" but it is not said what month. Some think the month in which Jerusalem was taken, which was the fourth month, others the month after; or perhaps it was the first month, and so it was the first day of the year. Observe here,

First. The pleasure with which the Tyrians looked upon the ruins of Jerusalem. Ezekiel was a great way off, in Babylon, but God told him what Tyrus said against Jerusalem; ver. 2, "Aha, she is broken," broken to pieces, "that was the gates of the people," to whom there was a great resort, and where there was a general rendezvous of all nations, some upon one account, and some upon another; and I shall get by it. All the wealth, power, and interest which Jerusalem had, it is hoped, shall be turned to Tyre, and so "now she is laid waste I shall be replenished." We do not find that the Tyrians had such a hatred and enmity to Jerusalem, and the sanctuary, as the Ammonites and Edomites had, nor were so spiteful and mischievous to the Jews; they were men of business, and of large acquaintance and free conversation, and therefore were not so bigoted, and of such a persecuting spirit, as the narrow souls that lived retired and knew not the world. All their care was to get estates and enlarge their trade, and they looked upon Jerusalem not as an enemy, but as a rival. Hiram, king of Tyre, was a good friend to David and Solomon, and we do not read of any quarrels the Jews had with the Tyrians; but Tyre promiseth herself that the fall of Jerusalem will be an advantage to her, in respect of trade and commerce; that now she shall have Jerusalem's customers, and the great men from all parts, that used to come to Jerusalem for the accomplishing of themselves, and to spend their estates there, will now come to Tyre and spend them there; and whereas many, since the Chaldean army became so formidable in those parts, had retired into Jerusalem, and brought their estates thither for safety, as the Rechabites did, now they will come to Tyre, which, being in a manner surrounded by the sea, will be thought a place of greater strength than Jerusalem; and thus the prosperity of Tyre will rise out of the ruins of Jerusalem. Note, To be secretly pleased with the death or decay of others when we are likely to get by it, with their fall when we may thrive upon it, is a sin that doth most easily beset us, but is not thought to be such an ill thing, and so provoking to God, as really it is. We are apt to say, when those who stand in our light, in our way, are removed, when they break or fall into disgrace, we shall be replenished now they are laid waste. But this comes from a selfish, covetous principle, and a desire to be "placed alone in the midst of the earth," as if we grudged that any should live by us. This comes from a want of that love to our neighbour as to ourselves which the law of God so expressly requires, and from that inordinate love of the world as our happiness which the love of God so expressly forbids. And it is just with God to blast the designs and projects of those who thus contrive to raise themselves upon the ruins of others; and we see they are often disappointed.

Secondly. The displeasure of God against them for it. The providence of God had done well for Tyrus; it was a pleasant and wealthy city, and might have continued so, if she had, as she ought to have done, sympathised with Jerusalem in her calamities, and sent her an address of condolence; but when, instead of that, she shewed herself pleased with her neighbour's fall, and perhaps sent an address of congratulation to the conquerors, then God saith, "Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus," ver. 3. And let her not expect to prosper long if God be against her.

1. God will bring formidable enemies upon her; "Many nations shall come against thee;" that is, an army made up of many nations, or one nation that shall be as strong as many. Those that have God against them may expect all the creatures against them; for what peace can they have with whom God is at war? They shall come pouring in as the waves of the sea, one upon the neck of another with an irresistible force. The person is named that shall bring this army upon them, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings, that had many kings tributaries to him, and dependents on him, besides those that were his captives, Dan. ii. 37, 38. He is that head of gold. He shall come with a vast army, horses and chariots, &c., all land forces. We do not find he had any naval force, or any thing wherewith he might attack it by sea, which made the attempt the more difficult, as we find ch. xxix. 18, where it is called a "great service which he served against Tyrus." He shall besiege it in form, ver. 8, "make a fort, and cast a mount," and, ver. 9, shall "set engines of war against the walls." His troops shall be so numerous as to raise a dust that shall cover the city, ver. 10. They shall make a noise that shall even shake the walls; and they shall shout at every attack, as soldiers do when they enter a city that is broken up. The horses shall prance with so much fury and violence that they shall even tread down the streets, though never so well paved.

2. They shall do terrible execution. 1st. The enemy shall make themselves masters of all their fortifications, "shall destroy the walls, and break down the towers," ver. 4. For what walls are so strong built as to be fence against the judgment of God? Her "strong garrisons shall go down to the ground," ver. 11; and the walls shall be broken down, ver. 12. The city held out a long siege, but it was taken at last. 2nd. A great deal of blood shall be shed; "Her daughters which are in the field," the cities upon the continent, which were subject to Tyre as the mother city, the inhabitants of them "shall be slain by the sword," ver. 6. The invaders begin with them that come first in their way. And ver. 11, "He shall slay thy people with the sword," not only the soldiers that are found in arms, but the burghers; they shall be put to the sword, the king of Babylon being highly incensed against them for holding out so long. 3rd. The wealth of the city shall all become a spoil to the conqueror; ver. 12, they "shall make a prey of the merchandise." It was in hope of the plunder that the city was set upon with so much vigour. See the vanity of riches, that they are kept for the owners to their hurt; and not only cease to benefit those who took pains for them, and were duly entitled to them, but are made to serve their enemies, who are thereby put into a capacity of doing them so much the more mischief. 4th. The city itself shall be laid in ruins. All the pleasant houses shall be destroyed, ver. 12, that were pleasantly situated, beautified, and furnished; they shall become a heap of rubbish. Let none please themselves too much in their pleasant houses, for they know not how soon they may see the desolation of them. Tyre shall be utterly ruined; the enemy shall not only pull down the houses, but shall carry away "the stones and the timber," which might serve for the rebuilding of it, and shall "lay them in the midst of the water," not to be recovered or ever made use of again. Nay, ver. 4, "I will scrape her dust from her." Not only shall the loose dust be blown away, but the very ground it stands upon shall be torn up by the enraged enemy, carried off and laid "in the midst of the water," ver. 12. The foundation is in the dust; that dust shall be all taken away, then the city must fall of course. When Jerusalem was destroyed it was ploughed like a field, Mic. iii. 12. But the destruction of Tyre is carried farther than so; the very soil of it shall be scraped away, and it shall be made like the top of a rock, ver. 4; and again, ver. 14, pure rock that hath no earth to cover it. It shall only be a place for the spreading of nets, ver. 5; and again, ver. 14, it shall serve fishermen to dry their nets upon, and mend them. 5th. There shall be a full period to all its mirth and joy; ver. 13, "I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease." Tyre had been a joyous city, Isa. xxiii. 7; with her songs she had courted customers to deal with her in a way of trade, but now farewell all her profitable commerce and pleasant conversation; Tyre is no more a place either of business or of sport. Lastly, It shall be built no more, ver. 14; not built any more as it had been, with such state and magnificence; nor built any more in the same place within the sea, nor built for a long time; the present inhabitants shall be destroyed or dispersed, so that this Tyre shall be no more; for God hath spoken it, ver. 5, 14; and when what he hath said is accomplished "they shall know" thereby that "he is the Lord, and not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent."

15 Thus saith the Lord GOD to Tyrus;
Shall not the isles shake at the sound of thy fall,
When the wounded cry,
When the slaughter is made in the midst of thee?
16 Then all the princes of the sea shall come down from their thrones, [garments:
And lay away their robes, and put off their broidered
They shall clothe themselves with trembling;
They shall sit upon the ground,
And shall tremble at every moment,
And be astonished at thee. [to thee,
17 And they shall take up a lamentation for thee, and say
How art thou destroyed, that wast inhabited of seafaring
The renowned city, which wast strong in the sea, [men,
She and her inhabitants,
Which cause their terror to be on all that haunt it!
18 Now shall the isles tremble in the day of thy fall;
Yea, the isles that are in the sea shall be troubled at thy 19 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [departure.
When I shall make thee a desolate city,
Like the cities that are not inhabited;
When I shall bring up the deep upon thee,
And great waters shall cover thee;
20 When I shall bring thee down
With them that descend into the pit, with the people of old time,
And shall set thee in the low parts of the earth, in places desolate of old, [habited;
With them that go down to the pit, that thou be not in-
And I shall set glory in the land of the living;
21 I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more:
Though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be Saith the Lord GOD. [found again,

The utter ruin of Tyre is here represented in very strong and lively figures, which are mighty affecting.

First. See how high, how great, Tyre had been, how little likely ever to have come to this. The remembrance of men's former grandeur and plenty is a great aggravation of their present disgrace and poverty. Tyre was a renowned city, ver. 17, famous among the nations; the crowned city, so she is called, Isa. xxiii. 8; a city that had crowns in her gift, honoured all she smiled upon, crowned herself, and all about her. She was inhabited of seas; that is, of those that trade at sea, of those who from all parts came thither by sea, bringing with them the abundance of the seas, and the treasures hid in the sand. She was strong on the sea, easy of access to her friends, but to her enemies inaccessible; fortified by a wall of water which made her impregnable. So that she with her pomp, and her inhabitants with their pride, caused their terror to be on all that haunted that city, and upon any account frequented it. It was well fortified, and formidable in the eyes of all that acquainted themselves with it. Everybody stood in awe of the Tyrians, and was afraid of disobliging them. Note, Those who know their strength are too apt to cause terror, to pride themselves in frightening those they are an overmatch for.

Secondly. See how low, how little, Tyre is made, ver. 19, 20. This renowned city is made a desolate city, is no more frequented as it has been; there is no more resort of merchants to it; it is like the cities not inhabited, which are no cities, and having none to keep them in repair will go to decay of themselves. Tyre shall be like a city overflowed by an inundation of waters which cover it, and upon which the deep is brought up. As the waves had formerly been its defence, so now they shall be its destruction. She shall "be brought down with them that descend into the pit," with the cities of the old world that were under water, and with Sodom and Gomorrah, that lie in the bottom of the Dead Sea. Or, she shall be in the condition of those that have been long buried, of the people of old time, that are old inhabitants of the silent grave, who are quite rotted away under ground, and quite forgotten above ground. Such shall Tyre be, "free among the dead, set in the lower parts of the earth," humbled, mortified, reduced. It shall be "like the places desolate of old," as well as like persons dead of old; it shall be like other cities that have formerly been in like manner deserted and destroyed. It shall not be inhabited again; none shall have the courage to attempt the rebuilding of it upon that spot, so that it shall be no more; the Tyrians shall be lost among the nations, so that people will look in vain for Tyre in Tyre; "Thou shalt be sought for, and never found again." New persons may build a new city, upon a new spot of ground hard by, which they may call Tyre, but Tyre, as it is, shall never be any more. Note, The strongest cities in the world, the best fortified and best furnished, are subject to decay, and may in a little time be brought to nothing. In the history of our own island many cities are spoken of as in being when the Romans were here, which now our antiquaries scarce know where to look for, and of which there remains no more evidence but Roman urns and coins digged up there sometimes accidentally. But in the other world we look for a city that shall stand for ever, and flourish in perfection through all the ages of eternity.

Thirdly. See what a distress the inhabitants of Tyre are in; ver. 15, "There is a great slaughter made in the midst of thee," many slain, and great men. It is probable when the city was taken the generality of the inhabitants were put to the sword; then did the wounded cry, and cried in vain, to the pitiless conquerors; they cried quarter, but it would not be given them. The wounded are slain without mercy; or, rather, that is the only mercy that is shewn them, that the second blow shall rid them of their pain.

Fourthly. See what a consternation all the neighbours are in upon the fall of Tyre. This is elegantly expressed here, to shew how astonishing it should be: 1. "The islands shall shake at the sound of thy fall," ver. 15. As, if a great merchant breaks, all that he deals with are shocked by it, and begin to look about them; perhaps they had effects in his hands which they are afraid they shall lose; or, when they see one fail and become bankrupt of a sudden, in debt a great deal more than he is worth, it makes them afraid for themselves, lest they should do so too. Thus the isles, who thought themselves safe in the embraces of the sea, when they see Tyrus fall, shall tremble, and be troubled, saying, What will become of us? And it is well if they make this good use of it, to take warning by it not to be secure, but to stand in awe of God and his judgments. The sudden fall of a great tower shakes the ground round about it. Thus all the islands in the Mediterranean Sea shall feel themselves sensibly touched by the destruction of Tyre, it being a place they had so much knowledge of, such interests in, and such a constant correspondence with. 2. The princes of the sea shall be affected with it, who ruled in those islands; or the rich merchants who live like princes, Isa. xxiii. 8, and the masters of ships who command like princes, these shall condole the fall of Tyre in a most compassionate and pathetical manner; ver. 16, "They shall come down from their thrones," as neglecting the business of their thrones, and despising the pomp of them; they shall lay away their robes of state, their broidered garments, and shall clothe themselves all over with tremblings, with sackcloth that will make them shiver. Or, they shall by their own act and deed make themselves to tremble upon this occasion. They shall sit upon the ground in shame and sorrow; they shall tremble every moment at the thought of what is happened to Tyre, and for fear of what may happen to themselves; for what island is safe if Tyre be not? "They shall take up a lamentation for thee," shall have elegies and mournful poems penned upon the fall of Tyre; ver. 17, "How art thou destroyed!" 1st. It shall be a great surprise to them, and they shall be affected with wonder, that a place so well fortified by nature and art, so famed for politics, and so full of money, which is the sinews of war, and that held out so long and with so much bravery, should be taken at last; ver. 21, "I made thee a terror." Note, Those who make themselves a terror to their neighbours by the abuse of their power, it is just with God to make them a terror to their neighbours by the suddenness and strangeness of their punishment. Tyre had caused her terror, ver. 17, and now is made a terrible example. 2nd. It shall be a great affliction to them, and they shall be affected with sorrow; ver. 17, "They shall take up a lamentation for Tyre," as thinking it a thousand pities that such a rich and splendid city should be thus laid in ruins. When Jerusalem, the holy city, was destroyed, there was no such lamentation for it, it was nothing to them that passed by, Lam. i. 12; but when Tyre the trading city fell it was universally bemoaned. Note, Those who have the world in their hearts lament the loss of great men more than the loss of good men. 3rd. It shall be a loud alarm to them. "They shall tremble in the day of thy fall," because they shall have reason to think that their own turn will be next. If Tyre fall, who can stand? "Howl, fir-trees, if such a cedar be shaken." Note, The fall of others should awaken us out of our security. Others' death and decay in the world is a check to us when we dream that our mountain stands strong, and shall not be moved.

Fifthly. See how the irreparable ruin of Tyre is aggravated by the prospect of the restoration of Israel. Thus shall Tyre sink, "when I shall set glory in the land of the living," ver. 20. Note, 1. The holy land is the land of the living, for none but holy souls are properly living souls. Where living sacrifices are offered to the living God, and where the lively oracles are, there the land of the living is; there David hoped to see the goodness of the Lord, Ps. xxvii. 13. That was a type of heaven, which is indeed the land of the living. 2. Though this land of the living may for a time lie under disgrace, yet God will again set glory in it; the glory that is departed shall return, and the restoration of what they have been deprived of shall be so much the more their glory. God will himself be the glory of the lands that are the lands of the living. 3. It will aggravate the misery of those that have their portion in the land of the dying, of those that are for ever dying, to behold the happiness of those, at the same time, that shall have their everlasting portion in the land of the living. When the rich man was himself in torment, he saw Lazarus in the bosom of Abraham, and glory set for him in the land of the living.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Still we are attending the funeral of Tyre, and the lamentations made for the fall of that renowned city. In this chapter we have, I. A large account of the dignity, wealth and splendour of Tyre, while it was in its strength, the vast trade it drove, and the interest it had among the nations, ver. 1—25, which is designed to make its ruin the more lamentable. II. A prediction of its fall and ruin, and the confusion and consternation which all its neighbours shall thereby be put into, ver. 26—36. And this is intended to stain the pride of all worldly glory; and, by setting the one over against the other, to let us see the vanity and uncertainty of the riches, honours and pleasures of the world, and what little reason we have to place our happiness in them, or to be confident of the continuance of them; so that all this is written for our learning.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Now, thou son of man, take up a lamentation for Tyrus;

3 And say unto Tyrus,
O thou that art situate at the entry of the sea,
Which art a merchant of the people for many isles,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
O Tyrus, thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty.
4 Thy borders are in the midst of the seas,
Thy builders have perfected thy beauty.
5 They have made all thy ship boards of fir trees of Senir:

They have taken cedars from Lebanon to make masts for thee.
6 Of the oaks of Bashan have they made thine oars;
The company of the Ashurites have made thy benches of Brought out of the isles of Chittim. [ivory,

Blue and purple from the isles of Elishah
Was that which covered thee.
8 The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy mariners:
Thy wise men, O Tyrus, that were in thee, were thy pilots.
9 The ancients of Gebal and the wise men thereof were in thee thy calkers:
All the ships of the sea with their mariners were in thee to occupy thy merchandise.

And the Gammadims were in thy towers:
They hanged their shields upon thy walls round about;
They have made thy beauty perfect.
12 Tarshish was thy merchant by reason of the multitude of all kind of riches;
With silver, iron, tin, and lead, they traded in thy fairs.
13 Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, they were thy merchants:
They traded the persons of men and vessels of brass in thy market.
14 They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs
With horses and horsemen and mules.
15 The men of Dedan were thy merchants;
Many isles were the merchandise of thine hand:
They brought thee for a present horns of ivory and ebony.
16 Syria was thy merchant by reason of the multitude of the wares of thy making:
They occupied in thy fairs with emeralds, purple, and broidered work,
And fine linen, and coral, and agate.
17 Judah, and the land of Israel, they were thy merchants:
They traded in thy market wheat of Minnith, and Pannag,
And honey, and oil, and balm.
18 Damascus was thy merchant in the multitude of the wares of thy making,
For the multitude of all riches;
In the wine of Helbon, and white wool.
19 Dan also and Javan going to and fro occupied in thy fairs:
Bright iron, cassia, and calamus, were in thy market.
20 Dedan was thy merchant in precious clothes for chariots.

Among thy merchandise.
25 The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market:
And thou wast replenished,
And made very glorious in the midst of the seas.

Here, First. The prophet is ordered to take up a lamentation for Tyrus, ver. 2. It was yet in the height of its prosperity, and there appeared not the least symptom of its decay, yet the prophet must lament it, because its prosperity is its snare, is the cause of its pride and security, which will make its fall the more grievous. Even those that live at ease are to be lamented if they were not preparing for trouble. He must lament it, because its ruin is hastening on apace; it is sure, it is near; and though the prophet foretell it, and justify God in it, yet he must lament it. Note, We ought to mourn for the miseries of other nations as well as for our own, out of an affection for mankind in general. It is a part of the honour we owe to all men to bewail their calamities, even those which they have brought upon themselves by their own folly.

Secondly. He is directed what to say, and to say it in the name of the Lord Jehovah, a name not unknown in Tyre, and which shall be better known, ch. xxvi. 6.

1. He must upbraid Tyre with her pride. "O Tyrus, thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty," ver. 3, of universal beauty, so the word is; every way accomplished, and therefore every where admired. Zion, that had the beauty of holiness, is called indeed the perfection of beauty, Ps. l. 2; that is, the beauty of the Lord. But Tyre, because well built, and well filled with money and trade, will set up for a perfect beauty. Note, It is the folly of the children of this world to value themselves by the pomp and pleasure they live in, and to call themselves beauties for the sake of them; and if in these they excel others to think themselves perfect. But God takes notice of the vain conceits men have of themselves in their prosperity, when the mind is lifted up with the condition, and often, for the humbling of the spirit, finds ways to bring down the estate. Let none reckon themselves beautified any farther than they are sanctified, nor say they are of perfect beauty till they come to heaven.

2. He must upbraid Tyre with her prosperity, which was the matter of her pride. In elegies it is usual to insert encomiums of those whose fall we lament. The prophet accordingly praiseth Tyre for that she had that was praiseworthy. He has nothing to say for her religion, her piety, her charity, her being a refuge to the distressed, or using her interest to do good offices among her neighbours; but she lived great, and had a great trade, and all the trading part of mankind made court to her. The prophet must describe her height and magnificence, that God may be the more glorified in her fall, as the God who "looks upon every one that is proud, and abaseth them; hides them in the dust together, and binds their faces in secret," Job xl. 12.

1st. The city of Tyre was advantageously situated "at the entry of the sea," ver. 3, having many commodious harbours each way; not as cities seated on rivers, which the shipping can come but one way to. It stood at the east end of the Mediterranean, very convenient for trade by land into all the Levant parts, so that she became a "merchant of the people for many isles." Lying between Greece and Asia, it became the great emporium or mart town, the rendezvous of merchants from all parts. "Thy borders are in the heart of the seas," ver. 4. It was surrounded by water, which was a great advantage to its trade. The darling of the sea laid in its bosom, in its heart. Note, It is a great convenience upon many accounts to live in an island. Seas are the most ancient landmark, not which our fathers have set us, but the God of our fathers, and which cannot be removed as other landmarks may, nor so easily got over. The people so situated may the easier dwell alone, if they please, as not reckoned among the nations; and yet, if they please, may the easier traffic abroad, and keep a correspondence with the nations. We, therefore, of this island must own that he who determines the bounds of men's habitations has determined well for us.

2nd. It was curiously built, according as the fashion then was; and being a city on a hill it made a glorious show, and tempted the ships that sailed by into her ports; ver. 4, "Thy builders have perfected thy beauty." They have so improved in architecture that nothing appears in the buildings of Tyre that can be found fault with; and yet it wants that perfection of beauty into which the Lord doth and will build up his Jerusalem.

3rd. It had its haven replenished with abundance of gallant ships, Isa. xxxiii. 21. The ship carpenters did their part, as well as the house carpenters theirs. The Tyrians are thought to be the first that invented the art of navigation; however, they improved it, and brought it to as great perfection perhaps as it could be without the loadstone. First. They made the boards, or planks, for the hulk of the ship, of fir-trees fetched from Senir, a mount in the land of Israel, joined with Hermon. Cant. iv. 8. Planks of fir were smooth and light, but not so lasting as our English oak. Secondly. They had cedars from Lebanon, another mountain of Israel, for their masts, ver. 5. Thirdly. They had oaks from Bashan, Isa. ii. 13, to make oars of; for it is probable their ships were mostly galleys, that go with oars. The people of Israel built few ships for themselves, but they furnished the Tyrians with timber for shipping. Thus one country useth what another produceth, and so they are serviceable one to another, and cannot say to each other, "I have no need of thee." Fourthly. Such magnificence did they affect in building their ships, that they made the very benches of ivory, which they fetched from the isles of Chittim, from Italy, or Greece, and had workmen from the Ashurites, or Assyrians, to make them,—so rich would they have their state-rooms in their ships to be. Fifthly. So very prodigal were they, that they made their sails of fine linen fetched from Egypt, and that embroidered too, ver. 7. Or it may be meant of their flags, which they hoisted to notify what city they belonged to, which were very costly. The word signifies a banner as well as a sail. Sixthly. They hung those rooms on shipboard with blue and purple, the richest cloths and richest colours they could get from the isles they traded with; for, though Tyre was itself famous for purple, which is therefore called the Tyrian dye, yet they must have that which was far fetched.

4th. These gallant ships were well manned by men of great ingenuity and industry. The pilots and masters of the ships that had command in their fleets were of their own city, such as they could put a confidence in; ver. 8, "Thy wise men, O Tyrus, that were in thee, were thy pilots." But, for common sailors, they had them from other countries; "The inhabitants of Arvad and Sidon were their mariners." These came from cities near them. Sidon was sister of Tyre, not two leagues off, to the northward; there they bred able seamen, which it is the interest of the maritime powers to support and give all the countenance they can to. They sent to Gebal in Syria for calkers or strengtheners of the clefts or chinks, to stop them when the ships came home after long voyages to be repaired. To do this they had the ancients and wise men, ver. 9; for there is more need of wisdom and prudence to repair what is gone to decay than to build anew. In public matters there is occasion for the ancients and wise men to be "the repairers of the breaches, and the restorers of paths to dwell in." Nay, all the countries they traded with were at their service, and were willing to send men into their pay, or to set their youth apprentices in Tyre, or put them on board their fleets; so that "all the ships in the sea with their mariners were" ready "to occupy thy merchandise." Those that give good wages shall have hands at command.

5th. Their city was guarded by a military force that was very considerable, ver. 10, 11. The Tyrians were themselves wholly given to trade; but it was necessary they should have a good army on foot, and therefore they took those of other states into their pay, such as were fittest for service, though they had them from afar, (which perhaps was their policy,) from Persia, Lud, and Phut. These bore their arms when there was occasion, and in time of peace "hanged up the shield and buckler" in the armoury, as it were to proclaim peace, and let the world know that they had at present no need of them, but that they were ready to be taken down whenever there was occasion for them. Their walls were guarded by the men of Arvad, their towers were garrisoned by the Gammadims, robust men that had a great deal of strength in their arms; yet the Vulgar Latin renders it, pigmies, ten no longer than one's arm. They "hung their shields upon the walls," in their magazines, or places of arms; or hung them out upon the walls of the city, that none might dare to approach them, seeing how well provided they were with all things necessary for their own defence. Thus "they set forth thy comeliness," ver. 10, and "made thy beauty perfect," ver. 11. It contributed as much as any thing to the glory of Tyre that it had those of all nations about in its service, except of the land of Israel, though it lay next them, which furnished them with timber, but we do not find it furnished them with men; that would have trenched upon the liberty and dignity of the Jewish nation, 2 Chr. ii. 17, 18. Also that it had such a militia, so fit for service, and in constant pay; and such an armoury, like that in the tower of David, where hung the shields of mighty men, Cant. iv. 4. It is observable that there and here the armouries are said to be furnished with shields and helmets, defensive arms, not with swords and spears, offensive, though it is probable there were such, to intimate that the military force of a people must be intended only for their own protection, and not to invade and annoy their neighbours; to secure their own right, not to encroach upon the rights of others.

6th. They had a vast trade, and a correspondence with all parts of the known world. Some nations they dealt with in one commodity, and some in another, according as either its products or manufactures were, and the fruits of nature or art were with which it was blessed. This is very much enlarged upon here, as that which was the principal glory of Tyre, and that which supported all the rest. We do not find anywhere in Scripture so many nations named together as are here; so that this chapter, some think, gives much light to the first account we have of the settlement of the nations after the flood, Gen. x. The critics have abundance of work here to find out the several places and nations spoken of; and concerning many of them their conjectures are different, and they leave us in the dark, and at much uncertainty. It is well it is not material; modern surveys come short of explaining the ancient geography, and therefore we will not amuse ourselves here with a particular inquiry, either concerning the traders or the goods they traded in; we leave it to the critical expositor, and observe that only which is improvable.

First. We have reason to think that Ezekiel knew little of his own knowledge concerning the trade of Tyre. He was a priest, carried away captive far enough from the neighbourhood of Tyre, we may suppose when he was young, (there he had been eleven years;) and yet he speaks of the particular merchandises of Tyre as nicely as if he had been comptroller of the custom-house there, by which it appears that he was Divinely inspired in what he spoke and wrote. It is God that saith this, ver. 3.

Secondly. This account of the trade of Tyre intimates to us that God's eye is upon men, and he takes cognizance of what they do when they are employed in their worldly business; not only when they are at church praying and hearing, but when they are in the markets and fairs, and upon the exchange, buying and selling, which is a good reason why we should in all our dealings keep a conscience void of offence, and have our eye always upon him whose eye is always upon us.

Thirdly. We may here observe the wisdom of God, and his goodness, as the common Father of mankind, in making one country to abound in one commodity and another in another, and all more or less serviceable either to the necessity or to the comfort and ornament of human life; non omnis fert omnia tellus,—'one land does not supply all the varieties of produce.' Providence dispenseth its gifts variously, some to each, and all to none, that there may be a mutual commerce among those whom God has made of one blood, though they are made to dwell on all the face of the earth, Acts xvii. 21. Let every nation therefore thank God for the product of its country; though they be not so rich as those of others, yet there is use for them in the public service of the world.

Fourthly. See what a blessing trade and merchandise is to mankind, especially when it followed in the fear of God, and with a regard not only to private advantage but to a common benefit. "The earth is full of God's riches," Ps. civ. 24. There is a "multitude of all kind of riches" in it, as it is here, ver. 12, gathered off its surface, and digged out of its bowels. The earth is also full of the fruits of men's ingenuity and industry, according as their genius leads them. Now by exchange and barter these are made more extensively useful. Thus what can be spared is helped off, and what is wanted is fetched in in lieu of it from the most distant countries. Those that are not tradesmen themselves yet have reason to thank God for tradesmen and merchants, by whom the products of other countries are brought to our hands, as those of our own are by our husbandmen.

Fifthly. Besides the necessaries that are here traded in, see what abundance of things are here mentioned that only serve to please fancy, and are valuable only by men's humour and custom; and yet God allows us to use them, and trade in them, and part with those things for them which we can spare that are of an intrinsic worth much beyond them Here are "horns of ivory and ebony," ver. 15, that are "brought for a present," that is, exposed to sale, and offered in exchange; or, as some think, presented to the city, or the great men of it, to obtain their favour. Here are "emeralds, coral, and agate," ver. 16; "all precious stones and gold," ver. 22; which the world could better be without than iron and common stones. Here are, to please the taste and smell, the "chief of all spices," ver. 22; "cassia and calamus," ver. 19; and for ornament, "purple, broidered work, and fine linen," ver. 16; "precious clothes for chariots," ver. 20; "blue clothes," (which Tyre was famous for,) broidered work, and "chests of rich apparel, bound with rich cords, and made of cedar," a sweet wood, to perfume the garments kept in them, ver. 24. Upon the review of this invoice, or bill of parcels, we may justly say, What a great many things are here that we have no need of, and can live very comfortably without!

Sixthly. It is observable that Judah and the land of Israel were merchants in Tyre too. In a way of trade they were allowed converse with the heathen; but they traded mostly in wheat, a substantial commodity, and necessary, "wheat of Minnith and Pannag," two countries in Canaan famous for the best wheat, as some think. The whole land indeed was a land of wheat, Deu. viii. 8; it had "the fat of kidneys of wheat," Deu. xxxiv. 14. Tyre was maintained by corn fetched from the land of Israel. They traded likewise in honey, and oil, and balm, or resin, all useful things, and not serving to pride or luxury; and the land which these were the staple commodities of was that which was "the glory of all lands," which God reserved for his peculiar people, not those that traded in "spices and precious stones;" and the Israel of God must reckon themselves well provided for if they have food convenient, for they that are acquainted with the delights of the children of God will not set their hearts on "the delights of the sons and daughters of men, or the treasures of kings and princes." We find indeed in the New Testament that Babylon trades in such things as Tyre traded in, Rev. xviii. 12, 13; for, notwithstanding its pretensions to sanctity, it is a mere worldly interest.

Seventhly. Though Tyre was a city of great merchandise, and they got abundance by buying and selling, importing commodities from one place, and exporting them to another, yet manufacture-trades were not neglected. The "wares of their own making," and a multitude of such wares, are here spoken of, ver. 16; and again, ver. 18. It is the wisdom of a nation to encourage art and industry, and not to bear hard upon the handicraft tradesmen; for it contributes much to the wealth and honour of a nation to send abroad wares of their own making, which may bring them in the multitude of all riches.

Eighthly. All this made Tyrus very great, and very proud. "The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market," ver. 25; that is, thou wast admired and cried up by all the nations that had dealings with thee; for "thou wast replenished" in wealth and number of people, wast beautified "and made very glorious in the midst of the seas." Those that grow very rich are cried up as very glorious, for riches are glorious things in the eyes of carnal people, Gen. xxxi. 1.

26 Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters:
The east wind hath broken thee in the midst of the seas.
27 Thy riches, and thy fairs,
Thy merchandise, thy mariners, and thy pilots,
Thy calkers, and the occupiers of thy merchandise,
And all thy men of war, that are in thee,
And in all thy company which is in the midst of thee,
Shall fall into the midst of the seas in the day of thy [ruin.
28 The suburbs shall shake
At the sound of the cry of thy pilots.
29 And all that handle the oar,
The mariners, and all the pilots of the sea,
Shall come down from their ships,
They shall stand upon the land;
30 And shall cause their voice to be heard against thee,
And shall cry bitterly,
And shall cast up dust upon their heads,
They shall wallow themselves in the ashes:
31 And they shall make themselves utterly bald for thee,
And gird them with sackcloth,
And they shall weep for thee with bitterness of heart and bitter wailing.
32 And in their wailing they shall take up a lamentation for [thee,
And lament over thee, saying,
What city is like Tyrus,
Like the destroyed in the midst of the sea?
33 When thy wares went forth out of the seas,
Thou filledst many people;
Thou didst enrich the kings of the earth
With the multitude of thy riches and of thy merchandise.
34 In the time when thou shalt be broken
By the seas in the depths of the waters
Thy merchandise and all thy company in the midst of thee shall fall.
35 All the inhabitants of the isles shall be astonished at [thee,
And their kings shall be sore afraid,
They shall be troubled in their countenance.
36 The merchants among the people shall hiss at thee;
Thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt be any more.

We have seen Tyre flourishing, here we have Tyre falling, and great is the fall of it; so much the greater for its having made such a figure in the world. Note, The most mighty and magnificent kingdoms and states, sooner or later, have their day to come down; they have their period, and when they are in their zenith they will begin to decline; but the destruction of Tyre was sudden. Her sun went down at noon; and all her wealth and grandeur, pomp and power, did but aggravate her ruin, and make it the more grievous to herself, and astonishing to all about her. Now observe here,

First. How the ruin of Tyrus will be brought about, ver. 26. She is as a great ship richly laden, that is split or sunk by the indiscretion of her steersmen. "Thy rowers have" themselves "brought thee into great" and dangerous "waters." The governors of the city, and those that had the management of their public affairs, by some mismanagement or other involved them in that war with the Chaldeans which was the ruin of their state. By their insolence, by some affront given to the Chaldeans, or some attempt made upon them in confidence of their own ability to contend with them, they provoked Nebuchadnezzar to make a descent upon them; and by their obstinacy in standing out to the last enraged him to that degree, that he determined the ruin of their state, and "like an east wind broke them in the midst of the seas." Note, It is ill with a people when those that sit at the stern, instead of putting them into the harbour, run them aground.

Secondly. How great and general the ruin will be. All her wealth shall be buried with her, "her riches, her fairs and her merchandise," ver. 27; all that had any dependence upon her, and dealings with her, in trade, in war, in conversation, they shall all "fall with her into the midst of the seas in the day of her ruin." Note, Those who make creatures their confidence, place their happiness in their interest in them, and rest their hopes upon them, will of course fall with them. "Happy" therefore "are they that have the God of Jacob for their help, and whose hope is in the Lord their God," who lives for ever.

Thirdly. What sad lamentation would be made for the destruction of Tyre. The pilots, her princes and governors, when they see how ill they have played their cards, and how much they have contributed to their ruin, shall cry out so loud as to make even the suburbs shake, ver. 28; such a vexation shall it be to them to reflect upon their own ill conduct. The inferior officers, that were as the mariners of the state, shall be forced to come down from their respective posts, ver. 29; and they shall "cry out against thee," as having deceived them, in not proving so well able to hold out as they thought thou hadst been; they shall "cry bitterly" for the common ruin, and their own share in it. They shall use all the most solemn expressions of grief; they shall "cast dust on their heads," in indignation of themselves, shall "wallow themselves in ashes," as having bid a final farewell to all ease and pleasure; they shall 'make themselves bald," ver. 31, with "tearing their hair;" and, according to the custom of great mourners, they shall "gird themselves with sackcloth" who used to wear fine linen, and instead of merry songs they shall "weep with bitterness of heart." Note, Losses and crosses are very grievous and hard to be borne to those that have long been wallowing in pleasure and sleeping in carnal security.

Fourthly. How Tyre should be upbraided with her former honour and prosperity, ver. 32, 33. She that was Tyrus the renowned shall now be called Tyrus the destroyed in the midst of the sea. "What city is like Tyre?" Did ever any city come down from such a height of prosperity to such a depth of adversity? Time was when "thy wares," those of thine own making, and those that passed through thy hands, "went forth out of the seas," and were exported to all parts of the world; then "thou filledst many people, and didst enrich the kings of the earth," and their kingdoms. The Tyrians, though they bare such a sway in trade, yet it seems were fair merchants, and let their neighbours not only live, but thrive by them. All that dealt with them were gainers, they did not cheat or oppress the people, but did enrich them with "the multitude of their merchandise;" but now they that used to be enriched by thee shall be ruined with thee, as is usual in trade; ver. 34, "When thou shalt be broken," and all thou hast is seized on, "all thy company shall fall too." There is an end of Tyre, that made such a noise and bustle in the world; this great blaze goes out in a snuff.

Fifthly. How the fall of Tyre should be a matter of terror to some, and laughter to others, according as they were differently interested and affected. Some shall be sore afraid, and shall be troubled, ver. 35, concluding it will be their own turn to fall next; others shall hiss at her, ver. 36, shall ridicule her pride and vanity, and ill conduct, and think her ruin just. She triumphed in Jerusalem's fall, and there are those that will triumph in hers. When God casts his judgments on the sinner, "men also shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place," Job xxvii. 22, 23; "Is this the city which men call the perfection of beauty."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. A prediction of the fall and ruin of the king of Tyre, who in the destruction of that city is particularly set up as a mark for God's arrows, ver. 1—10. II. A lamentation for the king of Tyre, when he is thus fallen, though he falls by his own iniquity, ver. 11—19. III. A prophecy of the destruction of Zidon, which was in the neighbourhood of Tyre, and had a dependence upon it, ver. 20—23. IV. A promise of the restoration of the Israel of God, though in the day of their calamity they were insulted over by their neighbours, ver. 24—26.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thine heart is lifted up, and thou hast said,
I am a God,
I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas;
Yet thou art a man, and not God,
Though thou set thine heart as the heart of God:
3 Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel;
There is no secret that they can hide from thee:
4 With thy wisdom and with thine understanding thou hast gotten thee riches,
And hast gotten gold and silver into thy treasures:
5 By thy great wisdom and by thy traffick hast thou increased thy riches,
And thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches:
6 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God;
7 Behold, therefore I will bring strangers upon thee,
The terrible of the nations:
And they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom,
And they shall defile thy brightness.
8 They shall bring thee down to the pit,
And thou shalt die the deaths of them
That are slain in the midst of the seas.
9 Wilt thou yet say before him that slayeth thee, I am [God?
But thou shalt be a man, and no God,
In the hand of him that slayeth thee.
10 Thou shalt die the deaths of the uncircumcised by the hand of strangers:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.

We have done with Tyrus in the foregoing chapter, but now the prince of Tyrus is to be singled out from the rest. Here is something to be said to him by himself, a message to him from God, which the prophet must send him, whether he will hear or whether he will forbear.

First. He must tell him of his pride. His people were proud, ch. xxvii. 3, and so is he; and they shall both be made to know that God resists the proud. Let us see,

1. What were the expressions of his pride. "His heart was lifted up," ver. 2. He had a great conceit of himself, was blown up with an opinion of his own sufficiency, and looked with disdain upon all about him; and out of the abundance of the pride of his heart he said, "I am a god." He did not only say it in his heart, but had the impudence to speak it out. God has said of princes,

They are gods, Ps. lxxxii. 7. But it doth not become them to say so of themselves; it is a high affront to him who is God alone, and will not give his glory to another. He thought the city of Tyre had as necessary a dependence upon him as the world has upon the God that made it, and that he was himself independent as God, and unaccountable to any. He thought himself to have as much wisdom and strength as God himself, and as incontestable authority, and that his prerogatives were as absolute, and his word as much a law as the word of God. He challenged Divine honours, and expected to be praised and admired as a god, and doubted not to be deified among other heroes after his death, as a great benefactor to the world. Thus the king of Babylon said, "I will be like the Most High," Isa. xiv. 14, not like the Most Holy. "I am the strong God," and therefore will not be contradicted, because I cannot be controlled. "I sit in the seat of God." I sit as high as God, my throne equal with his; divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet,—'Cæsar divides dominion with Jove.' I sit as safe as God, as safe in the heart of the seas, and as far out of the reach of danger, as he in the height of heaven. He thinks his guards of men of war about his throne as pompous and potent as the hosts of angels that are about the throne of God. He is put in mind of his meanness and mortality; and since he needs to be told, he shall be told that self-evident truth, "Thou art a man, and not God," a depending creature, a dying creature; thou art flesh, and not spirit, Isa. xxxi. 3. Note, Men must be made to know they are but men, Ps. ix. 20. The greatest wits, the greatest potentates, the greatest saints, are men and not gods; Jesus Christ was both God and man. The king of Tyre, though he has such a mighty influence upon all about him, and with the help of his riches bears a mighty sway, though he has tribute and presents brought to his court with as much devotion as if they were sacrifices to his altar, though he is flattered by his courtiers, and made a god of by his poets, yet after all he is but a man; he knows it, he fears it. But "he sets his heart as the heart of God," hast conceited thyself to be a god, hast compared thyself with God, thinking thyself as wise and strong, and as fit to govern the world as he. It was the ruin of our first parents, and ours in them, that they would be as gods, Gen. iii. 5; and still that corrupt nature which inclines men to set up themselves as their own masters to do what they will, and their own carvers to have what they will, their own end to live to themselves, and their own felicity to enjoy themselves, "sets their hearts as the heart of God," invades his prerogatives, and catches at the flowers of his crown—a presumption that cannot go unpunished.

2. We are told what it was that he was proud of.

1st. His wisdom. It is likely this prince of Tyre was a man of very good natural parts, a philosopher, and well read in all the parts of learning that were then in vogue; however, a politician, and had a great dexterity in managing the affairs of the state; and then he thought himself "wiser than Daniel," ver. 3. We found before, that Daniel, though now but a young man, was celebrated for his prevalency in prayer, ch. xiv. 14; here we find he was famous for his prudence in the management of the affairs of this world, a great scholar and statesman, and withal a great saint; and yet not a prince, but a poor captive. It was strange that under such external disadvantages his lustre should shine forth, so as that he was become wise to a proverb. When the king of Tyre dreams himself to be a god he saith he is "wiser than Daniel." "There is no secret that they can hide from thee." Probably he challenged all about him to prove him with questions, as Solomon was proved, and he had unriddled all their enigmas, had solved all their problems, and none of them all could puzzle him. He had perhaps been successful in discovering plots, and diving into the counsels of the neighbouring princes, and therefore thought himself omniscient, and that no thought could be withholden from him; therefore he said, "I am a god." Note, Knowledge puffeth up; it is hard to know much, and not to know it too well, and to be elevated with it. He that was wiser than Daniel was prouder than Lucifer. Those therefore that are knowing must study to be humble, and to evidence that they are so.

2nd. His wealth. That way his wisdom led him; it is not said that by his wisdom he searched into the arcana, either of nature or government, modelled the state better than it was, or made better laws, or had advanced the interests of the commonwealth of learning; but his wisdom and understanding were of use to him in traffic. As some of the kings of Judah loved husbandry, 2 Chr. xxvi. 10; so the king of Tyre loved merchandise, and by it he got riches, increased his riches, and filled his treasures with gold and silver, ver. 4, 5. See what the wisdom of this world is; those are cried up as the wisest men that know how to get money, and by right or wrong to raise estates, and yet really this their way is their folly, Ps. xlix. 13. It was the folly of the king of Tyre, First. That he attributed the increase of his wealth to himself, and not to the providence of God, forgetting him who gave him power to get wealth, Deu. viii. 17, 18. Secondly. That he therefore thought himself a wise man, because he was a rich man; whereas a fool may have an estate, Eccl. ii. 19; yea, and a fool may get an estate, for the world has often been observed to favour such, when bread is not to the wise, Eccl. ix. 11. Thirdly. That his heart was lifted up because of his riches, for the increase of his wealth, that made him so haughty and secure, so insolent and imperious, and that set his heart as the heart of God. The man of sin, when he had a great deal of worldly pomp and power, shewed himself as a god, 2 Thess. ii. 4. Those who are rich in this world have, therefore, need to charge that upon themselves which the word of God charges upon them, "That they be not high-minded," 1 Tim. vi. 17.

Secondly. Since pride goes before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall, he must tell him of that destruction, of that fall, which was now hastening on, as the just punishment of his presumption in setting up himself a rival with God; Because thou hast pretended to be a god, ver. 6, therefore thou shalt not be long a man, ver. 7. Observe here,

1. The instruments of his destruction. "I will bring strangers upon thee," the Chaldeans, whom we do not find mentioned among the many nations and countries that traded with Tyre, ch. xxvii. If any of those nations had been brought against it they would have had some compassion upon it, for old acquaintance sake; but these strangers will have none; they are people of a strange language, which the king of Tyre himself, as wise as he is, perhaps understands not. They are "the terrible of the nations." It was an army made up of many nations, and it was at this day the most formidable, both for strength and fury. These God has at command, and these he will bring upon the king of Tyre.

2. The extremity of the destruction. "They shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom," ver. 7, that is, against all those things which thou gloriest in as thy beauty and the product of thy wisdom. Note, It is just with God that our enemies should make that their prey which we have made our pride. The king of Tyre's palace, his treasury, his city, his navy, his army, these he glories in as his brightness, these he thinks make him illustrious and glorious as a god on earth. But all these the victorious enemy shall defile, shall deface, shall deform; he thought them sacred, things that none durst touch; but the conquerors shall seize them as common things, and spoil the brightness of them. But whatever comes of what he has, surely his person is sacred. No; ver. 8, "They shall bring thee down to the pit," to the grave; thou shalt die the death. And, 1st. It shall not be an honourable death, but an ignominious one; he shall be so vilified in his death that he may despair of being deified after his death. He shall die "the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas," that have no honour done them at their death, but their dead bodies are immediately thrown overboard, without any ceremony as marks of distinction, to be a feast for the fish. Tyre is like to be destroyed in the midst of the sea, ch. xxvii. 32, and the prince of Tyre shall fare no better than the people. 2nd. It shall not be a happy death, but a miserable one. He shall "die the death of the uncircumcised," ver. 10, of those that are strangers to God and not in covenant with him, and therefore die under his wrath and curse. It is deaths, a double death, temporal and eternal, the death both of the body and soul; he shall die the second death—that is dying miserably indeed. The sentence of death here passed upon the king of Tyre is ratified by a Divine authority; "I have spoken it, saith the Lord God." And what he hath said, he will do; none can gainsay it, nor will he unsay it.

3. The effectual disproof that this will be of all his pretensions to deity; ver. 9, When the conqueror sets his sword to thy breast, and thou seest no way of escape, Wilt thou then say, I am God? Wilt thou then have such a conceit of thyself, and such a confidence in thyself, as thou now hast? No, thy being overpowered by death, and by the fear of it, will force thee to own that thou art not a god, but a weak, timorous, trembling, dying man. "In the hand of him that slayeth thee," in the hand of God, and of the instruments he employed, "thou shalt be a man, and not a god," utterly unable to resist and help thyself. "I have said ye are gods, but ye shall die like men," Ps. lxxxii. 6, 7. Note, Those who pretend to be rivals with God shall be forced one way or other to let fall their claims. Death at farthest, when we come into his hand, will make us know that we are men.

11 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

12 Son of man, take up a lamentation upon the king of [Tyrus,
And say unto him, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Thou sealest up the sum,
Full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty.

13 Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God;
Every precious stone was thy covering,
The sardius, topaz, and the diamond,
The beryl, the onyx, and the jasper,
The sapphire, the emerald, and the carbuncle, and gold:
The workmanship of thy tabrets and of thy pipes was prepared in thee
In the day that thou wast created.

14 Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth;
And I have set thee so: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God;
Thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire. [wast created,

15 Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day that thou
Till iniquity was found in thee.

16 By the multitude of thy merchandise
They have filled the midst of thee with violence, and [of God:
thou hast sinned:
Therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain
And I will destroy thee, O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire.

17 Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty,
Thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy bright- [ness:
I will cast thee to the ground,
I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee.

18 Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of [thine iniquities,
By the iniquity of thy traffick;
Therefore will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee,
It shall devour thee, and I will bring thee to ashes upon [the earth
In the sight of all them that behold thee.

19 All they that know thee among the people shall be astonished at thee:
Thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt thou be any more.

As, after the prediction of the ruin of Tyre, ch. xxvi., followed a pathetical lamentation for it, ch. xxvii., so, after the ruin of the king of Tyre is foretold, it is bewailed. 1. This is commonly understood of the present prince of Tyre spoken to, ver. 2. His name was Ethbaal, or Ithobalus, as Diodorus Siculus calls him that was king of Tyre when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed it. He was, it seems, upon all external accounts, an accomplished man, very great and famous, but his iniquity was his ruin. Many expositors have suggested that besides the literal sense of this lamentation there is an allegory in it, and that it is an allusion to the fall of angels that sinned, who undid themselves by their pride. And, as is usual in texts that have a mystical meaning, some passages here refer primarily to the king of Tyre, as that of his merchandises, others to the angels, as that of being in "the holy mountain of God." But if there be any thing mystical in it, as perhaps there may, I shall rather refer it to the fall of Adam, which seems to be glanced at; ver. 13, "Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God," and that "in the day thou wast created." 2. Some think by the king of Tyre is meant the whole royal family, this including also the foregoing kings, and looking as far back as Hiram, king of Tyre. The present governor is called prince, ver. 2, but he that is here lamented is called king. The court of Tyre and its kings had for many ages been famous, but sin ruins it. Now we may observe two things here:

First. What was the renown of the king of Tyre. He is here spoken of as having lived in great splendour, ver. 12—15. He was a man, but it is here owned that he was a very considerable man, and one that made a mighty figure in his day.

1. He far exceeded other men. Hiram and other kings of Tyre had done so in their time; and the present king, perhaps, had not come short of any of them. "Thou sealest up the sum full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty;" both the powers of human nature and the prosperity of human life seemed in him to have been at the highest pitch. He was looked upon to be as wise as the reason of men could make him, and as happy as the wealth of this world and the enjoyment of it could make him; in him you might see the utmost that both could do; and therefore seal up the sum, for nothing can be added. He is a complete man, perfect in suo genere,—'in his kind.'

2. He seemed to be as wise and happy as Adam in innocency; ver. 13, "Thou hast been in Eden," even "in the garden of God." Thou hast lived, as it were, in Paradise all thy days, hast had a full enjoyment of every thing that is good for food or pleasant to the eyes, and an uncontroverted dominion over all about thee, as Adam had. One instance of the magnificence of the king of Tyre is that he outdid all other princes in jewels, which those have the most plenty of that trade most abroad, as he did. Every precious stone was his covering. There is a great variety of precious stones, but he had of every sort and in such plenty, that besides what were treasured up in his cabinet, and were the ornaments of his crown, he had his clothes trimmed with them; they were his covering. Nay, ver. 14, he "walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire," that is, these precious stones, which glittered and sparkled like fire. His rooms were in a manner set round with jewels, so that he walked in the midst of them, and then fancied himself as glorious as if, like God, he had been surrounded by so many angels, who are compared to a flame of fire. And if he be such an admirer of precious stones as to think them as bright as angels, no wonder he is such an admirer of himself as to think himself as great as God. Nine several sorts of precious stones are here named which were all in the high priest's ephod. Perhaps they are particularly named because he in his pride used to speak particularly of them, and tell those about him, with a great deal of foolish pleasure, This is such a precious stone, of such a value, and so and so are its virtues. Thus he is upbraided with his vanity. Gold is mentioned last, as far inferior in value to those precious stones; and he used to speak of it accordingly. Another thing that made him think his palace a paradise was the curious music he had, the tabrets and pipes, hand instruments and wind instruments; the workmanship of these was extraordinary, and they were prepared for him on purpose; prepared in thee—the pronoun is feminine—in thee, O Tyre; or it notes that the king was effeminate, in doting on such things. They were prepared in the day he was created, that is, either born or created king; they were made on purpose to celebrate the joys either of his birthday or his coronation day. These he prided himself much in, and would have all that came to see his palace take notice of them.

3. He looked like an incarnate angel; ver. 14, "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth" or protecteth, that is, he looked upon himself as a guardian angel to his people, so bright, so strong, so faithful; appointed to that office, and qualified for it. Anointed kings should be to their subjects as anointed cherubims that cover them with the wings of their power, and when they are such God will own them; their advancement was from him, "I have set thee so." Some think, because mention was made of Eden, that it refers to the cherub set on the east of Eden to cover it, Gen. iii. 24. He thought himself as able to guard his city from all invaders as that angel was for his charge. Or, it may refer to the cherubim in the most holy place, whose wings covered the ark; he thought himself as bright as one of them.

4. He appeared in as much splendour as the high priest, when he was clothed with his garments for glory and beauty; "Thou wast upon the holy mountain of God," as president of the temple built on that holy mountain. Thou didst look as great, and with as much majesty and authority, as ever the high priest did when he walked in the temple, which was garnished with precious stones, 2 Chr. iii. 6, and had his habit on, which had precious stones both in the breast and on the shoulder—in that he seemed to walk in "the midst of the stones of fire." Thus glorious is the king of Tyre—at least he thinks himself so.

Secondly. Let us now see what was the ruin of the king of Tyre, what it was that stained his glory, and laid all this honour in the dust; ver. 15, "Thou wast perfect in thy ways," that is, thou didst prosper in all thy affairs, and every thing went well with thee; thou hadst not only a clear but a bright reputation "from the day thou wast created," the day of thine accession to the throne, "till iniquity was found in thee," and that spoiled all. This may perhaps allude to the deplorable case of the angels that fell, and of our first parents, both which were perfect in their ways till iniquity was found in them. And when iniquity was once found in him, it increased, and he grew worse and worse, as appears ver. 18, "Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries," that is, thou hast lost the benefit of all that which thou thoughtest sacred, and in which, as in a sanctuary, thou thoughtest to take refuge. These thou hast defiled, and so exposed thyself by the multitude of thine iniquities. Now observe,

1. What the iniquity was that was the ruin of the king of Tyre. 1st. The iniquity of his traffic, so it is called ver. 18, both his and his people's; for their sin is charged upon him because he connived at it, and set them an ill example, ver. 16. By the multitude of thy merchandise they have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thus thou hast sinned. The king had so much to do with his merchandise, and was so wholly intent upon the gains of that, that he took no care to do justice, to right those that suffered wrong, and to protect them from violence. Nay, in the multiplicity of business wrong was done to many by oversight, and in his dealings he made use of his power to invade the rights of those he dealt with. Note, Those that have much to do in the world are in great danger of doing much amiss, and it is hard to deal with many without violence to some. Trades are called mysteries, but too many make them mysteries of iniquity. 2nd. His pride and vainglory; ver. 17, "Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty," thou wast in love with thyself and thy own shadow; and thus "thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of the brightness," and the pomp and splendour wherein thou livedst. He gazed so much upon this that he dazzled his eyes, and made him that he could not see his way. He appeared so puffed up with his greatness, that it both lost him his wisdom and lost him the reputation of it. He really became a fool in glorying. Those make a bad bargain for themselves that part with their wisdom for the gratifying of their gaiety, and to please a vain humour lose a real excellency.

2. What the ruin was that this iniquity brought him to. 1st. He was thrown out of his dignity and dislodged from his palace, which he took to be his paradise and temple; ver. 16, "I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God." His kingly power was high as a mountain, setting him above others; it was a mountain of God, for the powers that be are ordained of God, and have something in them that is sacred. But having abused his power he is reckoned profane, and is therefore deposed and expelled. He disgraceth the crown he wears, and so hath forfeited it, and shall be destroyed "from the midst of the stones of fire," the precious stones with which his palace was garnished, as the temple was, and they shall be no protection to him. 2nd. He was exposed to contempt and disgrace, and trampled upon by his neighbours. "I will cast thee to the ground," ver. 17, will cast thee among the pavement stones, from the midst of the precious stones, and will lay thee a rueful spectacle "before kings, that they may behold thee," and take warning by thee not to be proud and oppressive. 3rd. He is quite consumed, his city, and he in it. "I will bring forth a fire from the midst of thee." The conquerors, when they have plundered the city, will kindle a fire in the heart of it, which shall lay it, and the palace particularly, in ashes. Or, it may be taken more generally for the fire of God's judgments, which will devour both prince and people, and bring all the glory of both "to ashes upon the earth;" and this fire shall be "brought forth from the midst of thee." All God's judgments upon sinners take rise from themselves; they are devoured by a fire of their own kindling. 4th. He was hereby made a terrible example of Divine vengeance. Thus he is reduced in the sight of all them that behold him, ver. 18; they that know him shall be astonished at him, and shall admire how one that stood so high could be brought so low. The king of Tyre's palace, like the temple at Jerusalem, when it is destroyed shall be an astonishment and a hissing, 2 Chr. vii. 20, 21. So fell the king of Tyre.

20 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 21 Son of man, set thy face against Zidon, and prophesy against it, 22 And say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Zidon;
And I will be glorified in the midst of thee:
And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall have executed judgments in her,
And shall be sanctified in her. [streets;

23 For I will send into her pestilence, and blood into her
And the wounded shall be judged in the midst of her
By the sword upon her on every side;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

24 And there shall be no more a pricking brier unto the house of Israel,
Nor any grieving thorn of all that are round about them, that despised them;
And they shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

25 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
When I shall have gathered the house of Israel
From the people among whom they are scattered,
And shall be sanctified in them in the sight of the heathen,
Then shall they dwell in their land that I have given to my servant Jacob.

26 And they shall dwell safely therein,
And shall build houses, and plant vineyards;
Yea, they shall dwell with confidence,
When I have executed judgments
Upon all those that despise them round about them;
And they shall know that I am the LORD their GOD.

God's glory is his great end, both in all the good and in all the evil which proceedeth out of the mouth of the Most High; so we find in these verses.

First. God will be glorified in the destruction of Zidon, a city that lay near to Tyre; was more ancient, but not so considerable, had a dependence upon it, and stood and fell with it. God saith here, "I am against thee, O Zidon, and I will be glorified in the midst of thee," ver. 22. And again, they that would not know by gentler methods shall be made to know that I am the Lord, and I alone, and that I am a just and jealous God, when "I shall have executed judgments in her," destroying judgments; when I shall have done execution according to justice, and according to the sentence passed, and so shall be sanctified in her. The Zidonians, it should seem, were more addicted to idolatry than the Tyrians were, who being men of business, and large conversation, were less under the power of bigotry and superstition. The Zidonians were noted for the worship of Ashtaroth; Solomon introduced it, 1 Kin. xi. 5. Jezebel was daughter to the king of Zidon, who brought the worship of Baal into Israel, 1 Kin. xvi. 31; so that God had been much dishonoured by the Zidonians. Now, saith he, I will be glorified, I will be sanctified. The Zidonians were borderers upon the land of Israel, where God was known, and where they might have got the knowledge of him, and have learned to glorify him; but, instead of that, they seduced Israel to the worship of their idols. Note, When God is sanctified, he is glorified, for his holiness is his glory. And those whom he is not sanctified and glorified by he will be sanctified and glorified upon, by executing judgments upon them, which speak him a just avenger of his own and his people's injured honour.

The judgments that shall be executed upon Zidon are, war and pestilence, two wasting, depopulating judgments, ver. 23. They are God's messengers which he sends on his errands, and they shall accomplish that for which he sends them. Pestilence and blood shall be sent into her streets; there the dead bodies of those shall lie who perished, some by the plague, occasioned perhaps through ill diet when the city was besieged, and some by the sword of the enemy, most likely the Chaldean armies, when the city is taken and all put to the sword. Thus the wounded shall be judged; when they are dying of their wounds they shall judge themselves, and others shall say they justly fall. Or, as some read it, 'they shall be punished by the sword,' that sword which has commission to destroy on every side. It is God which judgeth, and he will overcome.

Nor is it Tyre and Zidon only on which God would execute judgments, but on all those that despised his people Israel, and triumphed in their calamities, ver. 26; for this was now God's controversy with the nations that were round about them, ver. 26. Note, When God's people are under his correcting hand for their faults he takes care, as he did concerning malefactors that were scourged, that they shall not seem vile to those that are about them, and therefore takes it ill of those who despise them, and so help forward the affliction when he is but a little displeased, Zec. i. 15. God regards them even in their low estate, and therefore let not men despise them.

Secondly. God will be glorified in the restoration of his people to their former safety and prosperity. God had been dishonoured by the sins of his people, and their sufferings too had given occasion to the enemy to blaspheme, Isa. lii. 5; but God will now both cure them of their sins and ease them of their troubles, and so will be "sanctified in them in the sight of the heathen;" will recover the honour of his holiness, to the satisfaction of all the world, ver. 25. For,

1. They shall return to the possession of their own land again. I will gather the house of Israel out of their dispersions, in answer to that prayer; Ps. cvi. 47, "Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the heathen." And in pursuance of that promise, Deu. xxx. 4, "Thence will the Lord thy God gather thee;" being gathered, they shall be brought in a body to "dwell in the land that I have given to my servant Jacob." God had an eye to the ancient grant, in bringing them back; for that remained in force, and the discontinuance of the possession was not a defeasance of the right. He that gave it will again give it.

2. They shall enjoy great tranquillity there. When those that had been vexatious to them are taken off they shall live in quietness, there shall be no more "a pricking brier or a grieving thorn," ver. 24. They shall have a happy settlement, for they shall build houses and plant vineyards, and they shall enjoy a happy security and serenity there. They shall dwell safely, shall dwell with confidence, and there shall be none to disquiet them, or make them afraid, ver. 26. This never had a full accomplishment in the body of that people, for after their return out of captivity they were ever and anon molested by some ill neighbour or other. Nor has the gospel church been ever quite free from pricking briers and grieving thorns; yet sometimes the church has rest. Believers always dwell safely under the Divine protection, and may be quiet from the fear of evil. But the full accomplishment of this promise is reserved for the heavenly Canaan, when all the saints shall be gathered together, and every thing that offends shall be removed, and all griefs and fears for ever banished.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Three chapters we had concerning Tyre and its king; next follows four chapters concerning Egypt and its king; this is the first of them. Egypt had formerly been a house of bondage to God's people; of late they had had but too friendly a correspondence with it, and had depended too much upon it; and therefore, whether the prediction reached Egypt or no, it would be of use to Israel, to take them off of their confidence in their alliance with it. The prophesies against Egypt, which are all laid together in these four chapters, were of five several dates: the first in the tenth year of the captivity, ver. 1; the second in the twenty-seventh, ver. 17; the third in the eleventh year and the first month, ch. xxx. 20; the fourth in the eleventh year and third month, ch. xxxi. 1; the fifth in the twelfth year, ch. xxxii. 1, and another the same year, ver. 17. In this chapter we have, I. The destruction of Pharaoh foretold, for his dealing deceitfully with Israel, ver. 1—7. II. The desolation of the land of Egypt foretold, ver. 8—12. III. A promise of the restoration thereof in part after forty years, ver. 13—16. IV. The possession that should be given to Nebuchadnezzar of the land of Egypt, ver. 17—20. V. A promise of mercy to Israel, ver. 21.

IN the tenth year, in the tenth month, in the twelfth day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him, and against all Egypt: 3 Speak, and say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt,
The great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers,
Which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself.

4 But I will put hooks in thy jaws, [scales,
And I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy
And I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers,
And all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales.

5 And I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness,
Thee and all the fish of thy rivers:
Thou shalt fall upon the open fields;
Thou shalt not be brought together, nor gathered:
I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field
And to the fowls of the heaven. [the LORD,

6 And all the inhabitants of Egypt shall know that I am
Because they have been a staff of reed to the house of 7 When they took hold of thee by thy hand, [Israel.

Thou didst break, and rend all their shoulder:
And when they leaned upon thee,
Thou brakest, and madest all their loins to be at a stand.

Here is, First. The date of this prophecy against Egypt. It was in the tenth year of the captivity, and yet it is placed after the prophecy against Tyre, which was delivered in the eleventh year; because, in the accomplishment of the prophecies, the destruction of Tyre happened before the destruction of Egypt; and Nebuchadnezzar's gaining Egypt was the reward of his service against Tyre, and therefore the prophecy against Tyre is put first, that we may the better observe that. But particular notice must be taken of this, that the first prophecy against Egypt was just at the time when the king of Egypt was coming to relieve Jerusalem, and raise the siege, Jer. xxxvii. 5, but did not answer the expectations of the Jews from them. Note, It is good to foresee the failing of all our creature confidences, then when we are most in temptation to depend upon them, that we may cease from man.

Secondly. The scope of this prophecy. It is directed against "Pharaoh king of Egypt, and against all Egypt," ver. 2. The prophecy against Tyre began with the people, and then proceeded against the prince. But this begins with the prince, because it began to have its accomplishment in the insurrections and rebellions of the people against the prince, not long after this.

Thirdly. The prophecy itself. Pharaoh Hophrah (for so was the present Pharaoh surnamed) is here represented by a great dragon, or crocodile that lies "in the midst of his rivers," as leviathan in the waters, to play therein, ver. 3. Nilus, the river of Egypt, was famed for crocodiles. And what is the king of Egypt in God's account but a great dragon, venomous and mischievous. Therefore, saith God, "I am against thee," I am above thee; so it may be read. How high soever the princes and potentates of the earth are, there is a higher than they, Eccl. v. 8; a God above them that can control them. And if they be tyrannical and oppressive, a God is against them that will be free to reckon with them. Observe here,

1. The pride and security of Pharaoh. He "lieth in the midst of his rivers," rolls himself with a great deal of satisfaction in his wealth and pleasures; and he saith, "My river is mine own." He boasts that he is an absolute prince, his subjects are his vassals, Joseph brought them long ago, Gen. xlvii. 23; that he is a sole prince, and has neither partner in the government nor competition for it; that he is out of debt, what he has is his own, and none of his neighbours has any demands upon him; that he is independent, neither tributary nor accountable to any. Note, Worldly, carnal minds please themselves with, and pride themselves in, their property, forgetting that whatever we have we have only the use of it, the property is in God; we ourselves are not our own, but his; our tongues are not our own, Ps. xii. 4. Our river is not our own, for its springs are in God. The most potent prince cannot call what he has his own, for though it be so against all the world, it is not so against God. But Pharaoh's reason for his pretensions is yet more absurd; "My river is mine own," for "I have made it for myself." Here he usurps two of the Divine prerogatives—to be the author and end of his own being and felicity; he only that is the great Creator can say of this world, and of every thing in it, "I have made it for myself." He calls his river his own because he looks not unto the Maker thereof, nor has respect unto him that fashioned it long ago, Isa. xxii. 11. What we have we have received from God, and must use for God; so that we cannot say we made it, much less that we made it for ourselves; and why then do we boast? Note, Self is the great idol that all the world worships, in contempt of God and his sovereignty.

2. The course God will take with this proud man to humble him. He is a great dragon in the waters, and God will accordingly deal with him, ver. 4, 5. 1st. He will draw him out of his rivers; for he has a hook and a cord for this leviathan, with which he can manage him, though none on earth can; Job xli. 1, "I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers," will cast thee out of thy palace, out of thy kingdom, out of all those things in which thou takest such a complacency, and placest such a confidence. Herodotus relates of this Pharaoh, who was now king of Egypt, that he had reigned in great prosperity for twenty-five years, and was so elevated with his successes that he said God himself could not cast him out of his kingdom. But he shall soon be convinced of his mistake, and what he depended on shall be no defence; God can force men out of that in which they are most secure and easy. 2nd. All his fish shall be drawn out with him; his servants, his soldiers, and all that had a dependence on him, as he thought, but really such as he had dependence upon; these shall stick to his scales, adhere to their king, resolving to live and die with him. But, 3rd. The king and his army, the dragon and all the fish that stick to his scales, shall perish together as fish cast upon dry ground, and shall be meat to the beasts and fowls, ver. 5. Now this is supposed to have its accomplishment soon after, when this Pharaoh, in defence of Aricius, king of Libya, who had been expelled his kingdom by the Cyrenians, levied a great army, and went out against the Cyrenians, to re-establish his friend, but was defeated in battle, and all his forces put to flight, which gave such disgust to his kingdom that they rose in rebellion against him. Thus was he left "thrown into the wilderness," he and all the fish of the river with him. Thus issue men's pride, and presumption, and carnal security. Thus men justly lose what they might call their own under God, when they call it their own against him.

3. The ground of the controversy God has with the Egyptians. It is because they have cheated his people; they encouraged them to expect relief and assistance from them when they were in distress, but failed them; ver. 6, 7, "Because they have been a staff of reed to the house of Israel." They pretended to be a staff to them to lean upon, but when any stress was laid upon them they were either weak and could not, or treacherous and would not, do that for them that was expected. They broke under them, to their great disappointment and amazement; so that they rent their shoulder, and "madest all their loins to be at a stand." The king of Egypt, it is probable, had encouraged Zedekiah to break his league with the king of Babylon, with a promise that he would stand by him, which, when he failed to do to any purpose, it could not but put them into a great consternation. God had told them long since that the Egyptians were broken reeds, Isa. xx. 6, 7. Rabshakeh had told them so, Isa. xxxvi. 6; and now they found it so. It was indeed the folly of Israel to trust them, and they were well enough served when they were deceived in them; God was righteous in suffering them to be so. But that is no excuse at all for the Egyptians' falsehood and treachery; nor shall it secure them from the judgments of that God who is and will be the avenger of all such wrongs. It is a great sin, and very provoking to God, as well as unjust, ungrateful, and very dishonourable and unkind, to put a cheat upon those that put a confidence in us.

8 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will bring a sword upon thee,
And cut off man and beast out of thee.

9 And the land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste;
And they shall know that I am the LORD: [it.
Because he hath said, The river is mine, and I have made

10 Behold, therefore I am against thee, and against thy rivers, [desolate,
And I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste and
From the tower of Syene even unto the border of Ethiopia.

11 No foot of man shall pass through it,
Nor foot of beast shall pass through it,
Neither shall it be inhabited forty years.

12 And I will make the land of Egypt desolate
In the midst of the countries that are desolate,
And her cities among the cities that are laid waste shall be desolate forty years:
And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations,
And will disperse them through the countries.
13 Yet thus saith the Lord GOD;
At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians
From the people whither they were scattered:
14 And I will bring again the captivity of Egypt,
And will cause them to return into the land of Pathros,
Into the land of their habitation;
And they shall be there a base kingdom.
15 It shall be the basest of the kingdoms;
Neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations:
For I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations. [Israel, 16 And it shall be no more the confidence of the house of
Which bringeth their iniquity to remembrance,
When they shall look after them:
But they shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

CATARACTS OF THE NILE—THE BOUNDARY OF EGYPT.—ver. 10.

This explains the foregoing prediction, which was figurative, and looks something farther. Here is a prophecy,

First. Of the ruin of Egypt. The threatening of this is very full and particular, and the sin for which this ruin shall be brought upon them is their pride; ver. 9, they said, "The river is mine, and I have made it," therefore their land shall spew them out. 1. God is against them, both against the king and against the people; "against thee, and against thy rivers." Waters signify people and multitude, Rev. xvii. 15. 2. Multitudes of them shall be cut off by the sword of war—a sword which God will bring upon them, to destroy both man and beast, the sword of a civil war. 3. The country shall be depopulated. "The land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste," ver. 9; the country not cultivated, the cities not inhabited; the wealth of both was their pride, and that God will take away. It shall be "utterly waste;" 'wastes of waste,' so the margin reads it, "and desolate," ver. 10; neither men nor beasts shall pass through it, nor shall it be inhabited, ver. 11; it shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are so, ver. 12. This was the effect not so much of those wars spoken of before, which were made by them, but of the war which the king of Babylon made upon them. It shall be desolate from one end of the land to the other, "from the tower of Syene even to the borders of Ethiopia." The sin of pride is enough to ruin a whole nation. 4. The people shall be dispersed and scattered among the nations, ver. 12; so that they who thought the balance of power was in their hand shall now become a contemptible people. Such a fall doth a haughty spirit go before.

Secondly. Of the restoration of Egypt after awhile, ver. 13. Egypt shall lie desolate forty years, ver. 12, and then "I will bring again the captivity of Egypt," ver. 14. Some date the forty years from Nebuchadnezzar's destroying Egypt, others from the desolation of Egypt some time before; however, they end about the first year of Cyrus, when the seventy years' captivity of Judah ended, or soon after; then this prediction was accomplished. 1. That God will gather the Egyptians out of all the countries into which they were dispersed, and make them to return to "the land of their habitation," and give them a settlement there again, ver. 14. Note, Though God will find out a way to humble the proud, yet he will not contend for ever; no, not with them in this world. 2. That yet they shall not make a figure again as they have done. Egypt shall be a kingdom again, but it shall be the "basest of the kingdoms," ver. 15; it shall have but little wealth and power, and shall not extend its conquests as formerly; shall be the tail of the nations, and not the head. It is a mercy that it shall become a kingdom again, but to humble it, it shall be a despicable kingdom; it shall be a long time before it recover any thing like its ancient lustre. For two reasons it shall be thus mortified. 1st. That it may not domineer over its neighbours, that it may not "exalt itself above the nations," nor "rule over the nations," as it has done, but that it may know what it is to be low and despised. Note, Those who abuse their power will justly be stripped of it, and God, as King of nations, will find out a way to maintain the injured rights and liberties, not only of his own, but other nations. 2nd. That it may not deceive the people of God; ver. 16, "It shall no more be the confidence of the house of Israel." They shall no more be in temptation to trust in it, as they have done, which is a sin that brings their iniquity to remembrance; that is, provokes God to punish them, not for that only, but for all their other sins. Or, it puts them in mind of their idolatries to return to them, when they look to the idolaters, to repose a confidence in them. Note, The creatures we confide in are oftentimes therefore ruined, because there is no other way effectually to cure us of our confidence in them. Rather than Israel shall be ensnared again, the whole land of Egypt shall be laid waste. He that once gave Egypt for their ransom, Isa. xliii. 3, will now give Egypt for their cure; and it shall be destroyed rather than Israel shall not in this particular be reformed. God doth not only in justice, but in wisdom and goodness to us, break those creature stays we stay too much upon, and makes them to be no more, that they may be no more our confidence.

17 And it came to pass in the seven and twentieth year, in the first month, in the first day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

18 Son of man, Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon caused his army
To serve a great service against Tyrus:
Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled:
Yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyrus,
For the service that he had served against it:
19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will give the land of Egypt
Unto Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon;
And he shall take her multitude,
And take her spoil, and take her prey;
And it shall be the wages for his army.
20 I have given him the land of Egypt
For his labour wherewith he served against it,
Because they wrought for me, saith the Lord GOD.
21 In that day will I cause the horn of the house of Israel to bud forth,
And I will give thee the opening of the mouth in the midst of them;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

The date of this prophecy is observable; it was in the twenty-seventh year of Ezekiel's captivity, sixteen years after the prophecy in the former part of the chapter, and almost as long after those which follow in the next chapters; but it comes in here for the explication of all that was said against Egypt. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar spent two or three campaigns in the conquest of the Ammonites and Moabites, and making himself master of their countries. Then he spent thirteen years in the siege of Tyre; during all that time the Egyptians were embroiled in war with the Cyreneans, and one with another, by which they were very much weakened and impoverished; and just at the end of the siege of Tyre God delivers this prophecy to Ezekiel, to signify to him that that utter destruction of Egypt, which he had foretold fifteen or sixteen years before, which had been but in part accomplished hitherto, should now be completed by Nebuchadnezzar. The prophecy which begins here, it should seem, is continued to the twentieth verse of the next chapter. And Dr. Lightfoot observes that it is the last prophecy we have of this prophet, and should have been last in the book; but it is laid here, that all the prophecies against Egypt might come together. The particular destruction of Pharaoh Hophrah, foretold in the former part of this chapter, was likewise foretold, Jer. xliv. 30. This general devastation of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar was foretold, Jer. xliii. 10. Observe,

First. What success God would give to Nebuchadnezzar and his forces against Egypt. God gave him that land, that he might take the spoil and prey of it, ver, 19, 20. It was a cheap and easy prey, he subdued it with very little difficulty. The blood and treasure expended upon the conquest of it was inconsiderable; but it was a rich prey, and he carried off a great deal from it that was of value. Their having been divided among themselves, no doubt, gave a common enemy great advantage against them, who, when they had been so long preying upon one another, soon made a prey of them all. En! quo discordia cives perduxit miseros!—'What wretchedness does civil discord bring!' Jeremiah foretold that Nebuchadnezzar should array himself with the land of Egypt as a shepherd puts on his coat, which intimates what a rich and cheap prey it should be.

Secondly. Upon what considerations God would give Nebuchadnezzar this success against Egypt. It was to be a recompense to him for the hard service with which he had caused his army to serve against Tyre, ver. 18—20. 1. The taking of Tyre was a tedious piece of work, it cost Nebuchadnezzar abundance of blood and treasure; it held out thirteen years. All that time the Chaldean army was hard at it to make themselves masters of it. A large current of the sea, between Tyre and the continent, was filled up with earth, and many other difficulties, which were thought insuperable, they had to struggle with; but so great a prince, having begun such an undertaking, thought himself bound in honour to push it on, whatever it cost him. How many thousand lives have been sacrificed to such points of honour as this was! In prosecuting this siege "every head was made bald, and every shoulder peeled," with carrying burthens, and labouring in the water when they had a strong tide, and a strong town to contend with. Egypt, a large kingdom, being divided within itself, is easily conquered. Tyre, a single city, being unanimous, is hardly subdued. Those that have much to do in the world find some affairs go on a great deal more readily and easily than others. But, 2. In this service God owns that they wrought for him, ver. 20; he set them at work for the humbling of a proud city and its king, though they meant not so, neither did their heart think so, who were employed in it. Note, Even great men and ill men are tools that God makes use of, and are working for him even when they are pursuing their own covetous and ambitious designs; so wonderfully doth God overrule all to his own glory. Yet, 3. For this service he had no wages, nor his army. He was at a vast expense to take Tyre, and when he had it, though it was a very rich city, and he promised himself good plunder for his army from it, he was disappointed. The Tyrians sent away by ship their best effects, and threw the rest into the sea, so that they had nothing but bare walls. Thus are the children of this world ordinarily frustrated in the highest expectations from it. Therefore, 4. He shall have the spoil of Egypt to recompense him for his service against Tyre. Note, God will be behindhand with none for any service they did for him, but, one way or other, will recompense them for it; none shall kindle a fire on his altar for nought. The service done for him by worldly men, with worldly designs, shall be recompensed with a mere worldly reward, which his faithful servants, that have a sincere regard to his will and glory, would not be put off with. This accounts for the prosperity of wicked men in this world. God is in it paying them for some service or other in which he has made use of them. Verily they have their reward—let none envy it them. The conquest of Egypt is spoken of as Nebuchadnezzar's full reward; for that completed his dominion over the then known world, in a manner; that was the last of the kingdoms he subdued. When he was master of that he became the head of gold.

Thirdly. The mercy God had in store for the house of Israel soon after. When the tide is at the highest it will turn, and so it will when it is at the lowest. Nebuchadnezzar was in the zenith of his glory when he had conquered Egypt, but within a year after he ran mad, Dan. iv., was so seven years, and within a year or two after he recovered his senses he resigned his life. When he was at the highest, Israel was at the lowest; then were they at the depth of their captivity, their bones dead and dry; but in that day the horn of the house of Israel shall bud forth, ver. 21. The day of their deliverance shall begin to dawn, and they shall have some little reviving in their bondage, in the honour that shall be done, 1. To their princes. They are the horns of the house of Israel, the seat of their glory and power. These began to bud forth when Daniel and his fellows were highly preferred in Babylon. Daniel sat in the gate of the city, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were set over the affairs of the province, Dan. ii. 49; these were all of the king's seed and of the princes, Dan. i. 3. And it was within a year after the conquest of Egypt that they were thus preferred, and soon after three of them were made famous by the honour God put upon them in bringing them alive out of the burning fiery furnace. This might very well be called the budding forth of the horn of the house of Israel. And some years after this promise had a farther accomplishment in the enlargement and elevation of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, Jer. lii. 31, 32. They were both tokens of God's favour to Israel, and happy omens, 2. To their prophets; And "I will give thee the opening of the mouth." Though none of Ezekiel's prophecies after this are recorded, yet we have reason to think he went on prophesying, and with more liberty and boldness when Daniel and his followers were in power, and would be ready to protect him, not only from the Babylonians, but from the wicked ones of his own people. Note, It bodes well to a people when God enlargeth the liberties of his ministers, and they are countenanced and encouraged in their work.

CHAPTER XXX.

In this chapter we have, I. A continuation of the prophecy against Egypt, which we had in the latter part of the foregoing chapter, just before the desolation of that once flourishing kingdom was completed by Nebuchadnezzar; in which is foretold the destruction of all her allies and confederates, all her interests and concerns, and the several steps which the king of Babylon should take in pushing on this destruction, ver. 1—19. II. A repetition of a former prophecy against Egypt just before the desolation of it began by their own ill conduct, which gradually weakened them, and prepared the way for the king of Babylon, ver. 20—26. It is all much to the same purpose with what we had before.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, prophesy and say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Howl ye, Woe worth the day!
3 For the day is near,
Even the day of the LORD is near, a cloudy day
It shall be the time of the heathen.
4 And the sword shall come upon Egypt,
And great pain shall be in Ethiopia,
When the slain shall fall in Egypt,
And they shall take away her multitude,
And her foundations shall be broken down.
5 Ethiopia, and Libya, and Lydia,
And all the mingled people, and Chub,
And the men of the land that is in league,
Shall fall with them by the sword.
6 Thus saith the LORD;
They also that uphold Egypt shall fall;
And the pride of her power shall come down:
From the tower of Syene shall they fall in it by the sword,
Saith the Lord GOD.

SYENE.

7 And they shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate,
And her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted.
8 And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have set a fire in Egypt,
And when all her helpers shall be destroyed.
9 In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships
To make the careless Ethiopians afraid,
And great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt:
For, lo, it cometh.
10 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also make the multitude of Egypt to cease
By the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon.
11 He and his people with him, the terrible of the nations,
Shall be brought to destroy the land:
And they shall draw their swords against Egypt,
And fill the land with the slain.
12 And I will make the rivers dry,
And sell the land into the hand of the wicked:
And I will make the land waste, and all that is therein,

RUINS AT KARNACK.—ver. 7.

By the hand of strangers:
I the LORD have spoken it.
13 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also destroy the idols,
And I will cause their images to cease out of Noph;
And there shall be no more a prince of the land of [Egypt:
And I will put a fear in the land of Egypt.
14 And I will make Pathros desolate,
And will set fire in Zoan,
And will execute judgments in No.
15 And I will pour my fury upon Sin, the strength of [Egypt;
And I will cut off the multitude of No.
16 And I will set fire in Egypt:
Sin shall have great pain,
And No shall be rent asunder,
And Noph shall have distresses daily.
17 The young men of Aven and of Pi-beseth shall fall by the [sword:
And these cities shall go into captivity.

AVEN—HELIOPOLIS.

18 At Tehaphnehes also the day shall be darkened,
When I shall break there the yokes of Egypt:
And the pomp of her strength shall cease in her:
As for her, a cloud shall cover her,
And her daughters shall go into captivity
19 Thus will I execute judgments in Egypt:
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

The prophecy of the destruction of Egypt is here very full and particular, as well as in the general very frightful. What can protect a provoking people when a righteous God comes forth to contend with them?

First. It shall be a very lamentable destruction, and such as shall occasion great sorrow; ver. 2, 3, "Howl ye," you may justly shriek now it is coming, for you will be made to shriek and make hideous outcries when it comes. Cry out, "Woe worth the day!" Or, 'Oh the day! alas, because of the day!' the terrible day, woe and alas! "for the day is near;" the day we have so long dreaded, so long deserved; it is the "day of the Lord," the day in which he will manifest himself as a God of vengeance. You have your day now, when you carry all before you, and trample on all about you; but God will have his day now shortly, the day of the revelation of his righteous judgment, Ps. xxxvii. 13. It will be a cloudy day, that is, dark and dismal, without the shining forth of any comfort; and it shall threaten a storm, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest. It shall be the time of the heathen, that is, of reckoning with the heathen for all their heathenish practices; that time which David spoke of when God would pour out his fury upon the heathen, Ps. lxxix. 6; when they should sink, Ps. ix. 15.

Secondly. It shall be the destruction of Egypt, and of all the states and countries in confederacy with her, and in her neighbourhood. 1. Egypt herself shall fall; ver. 4, "The sword shall come upon Egypt," the sword of the Chaldeans, and it shall be a victorious sword, for the slain shall fall in Egypt, fall by it, fall before it. Is the country populous? they shall take away her multitude. Is it strong and well fixed? "Her foundations shall be broken down," and then the fabric, though built never so fine, never so high, will fall of course. 2. Her neighbours and inmates shall fall with her. When the slain fall so thick in Egypt "great pain shall be in Ethiopia," both that in Africa, which is on the neighbourhood of Egypt on one side, and that in Asia, which is near to it on the other side. When their neighbour's house was on fire they could not but apprehend their own in danger. Nor were their fears groundless, for they shall all "fall with them by the sword," ver. 5. Ethiopia and Libya, Chush and Phut, so the Hebrew names are, two of the sons of Ham who are mentioned, and Mizraim, that is, Egypt, between them, Gen. x. 6. The Lydians, that were famous archers, are spoken of as confederates with Egypt, Jer. xlvi. 9. These shall fall with Egypt and Chub—the Chaldeans, the inhabitants of the inner Libya. These and others were the mingled people; there were those of all these and other countries that, upon some account or other, resided in Egypt, as did also the men of the land that is in league,—some of the remains of the people of Israel and Judah, the children of the covenant, or league, as they are called, Acts iii. 25; the children of the promise, Gal. iv. 28. These sojourned in Egypt, contrary to God's command, and these shall fall with them. Note, Those that will take their lot with God's enemies shall have their lot with them; yea, though they be in profession the men of the land that is in league with God.

Thirdly. All that pretend to support the sinking interests of Egypt shall come down under her, shall come down with her, ver. 6. They that uphold Egypt shall fall, and then Egypt must fall of course. See the justice of God; Egypt pretended to uphold Jerusalem when that was tottering, but proved a deceitful reed, and now they that pretended to uphold Egypt shall prove no better. Those that deceive others are commonly paid in their own coin, they are themselves deceived. 1. Doth Egypt think herself upheld by the absolute authority and dominion of her king? the pride of her power shall come down, ver. 6. The power of the king of Egypt was his pride; but that shall be broken and humbled. 2. Is the multitude of her people her support? these shall fall by the sword, even from the tower of Syene, which is in the utmost corner of the land, from that side of it by which the enemy shall enter. Both the countries and the cities, the husbandmen and the merchants, shall be desolate, ver. 7, as before, ch. xxix. 12. Even "the multitude of Egypt" shall be made to cease, ver. 10; that populous country shall be depopulated. The land shall be even "filled with the slain," ver. 11. 3. Is the river Nile her support, and the several channels of it a defence to her? I will make the rivers dry, ver. 12, so that those natural fortifications which were thought impregnable, because impassable, shall stand them in no stead. 4. Are her idols a support to her? Those shall be destroyed, those imaginary upholders shall appear more than ever to be imaginary, for so images are when they pretend to be deliverers and strongholds; ver. 13, "I will cause their images to cease out of Noph." 5. Is her royal family her support? "There shall be no more a prince in the land of Egypt." The royal family shall be extirpated and extinguished, which had continued so long. 6. Is her courage her support? and doth she think to uphold herself by the bravery of her men of war, who have now of late been inured to service? That shall fail; "I will put a fear in the land of Egypt." 7. Is the rising generation her support? Is she upheld by her children? And doth she think herself happy because she hath her quiver full of them? Alas! "the young men shall fall by the sword," ver. 17, and "the daughters shall go into captivity," ver. 18, and so she shall be robbed of all her hopes.

Fourthly. God shall inflict these desolating judgments on Egypt; ver. 8, "They shall know that I am the Lord," and greater than all gods, than all their gods, when I have "set a fire in Egypt." The fire that consumes nations is of God's kindling, and when he sets fire to a people "all their helpers shall be destroyed;" those that go about to quench the fire shall themselves be devoured by it, for who can stand before him when he is angry? When he pours out his fury upon a place, when he sets fire to it, ver. 15, 16, neither its strength nor its multitude can stand it in any stead.

Fifthly. The king of Babylon and his army shall be employed as instruments of this destruction. "The multitude of Egypt shall be made to cease," and be quite cut off, "by the hand of the king of Babylon," ver. 10. They that undertook to protect Israel from the king of Babylon shall not be able to protect themselves. It is said of the Chaldeans who should destroy Egypt, 1. That they are strangers, ver. 12, who therefore shall shew no compassion for old acquaintance sake, but shall carry it strangely towards them. 2. That they are "the terrible of the nations," ver. 11, both in respect of force and in respect of fierceness; and being terrible, they shall make terrible work. 3. That they are the wicked, who will not be restrained by reason and conscience, the laws of nature or the laws of nations, for they are without law. "I will sell the land into the hand of the wicked." They do violence unjustly,—wicked as they are, yet, as far as they are instruments in God's hand of executing his judgments, it is on his part justly done. Note, God often makes one wicked man a scourge to another, and even wicked men acquire a title to prey, jure belli,—'by the laws of war,' for God "sells it into their hands."

Sixthly. No place in the land of Egypt shall be exempted from the fury of the Chaldean army, not the strongest, not the remotest; "The sword shall go through the land." Divers places are here named—Pathros, Zoan, and No, ver. 14; Sin and Noph, ver. 15, 16; Aven and Pi-beseth, ver. 17; Tehaphnehes, ver. 18. These shall be made desolate, shall be fired, and God's judgments shall be executed upon them, and his fury poured out upon them. Their strength and multitude shall be cut off; they shall have great pain, shall be rent asunder with fear, and shall have distresses daily; their day shall be darkened, their honours, comforts, and hopes shall be extinguished; their yokes shall be broken, so that they shall no more oppress and tyrannize as they have done; the "pomp of their strength shall cease," and "a cloud shall cover them," a cloud so thick that through it they shall not see any hopes, nor shall their glory be seen or shine farther. And, lastly, the Ethiopians that are at a distance from them, as well as those that are mingled with them, shall share in their pain and terror; God will by his providence spread the rumour, and the careless Ethiopians shall be made afraid, ver. 9. Note, God can strike a terror upon those that are most secure. Fearfulness shall, when he pleases, surprise the most presumptuous hypocrites.

The close of this prediction leaves, 1. The land of Egypt mortified. "Thus will I execute judgment on Egypt," ver. 19. The destruction of Egypt is the executing of judgments, which intimates not only that it is done justly for its sins, but that it is done regularly and legally, by a judicial sentence. All the executions God doth are according to his judgments. 2. The God of Israel herein glorified; "They shall know that I am the Lord." The Egyptians shall be made to know it, and the people of God shall be made to know it better. "The Lord is known by the judgments which he executeth."

20 And it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the first month, in the seventh day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
21 Son of man, I have broken the arm of Pharaoh king of Egypt;
And, lo, it shall not be bound up to be healed,
To put a roller to bind it, to make it strong to hold the [sword.
22 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against Pharaoh king of Egypt,
And will break his arms, the strong, and that which was broken;
And I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand

23 And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations,
And will disperse them through the countries.
24 And I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon,
And put my sword in his hand:
But I will break Pharaoh's arms,
And he shall groan before him with the groanings of a deadly wounded man.
25 But I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon,
And the arms of Pharaoh shall fall down;
And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall put my sword into the hand of the king of Babylon,
And he shall stretch it out upon the land of Egypt.
26 And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations,
And disperse them among the countries;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

This short prophecy of the weakening the power of Egypt was delivered about the time that the army of the Egyptians which attempted to raise the siege of Jerusalem were frustrated in their enterprise, and returned re infecta, —'without accomplishing their purpose;' whereupon the king of Babylon renewed the siege, and carried his point. The kingdom of Egypt was very ancient, and had been many ages considerable; that of Babylon was but lately arrived to its great pomp and power, being built upon the ruins of the kingdom of Assyria. Now it is with them as it is with families and states, some are growing up, others are declining and going back; one must increase, and the other must of course decrease.

First. It is here foretold that the kingdom of Egypt shall grow weaker and weaker. The extent of his territories shall be abridged, his wealth and power shall be diminished, and he shall become less able than ever to help either himself or his friend. 1. This was in part done already; ver. 21, "I have broken the arm of Pharaoh" some time ago. One arm of that kingdom might well be reckoned broken when the king of Babylon routed the forces of Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish, Jer. xlvi. 2, and made himself master of "all that pertained to Egypt from the river of Egypt to Euphrates," 2 Kin. xxiv. 7. Egypt had been long in gathering strength and extending its dominions; and, therefore, that there may be a proportion observed in providence, it loseth its strength slowly and by degrees. It was soon after the king of Egypt slew good king Josiah, and in the same reign, that its arm was thus broken, and it received that fatal blow which it never recovered. Before Egypt's heart and neck were broken its arm was. God's judgments come upon a people by steps, that they may meet him repenting. When the arm of Egypt is broken, "it shall not be bound up to be healed," for none can heal the wounds that God gives but he himself. Those whom he disarms, whom he disables, cannot again hold the sword. 2. This was to be done again. One arm was broken before, and something was done towards the setting of it, towards the healing of the deadly wound that was given to the beast. But now, ver. 22, "I am against Pharaoh, and will break" both "his arms;" both the strong, and that which was broken and set again. Note, If lesser judgments do not prevail to humble and reform sinners, God will send greater. Now God will "cause the sword to fall out of his hand," which he caught hold of, as thinking himself strong enough to hold it. It is repeated, ver. 24, "I will break Pharaoh's arms." He had been a cruel oppressor to the people of God formerly, and of late the staff of a broken rod to them; and now God, by breaking his arms, reckons with him for both. God justly breaks that power which is abused, either to put wrongs upon people or to put cheats upon them. But this is not all. 1st. The king of Egypt shall be dispirited when he finds himself in danger of the king of Babylon's forces, he "shall groan before him with the groaning of a deadly wounded man." Note, It is common for those that are most elevated in their prosperity to be most dejected and disheartened in their adversity. Pharoah, even before the sword toucheth him, shall groan as if he had received his death wound. 2nd. The people of Egypt shall be dispersed, ver. 23; and again, ver. 26, "I will scatter them among the nations." Other nations had mingled with them, ver. 5; now they shall be mingled with other nations, and seek shelter in them, and so be made to know that the Lord is righteous.

Secondly. It is here foretold that the kingdom of Babylon shall grow stronger and stronger, ver. 24, 25. It is said, and repeated, that God will, 1. Put strength into the king of Babylon's arms, that he may be able to go through the service he is designed for. 2. That he will put a sword, his sword, into the king of Babylon's hand, which signified his giving him a commission, and furnishing him with arms for carrying on a war, particularly against Egypt. Note, As judges on the bench, like Pilate, Jno. xix. 11, so generals in the field, like Nebuchadnezzar, have no power but what is given them from above.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The prophecy of this chapter, as the two chapters before, is against Egypt, and designed for the humbling and mortifying of Pharaoh. In passing sentence upon great criminals it is usual to consult precedents, and to see what has been done to others in the like case, which serves both to direct and justify the proceedings. Pharaoh stands indicted at the bar of Divine justice for his pride and haughtiness, and the injuries he had done to God's people; but he thinks himself so high, so great, as not to be accountable to any authority; so strong, and so well guarded, as not to be conquerable by any force. The prophet is therefore directed to make a report to him of the case of the king of Assyria, whose head city was Nineveh. I. He must shew him how great a monarch the king of Assyria had been, what a vast empire he had, what a mighty sway he bore; the king of Egypt, as great as he was, could not go beyond him, ver. 3—9. II. He must then shew him how like he was to the king of Assyria, in pride and carnal security, ver. 10. III. He must next read him the history of the fall and ruin of the king of Assyria, what a noise it made among the nations, and what a warning it gave to all potent princes to take heed of pride, ver. 11—17. IV. He must leave the king of Egypt to apply all this to himself, to see his own face in the looking-glass of the king of Assyria's sin, and to foresee his own fall through the perspective glass of his ruin, ver. 18.

AND it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the third month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, and to his multitude;
Whom art thou like in thy greatness? [branches,
3 Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair
And with a shadowing shroud, and of an high stature;
And his top was among the thick boughs.
4 The waters made him great, the deep set him up on high
With her rivers running round about his plants, [field.
And sent out her little rivers unto all the trees of the 5 Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, [long
And his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became
Because of the multitude of waters, when he shot forth.
6 All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs,
And under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young,
And under his shadow dwelt all great nations.
7 Thus was he fair in his greatness,
In the length of his branches:
For his root was by great waters.
8 The cedars in the garden of God could not hide him:
The fir trees were not like his boughs,
And the chesnut trees were not like his branches;
Nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty.
9 I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches:
So that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, envied him.

This prophecy bears date the month before Jerusalem was taken, as that in the close of the foregoing chapter about four months before. When God's people were in the depth of their distress it would be some comfort to them, as it would serve likewise for a check to the pride and malice of their neighbours that insulted over them, to be told from heaven that the cup was going round, even the cup of trembling; that it would shortly be taken out of the hands of God's people and put into the hands of those that hated them, Isa. li. 22, 23. In this prophecy,

First. The prophet is directed to put Pharaoh upon searching the records for a case parallel to his own; ver. 2, Speak to Pharaoh, and to his multitude, to the multitude of his attendants, that contributed so much to his magnificence, and the multitude of his armies, that contributed so much to his strength. These he was proud of, these he put a confidence in, and they were as proud of him, and trusted as much in him. Now ask him, "Whom art thou like in thy greatness?" We are apt to judge of ourselves by comparison. Those that think highly of themselves fancy themselves as great and as good as such and such that have been mightily celebrated. The flatterers of princes tell them whom they equal in pomp and grandeur. Well, saith God, let him pitch upon the most famous potentate that ever was, and it shall be allowed that he is like him in greatness, and no way inferior to him; but, let him pitch upon whom he will, he will find that his day came to fall; he will see there was an end of all his perfection, and must therefore expect the end of his own in like manner. Note, The falls of others both into sin and ruin are intended as admonitions to us not to be secure or high-minded, nor to think we stand out of danger.

Secondly. He is directed to shew him an instance of one whom he resembled in greatness, and that was the Assyrian, ver. 3, whose monarchy had continued from Nimrod. Sennacherib was one of the mighty princes of that monarchy, but it sunk down soon after him, and the monarchy of Nebuchadnezzar was built upon its ruins, or rather grafted upon its stock. Let us now see what a flourishing prince the king of Assyria was. He is here compared to a stately cedar, ver. 3. The glory of the house of David is illustrated by the same similitude, ch. xvii. 3. The olive-tree, the fig-tree, and the vine, which were all fruit-trees, had refused to be promoted over the trees because they would not leave their fruitfulness, Jud. ix. 8. And therefore the choice falls upon the cedar, that is stately and strong, and casts a great shadow, but bears no fruit.

1. The Assyrian monarch was a tall cedar, such as the cedars in Lebanon generally were, of a high stature, and "his top among the thick boughs;" he was attended by other princes that were tributaries to him, and was surrounded by a life-guard of brave men. He surpassed all the princes in his neighbourhood, they were all shrubs to him; ver. 5, "His height was exalted above all the trees of the field," they were many of them very high, but he overtopped them all, ver. 8. The cedars, even those in the garden of Eden, which we may suppose were the best of the kind, "would not hide him," but his top branches outshot theirs.

2. He was a spreading cedar. His branches did not only run up in height, but run out in breadth, noting that this mighty prince was not only exalted to dignity and honour, and had a name above the names of the great men of the earth but that he obtained great dominion and power; his territories were large, and he extended his conquests far, and his influence much farther. This cedar, like a vine, sent forth "his branches to the sea, to the river," Ps. lxxx. 11; "His boughs were multiplied, his branches became long," ver. 5, so that "he had a shadowing shroud," ver. 3. This contributed very much to his beauty, that he grew proportionably large as well as high. He was "fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches," ver. 7, very comely as well as very stately, "fair by the multitude of his branches," ver. 9. His large dominions were well managed, like a spreading tree that is kept in shape and good order by the skill of the gardener, so as to be very beautiful to the eye. His government was as amiable in the eyes of the wise men as it was admirable in the eyes of all men. The fir-trees were not like his boughs, so straight, so green, so regular, nor were the branches of chesnut-trees like his branches, so thick, so spreading; in short, "no tree in the garden of God," in Eden, in Babylon, for that stood where Paradise was planted. There where there was every tree that was pleasant to the sight, Gen. ii. 9, there was none like "to this cedar in beauty;" that is, in all the nations about there was no prince so much admired, so much courted, and whom everybody was so much in love with, as the king of Assyria. Many of them did virtuously, but he excelled them all, outshone them all. "All the trees of Eden envied him," ver. 9. When they found they could not compare with him they were angry and grieved that he so far outdid them, and secretly grudged him the praise due to him. Note, It is the unhappiness of those who in any thing excel others that thereby they make themselves the objects of envy; and "who can stand before envy?"

3. He was serviceable, as far as a standing, growing cedar could be, and that was only by his shadow; ver. 6, "All the fowls of heaven," some of all sorts, "made their nests in his boughs," where they were sheltered from the injuries of the weather. The beasts of the field put themselves under the protection of his branches; there they were levant and couchant, there they brought forth their young, for they had there a natural covert from the heat and from the storm. The meaning of all is, "Under his shadow dwelt all great nations;" they all fled to him for safety, and were willing to swear allegiance to him if he would undertake to protect them, as travellers in a shower come under thick trees for shelter. Note, Those who have power ought to use it for the protection and comfort of those whom they have power over, for to that end they are intrusted with power. Even the bramble, if he be anointed king, invites the trees to come and trust in his shadow, Jud. ix. 15. But the utmost security that any creature, even the king of Assyria himself, can give, is but like the shadow of a tree, which is but a scanty and slender protection, and leaves a man many ways exposed. Let us, therefore, flee to God for protection, and he will take us under the shadow of his wings, where we shall be warmer and safer than under the shadow of the strongest and stateliest cedar. Ps. xvii. 8; xci. 4.

4. He seemed to be settled and established in his greatness and power. For, 1st. It was God that made him fair, ver. 9; for by him kings reign. He was comely with the comeliness that God put upon him. Note, God's hand must be eyed and owned in the advancement of the great men of the earth, and therefore we must not envy them; yet will not that secure the continuance of their prosperity, for he that gave them their beauty, if they be deprived of it, knows how to turn it into deformity. 2nd. He seemed to have a good bottom. This cedar was not like the "heath in the desert, made to inhabit the parched places," Jer. xvii. 6; it was not a "root in a dry ground," Isa. liii. 2. No, he had abundance of wealth to support his power and grandeur; ver. 4, "The waters made him great;" he had vast treasures, large stores and magazines, which were as "the deep that set him up on high;" constant revenues coming in by taxes, customs, and crown rents, which were "as rivers running round about his plants." These enabled him to strengthen and secure his interests everywhere; for he "sent out his little rivers," or conduits, "to all the trees of the field" to water them; and when they had "maintenance from the king's palace," Ezr. iv. 14, and "their country was nourished by the king's country," Acts xii. 20, they would be serviceable and faithful to him. Those that have wealth flowing upon them in great riches find themselves obliged to send it out again in little rivers; for, "as goods are increased they are increased that eat them," and the more men have the more occasion they have for it; yea, and still the more they have occasion for. The branches of this cedar became long, because of the multitude of waters which fed them, ver. 5; and ver. 7, "his root was by great waters," which seems to secure it that its "leaf should never wither," Ps. i. 3; that it should not "see when heat comes," Jer. xvii. 8. Note, Worldly people may seem to have an established prosperity, yet it only seems so, Job v. 7; Ps. xxxvii. 35.

10 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height,
And he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs,
And his heart is lifted up in his height;
11 I have therefore delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen;
He shall surely deal with him:
I have driven him out for his wickedness.
12 And strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off,
And have left him:
Upon the mountains and in all the valleys his branches are fallen,
And his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land;
And all the people of the earth are gone down from his shadow,
And have left him.
13 Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain,
And all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches:
14 To the end
That none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height,
Neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs,
Neither their trees stand up in their height, all that drink water:
For they are all delivered unto death,
To the nether parts of the earth,
In the midst of the children of men,
With them that go down to the pit.
15 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In the day when he went down to the grave I caused a mourning:
I covered the deep for him,
And I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed:
And I caused Lebanon to mourn for him,
And all the trees of the field fainted for him.
16 I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall,
When I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit:
And all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water,
Shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth.
17 They also went down into hell with him
Unto them that be slain with the sword;
And they that were his arm, that dwelt under his shadow
In the midst of the heathen.
18 To whom art thou thus like in glory
And in greatness among the trees of Eden?
Yet shalt thou be brought down with the trees of Eden
Unto the nether parts of the earth:
Thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised
With them that be slain by the sword. [GOD.
This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord

We have seen the king of Egypt resembling the king of Assyria in pomp, and power, and prosperity, how like he was to him in his greatness. Now here we see,

First. How he doth likewise resemble him in his pride, ver. 10; for as face answers to face in a glass so doth one corrupt carnal heart to another, and the same temptations of a prosperous state by which some are overcome are fatal to many others too. "Thou," O king of Egypt, "hast lifted up thyself in height," hast been proud of thy wealth and power, ch. xxix. 3. And just so "he," that is, the king of Assyria, when he had "shot up his top among the thick boughs," his heart was presently "lifted up in his height," and he grew insolent and imperious, set God himself at defiance, and trampled upon his people. Witness the messages and letter which the great king, the king of Assyria, sent to Hezekiah, Isa. xxxvi. 4. How haughtily doth he speak of himself and his own achievements, how scornfully of that great and good man! There were other sins in which the Egyptians and the Assyrians did concur, particularly that of oppressing God's people. It is charged upon them both together, Isa. lii. 4; but here that sin is run up to its cause, and that was pride, for it is the contempt of the proud that they are filled with. Note, When men's outward condition riseth their minds commonly rise with it; and it is very rare to find an humble spirit in the midst of great advancements.

Secondly. How he shall therefore resemble him in his fall. And for the opening of this part of the comparison,

1. Here is a history of the fall of the king of Assyria. For his part, saith God, ver. 11, "I have therefore," because he was thus lifted up, "delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen." Cyaxares, king of the Medes, in the twenty-sixth year of his reign, in conjunction with Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, destroyed Nineveh, and with it the Assyrian empire. Nebuchadnezzar, though he was not then, yet afterwards became, very emphatically the mighty one of the heathen; most mighty among them, and most mighty over them to prevail against them. 1st. It is God himself that orders his ruin. "I have delivered him into the hand" of the executioner, "I have driven him out." Note, God is the judge who puts down one and sets up another, Ps. lxxvi. 7; and, when he pleaseth, he can extirpate and expel those who think themselves, and seem to others, to have taken deepest root. And the mightiest ones of the heathen could not gain their point against those they contended with, if the Almighty himself did not deliver them into their hands. 2nd. It is his own sin that procures his ruin. "I have driven him out for his wickedness." None are driven out from their honour, power, and possessions, but it is "for their wickedness." None of our comforts are ever lost but what have been a thousand times forfeited. If the wicked are driven away, it is in their wickedness. 3rd. It is a "mighty one of the heathen" that shall be the instrument of his ruin; for God often employs one wicked man in punishing another. "He shall surely deal with him," shall know how to manage him, as great as he is. Note, Proud imperious men will, sooner or later, meet with their match. Now, in this history of the fall of the Assyrian, observe,

First. A continuation of the similitude of the cedar. He grew very high, and extended his boughs very far; but his day comes to fall. 1*st.* This stately cedar was cropped; "The terrible of the nations cut him off." Soldiers who, being both armed and commissioned to kill and slay, and to destroy, may well be reckoned among "the terrible of the nations," they have lopped off his branches first, have seized upon some parts of his dominion and forced them out of his hands; so that in all mountains and valleys of the nations about, in the highlands and lowlands, and by all the rivers, there were cities or countries that were broken off from the Assyrian monarchy, that had been subjected to it, but were either revolted or recovered from it. Its feathers were borrowed, and when every bird had fetched back its own it was naked like the stump of a tree. 2*nd.* It was deserted. "All the people of the earth," that had fled to him for shelter, are "gone down from his shadow, and have left him." When he was disabled to give them protection they thought they no longer owed him allegiance. Let not great men be proud of the number of those that attend them, and have a dependence upon them; it is only for what they can get. When providence frowns upon them their retinue is soon dispersed and scattered from them. 3*rd.* It was insulted over, and its fall triumphed in; ver. 13, "Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain," to tread upon the broken branches of this cedar. Its fall is triumphed in by the other trees, who were angry to see themselves overtopped so much; "all the trees of Eden" that were cut down and fallen before him, all that drank water of the rain of heaven, as the stump of the tree that is left in the south is said to be "wet with the dew of heaven," Dan. iv. 23, and to bud "through the scent of water," Job. xiv. 9. They shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth, when they see this proud cedar brought as low as themselves. Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris,—'To have companions in woe is a solace to those who suffer.' But, on the contrary, the trees of Lebanon, that are yet standing in their height and strength, "mourned for him," and "the trees of the field fainted for him," because they could not but read their own destiny in his fall. "Howl, fir-trees, if the cedar be shaken," for they cannot expect to stand long, Zec. xi. 2.

Secondly. A reddition of the similitude of the cedar. By the cutting down of this cedar is signified the slaughter of this mighty monarch, and all his adherents and supporters, they are all "delivered to death," to fall by the sword, as the cedar by the axe. He and his princes, who, he said, were altogether kings, go down to the grave, "to the nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men," as common persons of no quality or distinction; they "die like men," Ps. lxxxii. 7; they were carried away with "them that go down to the pit," and their pomp did neither protect them nor "descend after them." Again, ver. 16, he was "cast down to hell with them that descend into the pit." He went into the state of the dead, and was buried as others are, in obscurity and oblivion. Again, ver. 17, "They all that were his arm," on whom he stayed, by whom he acted and exerted his power, all "that dwelt under his shadow," his subjects and allies, and all that had any dependence on him, they all went down into ruin, down into the grave "with him, unto them that were slain with the sword," to those that were cut off by untimely deaths before them, under the load of guilt and shame. When great men fall, a great many fall with them, as a great many in like manner have fallen before them.

Thirdly. What God designed and aimed at in bringing down this mighty monarch and his monarchy. He designed thereby, 1*st.* To give an alarm to the nations about; to put them all to a stand, to put them all to a gaze; ver. 16, "I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall." They were all struck with astonishment to see so mighty a prince brought down thus; it gave a shock to all their confidences, every one thinking his turn would be next, "when he went down to the grave;" ver. 15, "I caused a mourning," a general lamentation, as the whole kingdom goes into mourning at the death of the king. In token of this general grief "I covered the deep for him," put that into black, gave a stop to business in complaisance to this universal mourning: "I restrained the floods, and the great waters were stayed," that they might run in another channel, that of lamentation. Lebanon particularly, the kingdom of Syria, that was sometimes in confederacy with the Assyrian, mourned for him, as the ally of Babylon, Rev. xviii. 9. 2*nd.* To give an admonition to the nations about, and to their kings; ver. 14, "to the end that none of all the trees by the waters," though never so advantageously situated, "may exalt themselves for their height," may be proud and conceited of themselves, and "shoot up their top among the thick boughs," looking disdainfully upon others, nor "stand upon themselves for their height," confiding in their own policies and powers, as if they could never be brought down. Let them all take warning by the Assyrian, for he once held up his head as high, and thought he kept his footing as firm, as any of them; but his pride went before his destruction, and his confidence failed him. Note, The fall of proud, presumptuous men is intended for a warning to others to keep humble. It had been well for Nebuchadnezzar, who was himself active in bringing down the Assyrian, if he had taken the admonition.

2. Here is a prophecy of the fall of the king of Egypt in like manner, ver. 18. He thought himself like the "Assyrian in glory and greatness," overtopping "all the trees of Eden," as the cypress doth the shrubs. But thou also "shalt be brought down," with other the trees that are pleasant to the sight, as those in Eden. Thou shalt be brought to the grave, to the nether or lower parts of the earth, thou shalt "lie in the midst of the uncircumcised," that die in their uncleanness, die ingloriously, die under a curse, and at a distance from God. Then shall those whom he has trampled upon triumph over him, saying, "This is Pharaoh, and all his multitude." See how mean he looks, how low he lies; see what all his pomp and pride is come to; here is all that is left of him. Note, Great men and great multitudes, with the great figure and great noise they make in the world, when God comes to contend with them will soon become little, less than nothing, such as Pharaoh and all his multitude.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Still we are upon the destruction of Pharaoh and Egypt, which is wonderfully enlarged upon, and with a great deal of emphasis. When we read so very much of Egypt's ruin, no less than six several prophecies at divers times delivered concerning it, we are ready to think, surely there is some special reason for it. And, I. Perhaps it may look as far back as the book of Genesis, where we find, ch. xv. 14, that God determined to judge Egypt for oppressing his people; and though that was in part fulfilled in the plagues of Egypt, and the drowning of Pharaoh, yet in this destruction here foretold these old scores were reckoned for, and that was to have its full accomplishment. II. Perhaps it may look as far forward as the book of the Revelation, where we find that the great enemy of the gospel church, that makes war with the Lamb, is spiritually called Egypt, Rev. xi. 8; and if so, the destruction of Egypt, and its Pharaoh, was a type of the destruction of that proud enemy; and betwixt this prophecy of the ruin of Egypt and the prophecy of the destruction of the antichristian generation there is some analogy. We have two distinct prophecies in this chapter relating to Egypt; both in the same month, one on the first day, the other that day fortnight, probably both on the sabbath-day. They are both lamentations, not only to signify how lamentable the fall of Egypt should be, but to intimate how much the prophet himself should lament it, from a generous principle of love to mankind. The destruction of Egypt is here represented under two similitudes. 1. The killing of a lion or a whale, or some such devouring creature, ver. 1—16; 2. The funeral of a great commander or captain-general, ver. 17—32. The two prophecies of this chapter are much of the same length.

AND it came to pass in the twelfth year, in the twelfth month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, take up a lamentation for Pharaoh king of Egypt, and say unto him,

Thou art like a young lion of the nations,
And thou art as a whale in the seas:
And thou camest forth with thy rivers,
And troubledst the waters with thy feet, and fouledst their

3 Thus saith the Lord GOD; [rivers.
I will therefore spread out my net over thee with a company of many people;
And they shall bring thee up in my net.

4 Then will I leave thee upon the land,
I will cast thee forth upon the open field, [thee,
And will cause all the fowls of the heaven to remain upon
And I will fill the beasts of the whole earth with thee.

5 And I will lay thy flesh upon the mountains,
And fill the valleys with thy height.

6 I will also water with thy blood the land wherein thou
Even to the mountains; [swimmest,
And the rivers shall be full of thee.

7 And when I shall put thee out,
I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark;
I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light.

8 All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee,
And set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord GOD.

9 I will also vex the hearts of many people,
When I shall bring thy destruction among the nations,
Into the countries which thou hast not known.

10 Yea, I will make many people amazed at thee,
And their kings shall be horribly afraid for thee,
When I shall brandish my sword before them;
And they shall tremble at every moment,
Every man for his own life, in the day of thy fall.

11 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
The sword of the king of Babylon shall come upon thee

12 By the swords of the mighty will I cause thy multitude
The terrible of the nations, all of them: [to fall,
And they shall spoil the pomp of Egypt,
And all the multitude thereof shall be destroyed.

13 I will destroy also all the beasts thereof from beside the great waters;
Neither shall the foot of man trouble them any more,
Nor the hoofs of beasts trouble them.

14 Then will I make their waters deep,
And cause their rivers to run like oil, saith the Lord GOD.

15 When I shall make the land of Egypt desolate,
And the country shall be destitute of that whereof it was full,
When I shall smite all them that dwell therein,
Then shall they know that I am the LORD.

16 This is the lamentation wherewith they shall lament her:
The daughters of the nations shall lament her:
They shall lament for her, even for Egypt,
And for all her multitude, saith the Lord GOD.

Here, First. The prophet is ordered to "take up a lamentation for Pharaoh king of Egypt," ver. 2. It concerns ministers to be much of a serious spirit, and in order thereunto to be frequent in taking up lamentations for the fall and ruin of sinners, as those that have not desired, but dreaded, the woful day. Note, Ministers that would affect others with the things of God must make it appear that they are themselves affected with the miseries that sinners bring upon themselves by their sins. It becomes us to weep and tremble for those that will not weep and tremble for themselves, to try if thereby we may set them a weeping, set them a trembling.

Secondly. He is ordered to shew cause for that lamentation.

1. Pharaoh has been a troubler of the nations, even of his own nation, which he should have procured the repose of. He is "like a young lion of the nations," ver. 2, loud and noisy, hectoring and threatening as a lion when he roars. Great potentates, if they be tyrannical and oppressive, are in God's account no better than beasts of prey. He is like "a whale" or dragon, like a crocodile, so some; "in the seas," very turbulent and vexatious, as the leviathan that "makes the deep to boil like a pot," Job xli. 31. When Pharaoh engaged in an unnecessary war with the Cyrenians he "came forth with his rivers," with his armies, "troubled the waters," disturbed his own kingdom, and the neighbour nations, "fouled the rivers," and made them muddy. Note, A great deal of disquiet is often given to the world by the restless ambition and implacable resentments of proud princes. Ahab is he that troubles Israel, and not Elijah.

2. He that has troubled others must expect to be himself troubled; for the Lord is righteous, Jos. vii. 25.

1st. This is set forth here by a comparison. Is Pharaoh like a great whale, which, when it comes up the river, gives great disturbance, a leviathan which Job cannot draw out with a hook, Job xli. 1, yet God has a net for him which is large enough to inclose him, and strong enough to secure him; ver. 3, "I will spread my net over thee," even the army of the Chaldeans, a "company of many people." They shall force him out of his fastness, dislodge him out of his possessions, throw him like a great fish upon dry ground, upon the open field, ver. 4; where, being out of his element, he must die of course, and be a prey to the birds and beasts, as was foretold, ch. xxix. 5. What can the strongest fish do to help itself when it is out of the water, and lies gasping? The flesh of this great whale shall be "laid upon the mountains," ver. 5; and the valleys shall be "filled with his height." Such numbers of Pharaoh's soldiers shall be slain that the dead bodies shall be scattered upon the hills, and there shall be heaps of them piled up in the valleys. Blood shall be shed in such abundance as to swell the rivers in the valleys. Or, such shall be the bulk, such the height, of this leviathan that, when he is laid upon the ground, he shall fill a valley.

Such vast quantities of blood shall issue from this leviathan as shall "water the land of Egypt," the land wherein now he swims, now he sports himself, ver. 6. It shall reach "to the mountains," and the waters of Egypt shall again be "turned into blood;" by this means the "rivers shall be full of thee." The judgments executed upon Pharaoh of old are expressed by the "breaking of the heads of the leviathan in the waters," Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14. But now they go farther; this old serpent has now not only his head bruised, but is all crushed to pieces.

2nd. It is set forth by a prophecy of the deep impression which the destruction of Egypt should make upon the neighbour nations; it would put them all into a consternation, as the fall of the Assyrian monarchy did, ch. xxxi. 15, 16. When Pharaoh, that had been like a blazing, burning torch, is put out and extinguished, it shall make all about him look black, ver. 7; the heavens shall be hung with black, the stars darkened, the sun eclipsed, and the moon be deprived of her borrowed light. It is from the upper world that this lower receives its light; and therefore, ver. 8, when the bright lights of heaven are made dark above, darkness by consequence is set upon the land, upon the earth—so it shall be on the land of Egypt. Here the plague of darkness, which was upon Egypt of old for three days, seems to be alluded to as before, the turning of the waters into blood. For when former judgments are forgotten it is just they should be repeated. When their privy councillors and statesmen, and those that have the conduct of the public affairs, are deprived of wisdom, and made fools, and the things that belong to their peace are hid from their eyes, then their lights are darkened, and the land is in a mist. This is foretold, Isa. xix. 13, "The princes of Zoan are become fools." Now upon the spreading of the report of the fall of Egypt, and the bringing of the news to remote countries, "countries which they had not known," ver. 9, people shall be much affected, and shall feel themselves sensibly touched by it. First. It shall fill them with vexation to see such an ancient, wealthy, potent kingdom thus humbled and brought down, and the pride of worldly glory, which they have such a value for, stained. The hearts of many people will be vexed to see the word of the God of Israel fulfilled in the destruction of Egypt, and that all the gods of Egypt were not able to relieve it. Note, The destruction of some wicked people is a vexation to others. Secondly. It shall fill them with admiration, ver. 10; they shall be amazed at thee, shall wonder to see so great riches and power come to nothing, Rev. xviii. 17. Note, They that admire with complacency the pomp of this world will admire with consternation the ruin of that pomp, which, to those that know the vanity of all things here below, is no surprise at all. Thirdly. It shall fill them with fear; even their kings, that think it their prerogative to be secure, shall be horribly afraid for thee, concluding their own house to be in danger when their neighbour's is on fire. "When I shall brandish my sword before them they shall tremble every man for his own life." Note, When the sword of God's justice is drawn against some to cut them off, it is thereby brandished before others to give them warning; and those that will not be admonished by it, and made to reform, yet shall be frightened by it, and made to tremble; "They shall tremble every moment because of thy fall." When others are ruined by sin we have reason to quake for fear, as knowing ourselves guilty and obnoxious. "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?"

3rd. It is set forth by a plain and express prediction of the desolation itself that should come upon Egypt. First, The instruments of the desolation appear here very formidable. It is the sword of the king of Babylon, that warlike, that victorious prince, that shall come upon thee, ver. 11; "The swords of the mighty," even the "terrible of the nations, all of them," ver. 12; an army that there is no standing before. Note, Those that delight in war, and are upon all occasions entering into contention, may expect, some time or other, to be engaged with those that will prove too hard for them. Pharaoh had been forward to quarrel with his neighbour, and to come forth with his rivers, with his armies, ver. 2; but God will now give him enough of it. Secondly. The instances of the desolation appear here very frightful, much the same with what we had before, ch. xxix. 10—12; xxx. 7. 1*st.* The multitude of Egypt shall be destroyed; not decimated, some picked out to be made examples, but all cut off. Note, The numbers of sinners, though they be a multitude, will neither secure them against God's power nor entitle them to his pity. 2*nd.* The pomp of Egypt shall be spoiled; the pomp of their court, what they have been proud of. Note, In renouncing the pomps of this world we did ourselves a great kindness, for they are things that are soon spoiled, and cheat their admirers. 3*rd.* The cattle of Egypt, that used to feed by the rivers, shall be destroyed, ver. 13; neither cut off by the sword nor carried off for a prey. Egypt was famous for horses, which would be an acceptable booty to the Chaldeans. The rivers shall be no more frequented as they have been by man and beast that came hither to drink. 4*th.* The waters of Egypt that used to flow briskly shall now grow deep, and slow, and heavy, and shall run like oil, ver. 14; a figurative expression, signifying that there should be such an universal sadness and heaviness upon the whole nation, that even the rivers should go softly and silently like mourners, and quite forget their rapid motion. 5*th.* The whole country of Egypt shall be stripped of its wealth; it shall be "destitute of that whereof it was full," ver. 15; corn and cattle, and all the pleasant fruits of the earth. When those are "smitten that dwell therein," the ground is untilled, and that which is gathered becomes an easy prey to the invader. Note, God can soon empty those of this world's goods that have the greatest fulness of those things and are full of them, that enjoy most and have their hearts set upon those enjoyments. The Egyptians were full of their pleasant and plentiful country, and the rich products of it. Every one that talked with them might perceive how much it filled them; but God can soon make their "country destitute of that whereof it is full;" it is therefore our wisdom to be full of treasures in heaven. When the country is made destitute, (1.) It shall be an instruction to them; "Then shall they know that I am the Lord." A sensible conviction of the vanity of the world, and the fading, perishing nature of all things in it, will contribute much to our right knowledge of God as our portion and happiness. (2.) It shall be a lamentation to all about them. "The daughters of the nations shall lament her," ver. 16, either because, being in alliance with her, they share in her grievances, and suffer with her; or, being admirers of her, they at least share in her grief, and sympathise with her. They shall lament "for Egypt and all her multitude;" it shall grieve them to see so great a devastation made. By enlarging the matters of our joy we increase the occasions of our sorrow.

17 It came to pass also in the twelfth year, in the fifteenth day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

18 Son of man, wail for the multitude of Egypt, and cast them down,
Even her, and the daughters of the famous nations,
Unto the nether parts of the earth, with them that go down into the pit.

19 Whom dost thou pass in beauty?
Go down, and be thou laid with the uncircumcised.

20 They shall fall in the midst of them that are slain by the sword:
She is delivered to the sword: [sword:
Draw her and all her multitudes.

21 The strong among the mighty shall speak to him
Out of the midst of hell with them that help him:
They are gone down, they lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword. [about him:

22 Asshur is there and all her company: his graves are
All of them slain, fallen by the sword:

23 Whose graves are set in the sides of the pit,
And her company is round about her grave:
All of them slain, fallen by the sword,
Which caused terror in the land of the living. [grave,

24 There is Elam and all her multitude round about her
All of them slain, fallen by the sword,
Which are gone down uncircumcised into the nether parts of the earth,
Which caused their terror in the land of the living;
Yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit.

25 They have set her a bed in the midst of the slain
With all her multitude: her graves are round about him:
All of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword:
Though their terror was caused in the land of the living,
Yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit:
He is put in the midst of them that be slain.

SCYTHIAN BARROWS.

26 There is Meshech, Tubal,
And all her multitude: her graves are round about him:
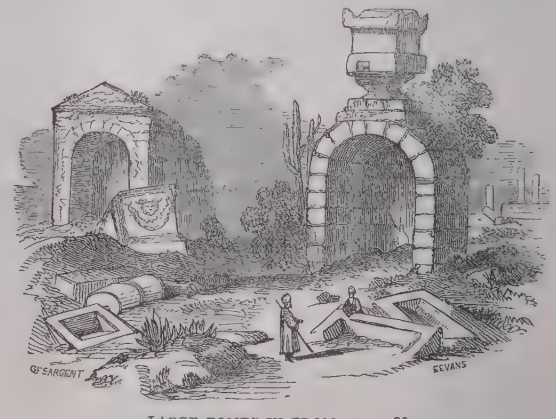
All of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword,
Though they caused their terror in the land of the living.

27 And they shall not lie with the mighty that are fallen of the uncircumcised,
Which are gone down to hell with their weapons of war:
And they have laid their swords under their heads,



LARGE TOMBS IN EDOM.—ver. 29.

But their iniquities shall be upon their bones,
Though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, [cised,
28 Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the uncircum-
And shalt lie with them that are slain with the sword.
29 There is Edom, her kings, and all her princes,
Which with their might are laid by them that were slain by the sword:
They shall lie with the uncircumcised,
And with them that go down to the pit.
30 There be the princes of the north, all of them,
And all the Zidonians, which are gone down with the slain;
With their terror they are ashamed of their might;
And they lie uncircumcised with them that be slain by the sword,
And bear their shame with them that go down to the pit.

SYRIAN TOMBS.

31 Pharaoh shall see them,
And shall be comforted over all his multitude,
Even Pharaoh and all his army slain by the sword, saith the Lord GOD.
32 For I have caused my terror in the land of the living:
And he shall be laid in the midst of the uncircumcised
With them that are slain with the sword,
Even Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord GOD.

This prophecy concludes and completes the burthen of Egypt, and leaves it, and all its multitude, in the pit of destruction.

First. We are here invited to attend the funeral of that once flourishing kingdom, to lament its fall, and to take a view of those who attend it to the grave, and accompany it in the grave. This dead corpse of a kingdom is here,

1. Brought to the grave. The prophet is ordered to cast them down to the pit, ver. 18; to foretell it as one that had authority, as Jeremiah was set over the kingdom, Jer. i. 10. He must speak in God's name, and as from him who will cast them down; yet he must foretell it as one that had an affectionate concern for them; he must wail for the multitude of Egypt, even when he casts them down. When Egypt is slain, let her have an honourable funeral befitting her quality; let her be buried with the daughters of the famous nations, in their burying-places, and with the same ceremony. It is but a poor allay to the reproach and terror of death to be buried with those that were famous; yet this is all that is allowed to Egypt. Shall Egypt think to exempt herself from the common fate of proud and imperious nations? No; she must take her lot with them; ver. 19, "Whom dost thou pass in beauty?" Art thou so much fairer than any other nation that thou shouldest expect therefore to be excused? No; others, as fair as thou, are sunk into the pit. Go down, therefore, and be thou laid with the uncircumcised; thou art like them, and art likely to lie among them. The multitude of Egypt shall all "fall in the midst of them that are slain with the sword." Now there is a general slaughter made among the nations, Egypt, with the rest, must drink of the bloody cup, and therefore she is delivered to the sword, to the sword of war; but in God's hand the sword of justice is delivered to be publicly executed. Draw her and all her multitude; either draw them as the dead bodies of great men are drawn in honour to the grave in a hearse, or as malefactors are drawn in disgrace to the place of execution on a sledge; draw them to the pit, and let them be made a spectacle to the world.

2. This corpse of a kingdom is bid welcome to the grave, and Pharaoh is made free of the congregation of the dead, and admitted into their regions, not without some pomp and ceremony, as Isa. xiv. 9, &c. The surprising fall of the king of Babylon is thus illustrated, "Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming," and to introduce thee into those mansions of darkness; so here, ver. 20, "They shall speak to him out of the midst of hell," as it were congratulating his arrival, and calling him to join with them in acknowledging that name which neither he nor they would be brought to own, when they were in their pomp and pride,—that it is in vain to think of contesting with God, and none ever hardened their hearts against him and prospered. They shall say to him, and to him that pretended to help him, Where are ye now? What have you brought your attempts to at last? Divers nations are here mentioned as gone down to the grave before Egypt, that are ready to give her a scornful reception, and upbraid her with coming to them at last. These nations here spoken of were probably such as had been of late years ruined and wasted by the king of Babylon, and their princes cut off; let Egypt know that she has neighbours' fare. When she goes to the grave she doth but migrare ad plures,—'migrate to the majority;' there are innumerable before her. But it is observable that, though Judah and Jerusalem were just about this time, or a little before, utterly ruined and laid waste, yet they are not mentioned here among the nations that welcome Egypt to the pit; for though they suffered the same things that this nation suffered, and by the same hand, yet the kind intentions of their affliction, and its happy issue at last, and the mercy God had yet in reserve for them, altered the property of it: it was not to them a going down to the pit, as it was to the heathen; they were not smitten as others were, nor "slain according to the slaughter of other nations," Isa. xxvii. 7. But let us see who they are that are gone to the grave before Egypt, that "lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword," with whom she must now take up her lodging.

1st. There lies the Assyrian empire, and all the princes and mighty men of that monarchy; ver. 22, "Asshur is there and all her company;" all the countries that were tributaries to, and had dependence upon, that crown. That mighty potentate, that used to lie in state with his guards and grandees about him, now lies in obscurity, with his graves about him, and his soldiers in them, unable any longer to do him service or honour; they are "all of them slain, fallen by the sword." The number of their months was cut off in the midst, and, being bloody and deceitful men, they were not suffered to live out half their days. Their "graves were set in the sides of the pit," all in a row, like beds in a common chamber, ver. 23. All their company is such as were slain, fallen by the sword; a vast congregation there is of such, who had caused terror in the land of the living. But, as the death of those to whom they were a terror put an end to their fears, (in the grave the "prisoners rest together," and hear not the "voice of the oppressor," Job iii. 18,) so the death of these mighty men puts an end to their terrors. Who is afraid of a dead lion? Note, Death will be a king of terrors to those who, instead of making themselves blessings, made themselves terrors in their generation.

2nd. There lies the kingdom of Persia, which, perhaps within the memory of man at that time, had been wasted and brought down. "There is Elam and all her multitude," the king of Elam and his numerous armies, ver. 24, 25; they also had caused their terror in the land of the living, had made a fearful noise and bluster among the nations in their day. But Elam has now a grave by herself, and the graves of the common people round about her, fallen by the sword; she has her bed in the midst of the slain that went down uncircumcised, unsanctified, unholy, and not in covenant with God. They have "borne their shame with them that go down to the pit;" that is, they are fallen under the common disgrace and mortification of mankind, that they die and are buried; nay, they die under particular marks of ignominy which God and man put upon them. Note, They who cause their terror shall, sooner or later, bear their shame, and be made a terror to themselves. The king of Elam is "put in the midst of them that be slain." All the honour he can pretend to is to be buried in the chief sepulchre.

3rd. There lies the Scythian power, which about this time was busy in the world. Meshech and Tubal, those barbarous northern nations, had lately made a descent upon the Medes, and caused their terror among them, lived among them upon free quarter for some years, making every thing their own they could lay their hands on; but at length Cyaxares, king of the Medes, drew them by a wile into his power, cut off abundance of them, and obliged them to quit his country, ver. 26. There lie Meshech and Tubal, and all their multitude; there is a burying-place for them, with their chief commander in the midst of them, "all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword." These Scythians, dying ingloriously, as they lived, are not laid as the other nations spoken of before, in the bed of honour; ver. 27, "They shall not lie with the mighty," shall not be buried in state as those are, even by consent of the enemy, that are slain in the field of battle, that go down to their grave with their weapons of war carried before the hearse, or trailed after it, that have particularly "their swords laid under their heads," as if they could sleep sweeter in the grave when they laid their heads on such a pillow. These Scythians are not buried with these marks of honour, but "their iniquities shall be upon their sons;" they shall for their iniquity be left unburied, though they were the terror even of the mighty in the land of the living.

4th. There lies the kingdom of Edom, which had flourished long, but about this time, at least before the destruction of Egypt, was made quite desolate, as was foretold, ch. xxv. 13. Among the sepulchres of the nations there is Edom, ver. 29. There lie, not dignified with monuments or inscriptions, but mingled with common dust, "her kings and all her princes," her wise statesmen, (which Edom was famous for,) and her brave soldiers; these, "with their might, are laid by them that were slain by the sword." Their might could not prevent it, nay, their might helped to procure it, for that both encouraged them to engage in war and incensed their neighbours against them, who thought it necessary to curb their growing greatness. A deal of pains they took to ruin themselves, as many do, who with their might, with all their might, are laid by them that are slain with the sword. The Edomites retained circumcision, being of the seed of Abraham; but that shall stand them in no stead, they shall lie with the uncircumcised.

5th. There lie the "princes of the north," and all the Sidonians. These were as well acquainted with maritime affairs as the Egyptians were, who relied much upon that part of their strength; but they are gone down with the slain, ver. 30, down to the pit. Now they are ashamed of their might, ashamed to think how much they boasted of it and trusted to it; and, as the Edomites with their might, so these with their terror, are laid with them that are slain by the sword, and are forced to take their lot with them. They "bear their shame with them that go down to the pit," die in as much disgrace as those that are cut off by the hand of public justice.

6th. All this is applied to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who have no reason to flatter themselves with hope of tranquillity, when they see how the wisest, and wealthiest, and strongest of their neighbours have been laid waste; ver. 28, "Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the uncircumcised." When God is pulling down the unhumbled and unreformed nations, thou must expect to come down with them. First. It will be some extenuation of the miseries of Egypt to observe that it has been the case of so many great and mighty nations before; ver. 31, "Pharaoh shall see them and be comforted." It will be some ease to his mind that he is not the first king that has been slain in battle, his not the first army that has been routed, his not the first kingdom that has been made desolate. Mr. Greenhill observes here, 'that the comfort which wicked ones have after death is poor comfort, not real, but imaginary.' They will find little satisfaction in having so many fellow-sufferers; the rich man in hell dreaded it. It is only in point of honour that Pharaoh can "see and be comforted." Secondly. But nothing will be an exemption from these miseries; for, ver. 33, "I have caused my terror in the land of the living." Great men have caused their terror, have studied how to make every body fear them; Oderint dum metuant,—'Let them hate, so that they do but fear.' But now the grace of God hath "caused his terror in the land of the living," and therefore he laughs at theirs, because he sees that his day is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 13. In this day of terror "Pharaoh and all his multitude" shall be "laid with them that are slain with the sword."

Secondly. The view which this prophecy gives us of ruined states may shew us something, 1. Of this present world and the empire of death in it. Come and see the calamitous state of human life, see what a dying world this is; the strong die, the mighty die, "Pharaoh and all his multitude." See what a killing world this is, they are "all slain with the sword." As if men did not die fast enough of themselves, men are ingenious at finding out ways to destroy one another. It is not only a great pit, but a great cock-pit. 2. Of the other world. Though it is the destruction of nations as such that is perhaps principally intended here, yet here is a plain allusion to the final and everlasting ruin of impenitent sinners, of those that are uncircumcised in heart: they are slain by the sword of Divine justice; their iniquity is upon them, and with it they bear their shame. Those of Christ's enemies that would not have him to reign over them shall be brought forth and slain before him, though they be as pompous, though they be as numerous, as "Pharaoh and all his multitude."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The prophet is now come off his circuit, which he went, as judge in God's name, to try and pass sentence upon the neighbour nations; and having finished with them, and read them all their doom in the eight chapters foregoing, he now returns to the children of his people, and receives farther instructions what to say to them. I. He must let them know what office he was in among them as a prophet; that he was a watchman, and had received a charge concerning them, for which he was accountable, ver. 1—9; the substance of this they had before, ch. iii. 17, &c. II. He must let them know upon what terms they stand with God; that they were upon their trial, upon their good behaviour, that if a wicked man repent he shall not perish, but if a righteous man apostatize he shall perish, ver. 10—20. III. Here is a particular message sent to those who yet remained in the land of Israel, and (which is very strange) grew secure there, and confident that they should take root there again, to tell them that their hopes would fail them, because they persisted in their sins, ver. 21—29. IV. Here is a rebuke to those who personally attended Ezekiel's ministry, but were not sincere in their professions of devotion, ver. 30—33.

AGAIN the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, speak to the children of thy people, and say unto them,

When I bring the sword upon a land,
If the people of the land take a man of their coasts,
And set him for their watchman:
3 If when he seeth the sword come upon the land,
He blow the trumpet, and warn the people;
4 Then whosoever heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning;
If the sword come, and take him away,
His blood shall be upon his own head.
5 He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning;
His blood shall be upon him.
But he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul.
6 But if the watchman see the sword come,
And blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned;
If the sword come, and take any person from among them,
He is taken away in his iniquity;
But his blood will I require at the watchman's hand.
7 So thou, O son of man,
I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel;
Therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me. [surely die;
8 When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt
If thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way,
That wicked man shall die in his iniquity;
But his blood will I require at thine hand.
9 Nevertheless, if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; [quity;
If he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his ini-
But thou hast delivered thy soul.

The prophet had been by express order from God taken off from prophesying to the Jews, just then when the news came that Jerusalem was invested, and close siege laid to it, ch. xxiv. 27. But now Jerusalem is taken, two years after, he is appointed again to direct his speech to them; and here his commission is renewed. If God had abandoned them quite he would not have sent prophets to them; nor, if he had not had mercy in store for them, would he have "shewed them such things as these." In these verses we have,

First. The office of a watchman laid down, the trust reposed in him, the charge given him, and the conditions adjusted between him and those that employ him, ver. 2—6.

1. It is supposed to be a public danger that gives occasion for the appointing of a watchman, when "God brings the sword upon a land," ver. 2. The sword of war, whenever it comes upon a land, is of God's bringing; it is "the sword of the Lord," of his justice, how unjustly soever men draw it. At such a time, when a country is in fear of a foreign invasion, that they may be informed of all the motions of the enemy, may not be surprised with an attack, but may have early notice of it, in order to their being at their arms, and in readiness to give the invader a warm reception, they "set a man of their coast," some likely person that lives upon the borders of their country, where the threatened danger is expected, and is therefore well acquainted with all the avenues of it, and make him their watchman. Thus wise are the "children of this world in their generation." Note, One man may be of public service to a whole country. Princes and statesmen are the watchmen of a kingdom, that are continually to employ themselves, and, if occasion be, as watchmen, to expose themselves for the public safety.

2. It is supposed to be a public trust that is lodged in the watchman, and that he is accountable to the public for the discharge of it. His business is, 1st. To discover the approaches and advances of the enemy, and therefore he must not be blind or asleep, for then he cannot see the sword coming. 2nd. To give notice of them immediately by sound of trumpet, or, as sentinels among us, by the discharge of a gun, as a signal of danger. A special trust and confidence is reposed in him by those that set him to be their watchman, that he will faithfully do these two things, and they venture their lives upon his fidelity. Now, First. If he do his part, if he be betimes aware of all the dangers that fall within his cognizance, and give warning of them, he has discharged his trust, and has not only delivered his soul but earned his wages. If the people do not take warning, if they either will not believe the notice he gives them, will not believe the danger to be so great or so near as really it is, or will not regard it, and so are surprised by the enemy in their security, it is their own fault; the blame is not to be laid upon the watchman, but their blood is upon their own heads. If any person goes presumptuously into the mouth of danger, though he heard the sound of the trumpet, and was told by it where the danger was, and so the sword comes and takes him away in his folly, he is felo de se, a foolish man, he has destroyed himself. But, Secondly. If the watchman do not do his duty, if he might have seen the danger and did not, but was asleep, or heedless, or looking another way, or if he did see the danger, (for so the case is put here,) and shifted only for his own safety, and "blew not the trumpet" to "warn the people," so that some are surprised and cut off "in their iniquity," ver. 6, cut off suddenly, without having time to cry, Lord, have mercy upon me, time to repent and make their peace with God, which makes the matter much the worse, that the poor creature is "taken away in his iniquity," his blood shall be required at the watchman's hands; he shall be found guilty of his death, because he did not give him warning of his danger. But if the watchman do his part, and the people do theirs, all is well; both he that gives warning and he that takes warning has delivered his soul.

Secondly. The application of this to the prophet, ver. 7—9.

1. He is "a watchman to the house of Israel." He had occasionally given warning to the nations about, but to the house of Israel he was a watchman by office, for they were the children of the prophets and the covenant. They did not set him for a watchman, as the people of the land did, ver. 2; for they were not so wise for their souls to secure the welfare of them as they would have been for the protection of their temporal interests; but God did it for them,—he appointed them a watchman.

2. His business, as a watchman, is to give warning to sinners of their misery and danger by reason of sin. This is the word he must "hear from God's mouth," and speak to them. 1st. God hath said that the wicked man shall surely die, he shall be miserable; unless he repent he shall be cut off from God, and all comfort and hope in him, shall be cut off from all good. He shall fall and lie for ever under the wrath of God, which is the death of the soul, as his favour is its life. The righteous God hath said it, and will never unsay it, nor can all the world gainsay it, that "the wages of sin is death; sin, when it is finished, brings forth death." The wrath of God is revealed from heaven, not only against wicked nations, speaking ruin to them as nations, but against wicked persons, speaking ruin to them in their personal capacities, their personal interests, which pass into the other world and last to eternity, as national interests do not. 2nd. It is the will of God that the wicked man should be warned of this. "Warn them from me," which intimates that there is a possibility of preventing it, else it were a jest to give warning of it; nay, and that God is desirous it should be prevented. Sinners are therefore warned of the wrath to come, that they may flee from it, Mat. iii. 7. 3rd. It is the work of ministers to give them warning, to say to the wicked, "It shall be ill with them," Isa. iii. 11. God saith in general, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." The minister's business is to apply this to particular persons, and to say, "O wicked man, thou shalt surely die," whoever thou art; if thou go on still in thy trespasses they will inevitably prove thy ruin. O adulterer, O robber, O drunkard, O swearer, O sabbath-breaker, "thou shalt surely die!" And he must say this, not in passion, to provoke the sinner, but in compassion, to "warn the wicked from his way," warn him to turn from it, that he may live. This is to be done by the faithful preaching of the word in public, and by personal application to those whose sins are open.

3. If souls perish through his neglect of his duty, he brings guilt upon himself. If the prophet do not warn the wicked of the ruin that is at the end of his wicked way, that "wicked man shall die in his iniquity;" for, though the watchman did not do his part, yet the sinner might have taken warning from the written word, from his own conscience, and from God's judgments upon others, by which his mouth shall be stopped, and God will be justified in his destruction. Note, It will not serve impenitent sinners to plead in the great day that their watchman did not give them warning, that they were careless and unfaithful; for, though they were so, it will be made to appear that "God left not himself without witness." But he shall not perish alone in his iniquity, the watchman also shall be called to an account; "His blood will I require at thy hand." The blind leader shall fall with the blind follower into the ditch. See what a desire God has of the salvation of sinners, in that he resents it so ill if those concerned do not what they can to prevent their destruction. And see what a great deal those ministers have to answer for another day who palliate sin and flatter sinners in their evil way, and by their wicked lives countenance and harden them in their wickedness, and encourage them to believe they shall have peace though they go on.

4. If he do his duty he may take the comfort of it, though he do not see the success of it; ver. 9, "If thou warn the wicked of his way," if thou tell him faithfully what will be the end thereof, and call him earnestly to turn from it, and he do not turn, but persist in it, "he shall die in his iniquity," and the fair warning given him will be an aggravation of his sin and ruin; "but thou hast delivered thy soul." Note, It is a comfort to ministers that they may, through grace, save themselves, though they cannot be instrumental to save so many as they wish of those that hear them.

10 Therefore, O thou son of man, speak unto the house of Israel;
Thus ye speak, saying,
If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them,
How should we then live?

11 Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked;
But that the wicked turn from his way and live:
Turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways;
For why will ye die, O house of Israel? [people,
12 Therefore, thou son of man, say unto the children of thy
The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him
In the day of his transgression: [thereby
As for the wickedness of the wicked, he shall not fall
In the day that he turneth from his wickedness;
Neither shall the righteous be able to live for his right-
In the day that he sinneth. [eousness
13 When I shall say to the righteous, that he shall surely live;
If he trust to his own righteousness, and commit iniquity,
All his righteousnesses shall not be remembered;
But for his iniquity that he hath committed, he shall die for it.
14 Again, when I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die;
If he turn from his sin, and do that which is lawful and 15 If the wicked restore the pledge, [right;
Give again that he had robbed,
Walk in the statutes of life, without committing iniquity;
He shall surely live, he shall not die.
16 None of his sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him: [surely live.
He hath done that which is lawful and right; he shall 17 Yet the children of thy people say, The way of the Lord is not equal:
But as for them, their way is not equal.
18 When the righteous turneth from his righteousness,
And committeth iniquity,
He shall even die thereby.
19 But if the wicked turn from his wickedness,
And do that which is lawful and right,
He shall live thereby.
20 Yet ye say, The way of the Lord is not equal.
O ye house of Israel, I will judge you every one after his ways.

These verses are the substance of what we had before, ch. xviii. 20, &c., and they are so full and express a declaration of the terms on which people stand with God, as the former were of the terms on which ministers stand, that it is no wonder they are here repeated, as those were, though we had the substance of them before. Observe here,

First. The cavils of the people against God's proceedings with them. God was now, in his providence, contending with them, but their uncircumcised hearts were not as yet humbled; for they were industrious to justify themselves, though thereby they reflected on God. Two things are insisted upon in their reproaches of God, and in both they added iniquity to their sin, and misery to their punishment.

1. They quarrelled with his promises and favours, as having no kindness or sincerity in them, ver. 10. God had "set life before them," but they plead that he had set it out of their reach, and therefore did but mock them with the mention of it. The prophet had said some time ago, ch. xxiv. 23, "Ye shall pine away for your iniquities;" with that word he concluded his threatenings against Judah and Jerusalem, and this they now upbraided him with, as if it had been spoken absolutely to drive them to despair, whereas it was spoken conditionally, to bring them to repentance. Thus are the sayings of God's ministers perverted by men of corrupt minds, who are minded to pick quarrels. He puts them in hopes of life and happiness, and herein they would make him contradict himself; for (say they) "If our transgressions and our sins be upon us," as thou hast often told us they are; and if we must, as thou sayest, pine away in them, and wear out a miserable captivity in a fruitless repentance, "how shall we then live?" If this be our doom there is no remedy; we die, we perish, we all perish. Note, It is very common for those that have been hardened with presumption, when they are warned against sin, to sink into despair when they are called to repent, and to conclude there is no hope of life for them.

2. They quarrelled with his threatenings and judgments, as having no justice or equity in them. They said, "The way of the Lord is not equal," ver. 17, and again ver. 20; suggesting that God was partial in his proceedings, and that with him there was respect of persons, and he was more severe against sin and sinners than there was cause.

Secondly. Here is a satisfactory answer given to both these cavils.

1. Those that despaired of finding mercy with God are here answered with a solemn declaration of God's readiness to shew mercy, ver. 11. When they spoke of pining away in their iniquity, God sends the prophet to them with all speed to tell them that, though their case was sad, yet it was not desperate, but there was yet hope in Israel. 1st. It is certain that God has no delight in the ruin of sinners, nor doth he desire it. If they will destroy themselves he will glorify himself in it, but he has no pleasure in it, but would rather they should turn and live; for his goodness is that attribute of his which is most his glory, which is most his delight. He would rather sinners should turn and live than go on and die. He hath said it, he hath sworn it, that by these two immutable things, in both which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation. We have his word and his oath; and, since he could swear by no greater, he swears by himself, "As I live." They question whether they should live, though they did repent and reform; Yea, saith God, as sure as I live true penitents shall live also; for their life is hid with Christ in God. 2nd. It is certain that God is sincere and in earnest in the calls he gives sinners to repent; "Turn ye, turn ye from your evil way." To repent is to turn from our evil way. This God requires sinners to do, this he urgeth them to do, by repeated, pressing instances, "Turn ye, turn ye." O that they would be prevailed with to turn, to turn quickly without delay! This he will enable them to do, if they will but "frame their doings to turn to the Lord," Hos. v. 4: for he hath said, "I will pour out my Spirit unto you," Pr. i. 23. And in this he will accept of them, for it is not only what he commands, but what he courts them to. 3rd. It is certain that if sinners perish in their impenitency it is owing to themselves. They die because they will die; and herein they act most absurdly and unreasonably; "Why will ye die, O house of Israel?" God would have heard them, and they would not be heard.

2. Those that despaired of finding justice with God are here answered with a solemn declaration of the rule of judgment which God would go by in dealing with the children of men, which carries along with it the evidence of his own equity; he that runs may read the justice of it. The Jewish nation, as a nation, was now dead, it was ruined to all intents and purposes. The prophet must therefore deal with particular persons, and the rule of judging concerning them is much like that concerning a nation, Jer. xviii. 7—10. If God speak concerning it to build and to plant, if it do wickedly he will recall his favours, and leave it to ruin; but if he speak concerning it to pluck up and destroy, and it repent, he will revoke the sentence, and deliver it: so it is here. In short, the most plausible professors, if they apostatize, shall certainly perish for ever in their apostacy from God; and the most notorious sinners, if they repent, shall certainly be happy for ever in their return to God. This is here repeated again and again, because it ought to be again and again considered, and preached over to our own hearts. This was necessary to be inculcated upon this senseless, stupid people, that said, "The way of the Lord is not equal;" for these rules of judgment are so plainly just that they need no other confirmation of them but the repetition of them.

1st. If those that have made a great profession of religion throw off their profession, quit the good ways of God, and grow loose, and carnal, and sensual, and worldly, the profession they made, and all the religious performances with which they had for a great while kept up the credit of their profession, shall stand them in no stead, but they shall certainly perish in their iniquity, ver. 12, 13, 18. First. God doth say to the righteous man that he shall surely live, ver. 13. He saith it by his word, by his ministers. He that lives regularly, his own heart tells him, his neighbours tell him, he shall live. Sure such a man as this cannot but be happy. And it is certain, if he proceed and persevere in his righteousness, and if in order to that he be upright and sincere in it, if he be really as good as he seems to be, he shall live; he shall continue in the love of God, and be for ever happy in that love. Secondly. Righteous men that have very good hopes of themselves, and that others have a very good opinion of, yet are in danger of turning to iniquity by trusting to their righteousness. So the case is put here: "If he trust to his own righteousness, and commit iniquity," and come to make a trade of sin; if he not only take a false step, but turn aside into a false way, and persist in it. This may possibly be the case of a righteous man, and it is the effect of his trusting to his own righteousness. Note, Many eminent professors have been ruined by a proud conceitedness of themselves, and confidence in themselves. He trusts to the merit of his own righteousness, and thinks he has already made God so much his debtor that now he may venture to commit iniquity, for he has righteousness enough in stock to make amends for it; he fancies that, whatever ill deeds he may do hereafter, he can be in no danger by them, having so many good deeds beforehand to balance them. Or, he trusts to the strength of his own righteousness, thinks himself now so well established in a course of virtue, that he may thrust himself into any temptation and it cannot overcome him; and so, by presuming on his own sufficiency, he is brought to commit iniquity. By making bold on the confines of sin he is drawn at length into the depths of hell. This ruined the Pharisees; they trusted to themselves that they were righteous, and that their long prayers, and fasting twice in the week, would atone for their devouring widows' houses. Thirdly. If righteous men turn to iniquity, and return not to their righteousness, they shall certainly perish in their iniquity, and all the righteousness they have formerly done, all their prayers, and all their alms, shall be forgotten; no mention shall be made, no remembrance had, of their good deeds, they shall be overlooked as they had never been. The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him from the wrath of God and the curse of the law in the day of his transgression. When he becomes a traitor and a rebel, and takes up arms against his rightful sovereign, it will not serve for him to plead in his own defence that formerly he was a loyal subject, and did many good services to the government. No, "he shall not be able to live;" the remembrance of his former righteousness shall be no satisfaction either to God's justice or his own conscience, in the day that he sinneth; but rather shall both highly aggravate the sin and folly of his apostacy. And therefore "for his iniquity that he committed he shall die," ver. 13; and again, ver. 18, "He shall even die thereby," and it is owing to himself.

2nd. If those that have lived a wicked life repent and reform, forsake their wicked ways, and become religious, their sins shall be pardoned, and they shall be justified and saved, if they persevere in their reformation. First. God saith to the wicked, "Thou shalt surely die;" the way that thou art in leads to destruction; the wages of thy sin is death, and thine iniquity will shortly be thy ruin. It was said to the righteous man, "Thou shalt surely live," for his encouragement to proceed and persevere in the way of righteousness, but he made an ill use of it, and was emboldened by it to commit iniquity. It was said to the wicked man, "Thou shalt surely die," for warning to him not to persist in his wicked ways; and he makes a good use of it, and is quickened thereby to return to God and duty. Thus even the threatenings of the word are to some, by the grace of God, a savour of life unto life; while even the promises of the word become to others, by their own corruption, a savour of death unto death. When God said to the wicked man, "Thou shalt surely die," die eternally, it is not to frighten him out of his wits, but to frighten him out of his sins. Secondly. There is many a wicked man that was hastening apace to his own destruction, who yet is wrought upon by the grace of God to return and repent, and live a holy life. He turns from his sin, ver. 14, and is resolved he will have no more to do with it; and, as an evidence of his repentance for wrong done, he restores the pledge, ver. 15, which he had taken uncharitably from the poor; he gives again that which he had robbed and taken unjustly from the rich. Nor doth he only cease to do evil, but he learns to do well; he "doth that which is lawful and right," and makes conscience of his duty both to God and man. A great change, since awhile ago he neither feared God nor regarded man! But many such amazing changes, and blessed ones, have been wrought by the power of Divine grace. He that was going on in the paths of death and the destroyer now walks in the statutes of life, in the way of God's commandments, which has both life in it, Pr. xii. 28, and life at the end of it, Mat. xix. 17. And in this good way he perseveres without committing iniquity; though not free from remaining infirmity, yet under the dominion of no iniquity. He repents not of his repentance, nor returns to the commission of those gross sins he before allowed himself in. Thirdly. He that doth thus repent and turn shall escape the ruin he was running into, and his former sins shall be no prejudice to his acceptance with God. Let him not pine away in his iniquity, for if he confess and forsake it he shall find mercy; "He shall surely live, he shall not die," ver. 15; again, ver. 16, "He shall surely live;" again, ver. 19, "He hath done that which is lawful and right," and "he shall live thereby." But will not his wickednesses be remembered against him? No, he shall not be punished for them; ver. 12, "As for the wickedness of the wicked," though it was very heinous, yet "he shall not fall thereby, in the day that he turneth from his wickedness." Now it is become his grief it shall not be his ruin. Now there is a settled separation between him and sin, there shall be no longer a separation between him and God. Nay, he shall not be so much as upbraided with them; ver. 16, "None of his sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him," either as a clog to his pardon, or an allay to the comfort of it, or any blemish or diminution to the glory that is prepared for him.

Now lay all this together, and then judge whether "the way of the Lord be not equal;" whether this will not justify God in the destruction of sinners, and glorify him in the salvation of penitents. The conclusion of the whole matter is, ver. 20, O ye house of Israel, though you are all involved now in the common calamity, yet there shall be a distinction of persons made in the spiritual and eternal state, and "I will judge you every one after his ways." Though they were sent into captivity by the lump, good fish and bad inclosed in the same net, yet there he will separate between the precious and the vile, and will "render to every man according to his works." Therefore God's way is equal and unexceptionable; but as for the children of my people God turns them over to the prophet, as he did to Moses, Ex. xxxii. 7, They are thy people; I can scarce own them for mine; as for them, their way is unequal. This way they have got of quarrelling with God and his prophet is absurd and unreasonable. In all disputes between God and his creatures it will certainly be found that he is in the right and they in the wrong.

21 And it came to pass in the twelfth year of our captivity, in the tenth month, in the fifth day of the month, that one that had escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, The city is smitten. 22 Now the hand of the LORD was upon me in the evening, afore he that was escaped came; and had opened my mouth, until he came to me in the morning; and my mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb. 23 Then the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 24 Son of man, they that inhabit those wastes of the land of Israel speak, saying, Abraham was one, and he inherited the land: but we are many; the land is given us for inheritance.

25 Wherefore say unto them,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Ye eat with the blood,
And lift up your eyes toward your idols, and shed blood:
And shall ye possess the land?
26 Ye stand upon your sword,
Ye work abomination, and ye defile every one his neighbour's wife:
And shall ye possess the land?
27 Say thou thus unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
As I live, surely they that are in the wastes shall fall by the sword,
And him that is in the open field will I give to the beasts to be devoured,
And they that be in the forts and in the caves shall die of the pestilence.
28 For I will lay the land most desolate,
And the pomp of her strength shall cease;
And the mountains of Israel shall be desolate, that none shall pass through.
29 Then shall they know that I am the LORD,
When I have laid the land most desolate
Because of all their abominations which they have committed.

Here is, First. The tidings brought to Ezekiel of the burning of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The city was burned in the eleventh year of the captivity, and in the fifth month, Jer. lii. 12, 13. Tidings hereof were brought to the prophet, by one that was an eye-witness of the destruction, in the twelfth year and the tenth month, ver. 21, which was a year and almost five months after the thing was done. We may well suppose that, there being a constant correspondence, at this time more than ever, kept up between Jerusalem and Babylon, he had heard the news long before; but this was the first time he had an account of it from a refugee, from one that escaped, who could be particular, and would be pathetical, in the narration of it. And the sign given him was the coming of such a one to him as had himself narrowly escaped the flames; ch. xxiv. 26, "He that escapeth in that day shall come unto thee," to "cause thee to hear it with thine ears," to hear it more distinctly than ever from one that could say, Quæque ipse miserrima vidi,—'These miserable scenes I saw.'

Secondly. The Divine impressions and influences he was under, to prepare him for those heavy tidings; ver. 22, "The hand of the Lord was upon me before he came, and had opened my mouth," to speak to the house of Israel what he had in the former part of this chapter; and now he was no more dumb, he prophesied now with more freedom and boldness, being by the event proved a true prophet, to the confusion of those that contradicted him. All the prophesies from chapter twenty-four to this chapter having relation purely to the nations about, it is probable the prophet, when he received them from the Lord, did not deliver them by word of mouth, but in writing; for he could not otherwise say to the Ammonites, say unto Tyrus, say unto Pharaoh, &c., so and so, but by letters directed to the persons concerned; like Zacharias, when he could not speak he wrote, and herein he was as truly executing his prophetical office as ever. Note, Even silenced ministers may be doing a great deal of good by writing letters and making visits. But now the prophet's mouth is opened, that he may "speak to the children of his people." It is probable he had, during these three years, been continually speaking to them as a friend, putting them in mind of what he had formerly delivered to them, but never spoke to them as a prophet by inspiration, till now, when the hand of the Lord came upon him, renewed his commission, gave him fresh instructions, and "opened his mouth," furnished him with power to speak to the people "as he ought to speak."

Thirdly. The particular message he was intrusted with, relating to those Jews that yet remained in the land of Israel, and inhabited the wastes of that land, ver. 24. See what work sin had made; the cities of Israel were now become the wastes of Israel, for they lay all in ruins; some few that had escaped the sword and captivity still continued there, and began to think of re-settling. This was so long after the destruction of Jerusalem, that it was some time before this that Gedaliah (a modest humble man) and his friends were slain; but probably at this time Johanan, and the proud men that joined with him, were at the height, Jer. xliii. 2; and before they came to a resolution to go into Egypt, wherein Jeremiah comforted them, it is probable the project was to establish themselves in the wastes of the land of Israel, in which Ezekiel here comforted them, and probably despatched the message away by the person that brought him the news of Jerusalem's destruction. Or, perhaps those here prophesied against might be some other party of Jews that remained in the land, hoped to take root there, and to be sole masters of it after Johanan and his forces were gone into Egypt. Now here we have,

1. An account of the pride of these remaining Jews who dwell in "the wastes of the land of Israel." Though the providence of God concerning them had been very humbling, and still was very threatening, yet they were intolerably haughty and secure, and promised themselves peace. He that brought the news to the prophet that Jerusalem was smitten, could not tell (it is likely) what these people said, but God tells him, "They say the land is given us for inheritance," ver. 24. Our partners being gone, it is now all our own by survivorship; or, for want of heirs, it comes to us as occupants: we shall now be placed alone in the midst of the earth, and have it all to ourselves. This argues great stupidity under the weighty hand of God, and a reigning selfishness and a narrow-spiritedness. They pleased themselves in the ruin of their country as long as they hoped to find their own account in it; cared not though it were all waste, so that they might have the sole property,—a poor inheritance to be proud of! They have the impudence to compare their case with Abraham's, glorying in this, that we have Abraham to our father. Abraham, say they, was one, one family, and he inherited the land, and lived many years in the peaceable enjoyment of it; but we are many, many families, more numerous than he,—the land is given us for inheritance. First. They think they can make out as good a title from God to this land as Abraham could. If God gave this land to him that was but one worshipper of him, as a reward of his service, much more will he give it to us who are many worshippers of him, as the reward of our service. And this speaks the great conceit they had of their own merits, as if they were greater than those of Abraham their father, who yet was not justified by works. Secondly. They think they can make good the possession of this land against the Chaldeans, and all other invaders, as well as Abraham could against those that were competitors with him for it. If he that was but one could hold it, much more shall we, that are many, and have many more at command than his three hundred trained servants. This speaks the confidence they had in their own might; they had got possession and were resolved to keep it.

2. A check to this pride. Since God's providences did neither humble them nor terrify them, he sends them a message sufficient to do both.

1st. To humble them, he tells them of the wickedness they still persisted in, which rendered them utterly unworthy to possess this land, so that they could not expect God should give it them. They had been followed by one judgment after another, but they had not profited by those means of grace as might be expected; they were still unreformed, and how could they expect that they should possess the land? "Shall ye possess the land?" What, such wicked people as ye are! "How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land?" Jer. iii. 19. Surely you never reflect upon yourselves, else you would rather wonder that you are in the land of the living than expect to possess this land. For do you not know how bad you are? First. You make no conscience of forbidden fruit, forbidden food; you eat with the blood, directly contrary to one of the precepts given to Noah and his sons, then when God gave them possession of the earth, Gen. ix. 4. Secondly. Idolatry, that covenant-breaking sin, that sin which the jealous God has been in a particular manner provoked by to lay your country waste, is still the sin that most easily besets you, and which you have a strong inclination to. "You lift up your eyes towards your idols," which is a sign that, though perhaps you do not bow your knee to them so much as you have done, yet you set your hearts upon them, and hanker after them. Thirdly. You are as fierce, and cruel, and barbarous as ever; you shed blood, innocent blood. Fourthly. You confide in your own strength, your own arm, your own bow, and have no dependence on, or regard to, God and his providence. "Ye stand upon your sword," ver. 26; you think to carry all before you, and make all your own by force of arms. How can they expect the inheritance of Isaac, as these did, who are of Ishmael's disposition, that had "his hand against every man," Gen. xvi. 12; and Esau's resolution to "live by his sword?" Gen. xxvii. 40. We met with those, ch. xxxii. 27, who, when they died, thought they could not lie easy under-ground unless they had their swords under their heads. Here we meet with those who, while they live, think they cannot stand firm above-ground unless they have their swords under their feet; as if swords were both the softest pillows and the strongest pillars; though it was sin, it was sin, that first drew the sword. But, blessed be God, there are those who know better things, that stand upon the support of the Divine power and promise, and lay their heads in the bosom of Divine love, not trusting in their own sword, Ps. xliv. 3. Fifthly. You are guilty of all manner of abominations, and particularly "ye defile every one his neighbour's wife," which is an abomination of the first magnitude; "and shall ye possess the land?" What! such vile miscreants as you? Note, They cannot expect to possess the land, nor to enjoy any true comfort or happiness, here or hereafter, that live in rebellion against the Lord.

2nd. To terrify them, he tells them of the farther judgments God had in store for them, which should make them utterly unable to possess this land, so that they could not stand it out against the enemy. Do they say they shall possess the land? No; God hath said it, he hath sworn it. As I live, saith the Lord. Though he has sworn that he delights not in the death of sinners, yet he hath sworn also, that those who persist in impenitency and unbelief "shall not enter into his rest." First. They that are in the cities, here called the "wastes," shall "fall by the sword;" either by the sword of the Chaldeans, who come to avenge the murder of Gedaliah, or by one another's swords in their intestine broils. Secondly. They that are in the open field shall be devoured by wild beasts, which swarmed of course in the country when it was dispeopled, and there were none to master them, and keep them under, Ex. xxiii. 29. When the army of the enemy had quitted the country yet still there was no safety in it. Noisome beasts was one of the four sore judgments, ch. xiv. 15. Thirdly. They that be in the forts, and in the caves, that think themselves safe in artificial or natural fastnesses, because men's eyes cannot discover them, nor men's darts reach them, there the arrows of the Almighty shall find them out; they "shall die of the pestilence." Fourthly. The whole land, even the land of Israel, that had been the glory of all lands, shall be most desolate, ver. 28. It shall be desolation, desolation, all over as desolate as desolation itself can make it. The mountains of Israel, the fruitful mountains, Zion itself, the holy mountain not excepted, "shall be desolate," the roads unfrequented, the houses uninhabited, that "none shall pass through," as it was threatened, Deu. xxviii. 62, "Ye shall be left few in number." Fifthly. The "pomp of her strength," whatever she glories in as her pomp, and trusts to as her strength, it shall be made to cease. Sixthly. The cause of all this was very bad; it is for "all their abominations which they have committed." It is sin that doth all this mischief, that makes nations desolate, and therefore we ought to call it an abomination. Seventhly. Yet the effect of all this will be very good. "Then shall they know that I am the Lord," am their Lord, and shall return to their allegiance, "when I have made the land most desolate." Those are untractable, unteachable indeed, that are not made to know their dependence upon God when all their creature comforts fail them and are made desolate.

30 Also, thou son of man,
The children of thy people still are talking against thee
By the walls and in the doors of the houses,
And speak one to another, every one to his brother, saying,
Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word
That cometh forth from the LORD.
31 And they come unto thee as the people cometh,
And they sit before thee as my people,
And they hear thy words, but they will not do them:
For with their mouth they shew much love,
But their heart goeth after their covetousness.
32 And, lo, thou art unto them as a very lovely song
Of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument:
For they hear thy words, but they do them not.
33 And when this cometh to pass, (lo, it will come,)
Then shall they know that a prophet hath been among them.

The foregoing verses spoke conviction to the Jews who remained in the land of Israel, who were monuments of sparing mercy and yet returned not to the Lord. In these verses those are reproved who are now in captivity in Babylon, under Divine rebukes, and yet were not reformed by them. They are not indeed charged with the same gross enormities that the others are charged with. They made some show of religion and devotion, but their hearts were not right with God. The thing they are accused of is, mocking the messengers of the Lord, one of their measure-filling sins, which brought this ruin upon them, and yet they were not cured of it. Two ways they mocked the prophet Ezekiel.

First. By invidious, ill-natured reflections upon him, privately among themselves, endeavouring, by all means possible, to render him despicable. The prophet did not know it, but charitably thought that they who spoke so well to him to his face, with so much seeming respect and deference, surely would not speak ill of him behind his back. But God comes and tells him, "The children of thy people still are talking against thee," ver. 30, or talking no good of thee, I doubt. Note, Public persons are a common theme or subject of discourse, every one takes a liberty to censure them at pleasure; and faithful ministers know not how much ill is said of them every day. It is well they do not; for, if they did, it might prove a discouragement to them in their work not to be easily got over. But God takes notice of all that is said against his ministers,—not only what is decreed against them, or sworn against them,—not only what is written against them, or spoken with solemnity and deliberation,—but what is said against them in common talk among neighbours when they meet in an evening, "by the walls, and in the doors of their houses," where, whatever freedom of speech they use, if they reproach and slander any of God's ministers, God will reckon with them for it; his prophets shall not be made the song of the drunkards always. They had no crime to lay to the prophet's charge, but they loved to talk of him in a careless, scornful, bantering way; they said jokingly, "Come, and let us hear what is the word that cometh forth from the Lord." Perhaps it will be somewhat new, and will entertain us, and furnish us with matter of discourse. Note, Those have arrived to a great pitch of profaneness that can make so great a privilege, and so great a duty, as the preaching and hearing of the word of God a matter of sport and ridicule; yea, though it be not done publicly, but in private conversation among themselves. Serious things should be spoken of seriously.

Secondly. By dissembling with him in their attendance upon his ministry. Hypocrites mock God, and mock his prophets; but their hypocrisy is open before God, and the day is coming when, as here, it will be laid open. Observe here,

1. The plausible profession which these people made, and the speciousness of their pretensions. They are like those, Mat. xv. 8, who "draw nigh to God with their mouths, and honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him." 1st. They were diligent and constant in their attendance upon the means of grace. "They come unto thee as the people cometh." In Babylon they had no temple or synagogue, but they went to the prophet's house, ch. viii. 1, and there, it is probable, they spent their new moons and their sabbaths in religious exercises, 2 Kin. iv. 23. When the prophet was bound, the word of the Lord was not bound; and the people, when they had not the help for their souls they wished for, were thankful for what they had,—it was a reviving in their bondage. Now these hypocrites came "according to the coming of the people," as duly and as early as any of the prophet's hearers. Their being said to come as the people came seems to intimate that the reason why they came was, because other people came. They did not come out of conscience towards God, but only for company, for fashion sake, and because it was now the custom of their countrymen. Note, Those that have no inward principle of love to God's ordinances may yet be found much in the external observation of them. Cain brought his sacrifice as well as Abel, and the Pharisee went up to the temple to pray as well as the publican. 2nd. They behaved themselves very decently and reverently in the public assembly. There were none of them whispering, or laughing, or gazing about them, or sleeping; but "They sit before thee as my people," with all the shows of gravity, and sereneness, and composure of mind; they sit out the time without weariness, or wishing the sermon done. 3rd. They were very attentive to the word preached. They are not thinking of something else, but they "hear thy words," and take notice of what thou sayest. 4th. They pretended to have a great kindness and respect for the prophet. Though behind his back they could not give him a good word, yet to his face they shewed much love to him and his doctrine; they pretended to have a great concern lest he should spend himself too much in preaching, or expose himself to the Chaldeans, for they would be thought to be some of his best friends, and well-wishers. 5th. They took a great deal of pleasure in the word. They "delighted to know God's word," Isa. lviii. 2. (Herod heard John Baptist gladly, Mar. vi. 20.) "Thou art unto them as a very lovely song." Ezekiel's matter was surprising, his language fine, his expressions elegant, his similitudes apt, his voice tuneable, and his delivery graceful; so that they could sit with as much pleasure to hear him preach, as (if I may speak in the language of our times) to see a play or an opera, or to hear a concert of music. Ezekiel was to them as one that had a pleasant voice, and could sing well, or play well on an instrument. Note, It is possible men may have their fancies pleased by the word, and yet not have their consciences touched, nor their hearts changed; the itching ear gratified, and yet not the corrupt nature sanctified.

2. The hypocrisy of these professions and pretensions. It is all a sham, it is all a jest. 1st. They have no cordial affection for the word of God. While they shew much love, it is only with the mouth, from the teeth outward, but "their heart goeth after their covetousness;" they are as much set upon the world as ever, as much in love and league with it as ever. Hearing the word is only their diversion and recreation, a pretty amusement now and then for an hour or two. But still their main business is with their farm and merchandise, the bent and bias of their souls is towards them, and their inward thoughts are employed in projects about them. Note, Covetousness is the ruining sin of multitudes that make a great profession of religion; it is the love of the world that secretly eats the love of God out of their hearts. The cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, are the thorns that choke the seed, and choke the soul too. And those neither please God nor profit themselves, who, when they are hearing the word of God, are musing upon their worldly affairs. God has his eye on the hearts that do so. 2nd. They yield no subjection to it. They hear thy words, but it is only a hearing they give thee, for they will not do them, ver. 31; and again, ver. 32, they do them not. They will not be persuaded by all the prophet can say, either by authority or argument, to cross themselves in any instance, to part with any one beloved sin, or apply themselves to any one duty that is against the grain to flesh and blood. Note, There are many who take pleasure in hearing the word, but make no conscience of doing it; and so they build upon the sand, and deceive themselves.

Lastly. Let us see what will be in the end hereof. Shall their unbelief and carelessness "make the word of God of none effect?" By no means. 1st. God will confirm the prophet's word, though they contemn it, and make light of it, ver. 33. What he saith will come to pass, and not one jot or one tittle shall fall to the ground. Note, The curses of the law, though they may be bantered by profane wits, yet they cannot be baffled. 2nd. They themselves shall rue their folly when it is too late. When it comes to pass they shall know, shall know to their cost, know to their confusion, that "a prophet hath been among them," though they made no more of him than as one that had a pleasant voice. Note, Those who will not consider that a prophet is among them, and improve not the day of their visitation while it is continued, will be made to remember that a prophet has been among them, when the things that belong to their peace are hid from their eyes. The day is coming when vain and worldly men will have other thoughts of things than now they have, and will feel a weight in that which they made light of. They shall know "a prophet hath been among them," when they see the event exactly answer the prediction, and the prophet himself shall be a witness against them that they had fair warning given them, but would not take it. When Ezekiel is gone, whom now they speak against, and there is no more any prophet, nor any to shew them how long, then they will remember that once they had a prophet, but knew not how to use him well. Note, Those that will not know the worth of mercies by the improvement of them, will justly be made to know the worth of them by the want of them; as they who should desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, which now they slighted, and might not see it.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The iniquities and calamities of God's Israel had been largely and pathetically lamented before in this book. Now in this chapter the shepherds of Israel, their rulers both in church and state, are called to an account, as having been very much accessary to the sin and ruin of Israel, by their neglect to do the duty of their place. Here is, I. a high charge exhibited against them for their negligence, their unskilfulness, and unfaithfulness in the management of public affairs, ver. 1—6; and again, ver. 8. II. Their discharge from their trust for their insufficiency and treachery, ver. 7—10. III. A gracious promise that God would take care of his flock, though they did not, and that it should not always suffer as it had done by their maladministrations, ver. 11—16. IV. Another charge exhibited against those of the flock that were fat and strong, for the injuries they did to those that were weak and feeble, ver. 17—22. V. Another promise, that God would in the fulness of time send the Messiah to be the great and good Shepherd of the sheep, who would redress all grievances, and set every thing to rights with the flock, ver. 23—31.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel, prophesy, and say unto them,

Thus saith the Lord GOD unto the shepherds;
Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed them-
Should not the shepherds feed the flocks? [selves!
3 Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool,
Ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock.
4 The diseased have ye not strengthened,
Neither have ye healed that which was sick,
Neither have ye bound up that which was broken,
Neither have ye brought again that which was driven away,
Neither have ye sought that which was lost;
But with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them.
5 And they were scattered, because there is no shepherd:
And they became meat to all the beasts of the field, when they were scattered.
6 My sheep wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill:
Yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth,
And none did search or seek after them.

The prophecy of this chapter is not dated, nor any of those that follow it, till ch. xl. It is most probable it was delivered after the completing of Jerusalem's destruction, when it would be very seasonable to inquire into the cause of it.

First. The prophet is ordered to "prophesy against the shepherds of Israel." The princes and magistrates, the priests and Levites, the great Sanhedrim, or council of state, or whoever they were that had the conduct of public affairs in a higher or lower sphere; the kings especially, for there were two of them now captives in Babylon, who, as well as the people, must have their transgressions shewed them that they might repent, as Manasseh in his captivity. God has something to say to the shepherds, for they are but under-shepherds, accountable to him who is the great Shepherd of Israel, Ps. lxxx. 1. And that which he saith is "Woe to the shepherds of Israel!" Though they are shepherds, and shepherds of Israel, yet he must not spare them, must not flatter them. Note, If men's dignity and power doth not, as it ought, keep them from sin, it will not serve to exempt them from reproof, to excuse their repentance, or to secure them from the judgments of God, if they do not repent. We had a "Woe to the pastors," Jer. xxiii. 1. God will in a particular manner reckon with them if they be false to their trust.

Secondly. He is here directed what to charge the shepherds with in God's name, as the ground of God's controversy with them; for it is not a causeless quarrel. Two things they are charged with:

1. That all their care was to advance and enrich themselves, and to make themselves great. Their business was to take care of those that were committed to their charge. "Should not the shepherds feed the flock?" No doubt they should, they betray their trust if they do not. Not that they are to put the meat into their mouths, but to provide it for them, and to bring them to it; but these shepherds made this the least of their care; they fed themselves, contrived every thing to gratify and indulge their own appetite, and to make themselves rich and great, fat and easy. They made sure the profits of their places, they did eat the fat, the cream, so some; for he that feeds a flock eats of the milk of it, 1 Cor. ix. 7; and they made sure the best of the milk. They made sure the fleece, and clothed themselves with the wool, getting into their hands as much as they could of the estates of their subjects; yea, and killed them that were well fed, that what they had might be fed upon, as Naboth was put to death for his vineyard. Note, There is a woe to those that are in public trust but consult only their own private interest, and are more inquisitive about the benefice than about the office—what money is to be got than what good to be done. It is an old complaint; all seek their own, and too many more than their own.

2. That they took no care for the benefit and welfare of those that were committed to their charge; "Ye feed not the flock." They neither knew how to do it, so ignorant were they, nor would they take any pains to do it, so lazy and slothful were they; nay, they never desired or designed it, so treacherous and unfaithful were they. 1st. They did not do their duty to those of the flock that were distempered; did not strengthen them or heal them, or bind them up, ver. 4. When any of the flock were sick or hurt, worried or wounded, it was all one to them whether they lived or died, they never looked after them. The princes and judges took no care to right those that suffered wrong, or to shelter injured innocency. They took no care of the poor to see them provided for—they might starve for them. The priests took no care to instruct the ignorant, to rectify the mistakes of those that were in error, to warn the unruly, or to comfort the feeble-minded. The ministers of state took no care to check the growing distempers of the kingdom, which threatened the vitals of it. Things were amiss and out of course every where, and nothing was done to rectify them. 2nd. They did not do their duty to those of the flock that were dispersed, that were driven away by the enemies that invaded the country, and were forced to seek for shelter where they could find a place, or that wandered of choice upon the mountains and hills, ver. 6, where they were exposed to the beasts of prey, and became meat to them, ver. 5; every one is ready to seize a waif and stray. Some went abroad and begged, some went abroad and traded; and thus the country waxed thin of inhabitants, and was weakened and impoverished, and wanted hands both in the fields of corn and in the fields of battle, both in harvest and in war. "My flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth," ver. 6. and they were never inquired after, were never encouraged to return to their own country; none did search or seek after them. Nay, with force and cruelty they ruled them, which drove more away, and discouraged those that were driven away from all thoughts of returning. Their case is bad who have reason to expect better treatment among strangers than in their own country. It may be meant of those of the flock that went astray from God and their duty; and the priests, that should have taught the good knowledge of the Lord, used no means to convince and reclaim them, so that they became an easy prey to seducers. Thus were "they scattered, because there was no shepherd," ver. 5. There were those that called themselves shepherds, but really they were not. Note, Those that do not do the work of the shepherds are unworthy of the name; and, if those that undertake to be shepherds are foolish shepherds, Zec. xi. 15, if they are proud and above their business, idle, and do not love their business, or faithless and unconcerned about it, the case of the flock is as bad as if it were without a shepherd. Better no shepherd than such shepherds. Christ complains that his flock were as sheep having no shepherd, when yet the scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses' seat, Mat. ix. 36. It is ill with the patient when his physician is his worst disease, ill with the flock when the shepherds drive them away and disperse them, by ruling them with force.

7 Therefore, ye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD;
8 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Surely because my flock became a prey,
And my flock became meat to every beast of the field,
Because there was no shepherd, neither did my shepherds search for my flock,
But the shepherds fed themselves, and fed not my flock;
9 Therefore, O ye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD;
10 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against the shepherds;
And I will require my flock at their hand,
And cause them to cease from feeding the flock;
Neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more;
For I will deliver my flock from their mouth,
That they may not be meat for them.
11 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I, even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out.
12 As a shepherd seeketh out his flock
In the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered;
So will I seek out my sheep,
And will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered
In the cloudy and dark day.
13 And I will bring them out from the people,
And gather them from the countries,
And will bring them to their own land,
And feed them upon the mountains of Israel
By the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country.
14 I will feed them in a good pasture,
And upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be:
There shall they lie in a good fold,
And in a fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel.
15 I will feed my flock, and I will cause them to lie down,
Saith the Lord GOD.
16 I will seek that which was lost,
And bring again that which was driven away,
And will bind up that which was broken,
And will strengthen that which was sick:
But I will destroy the fat and the strong;
I will feed them with judgment.

Upon reading the foregoing articles of impeachment drawn up in God's name, against the shepherds of Israel, we cannot but look upon the shepherds with a just indignation, and upon the flock with a tender compassion. God, by the prophet, here expresseth both in a high degree; and the shepherds are called upon, ver. 7, and again, ver. 9, to "hear the word of the Lord," to hear this word. Let them hear how little he regards them who made much of themselves, and how much he regards the flock which they made nothing of; both will be humbling to them. Those that will not hear the word of the Lord, giving them their direction, shall be made to hear the word of the Lord reading them their doom. Now see here,

First. How much displeased God is at the shepherds. Their crimes are repeated, ver. 8. God's flock became a prey to the deceivers first that drew them to idolatry, and then to the destroyers that carried them into captivity; and these shepherds took no care to prevent either the one or the other, but were as if there had been no shepherds; and therefore God saith it, ver. 10, and confirms it with an oath, ver. 8, "I am against the shepherds." They had a commission from God to feed the flock, and made use of his name in what they did, expecting he would stand by them. No, saith God, so far from that, I am against them. Note, It is not our having the name and authority of shepherds that will engage God for us, if we do not the work enjoined us, and be not faithful to the trust reposed in us. God is against them, and they shall know it; for, 1. They shall be called to an account how they have discharged their trust; "I will require my flock at their hands," and charge it upon them that so many of them are missing. Note, Those will have a great deal to answer for in the judgment-day who take upon them the care of souls and yet take no care of them. Ministers must watch and work as those that must give account, Heb. xiii. 17. 2. They shall be deprived officio et beneficio,—'they shall be turned out both from the work and from the wages of their place.' "They shall cease from feeding the flock," that is, from pretending to feed it. Note, It is just with God to take out of men's hands that power which they have abused, and that trust which they have betrayed. But if this were all their punishment they could bear it well enough; therefore it is added, "Neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more," for "I will deliver my flock from their mouth," which, instead of protecting, they had made a prey of. Note, Those that are enriching themselves with the spoils of the public cannot expect that they shall always be suffered to do so. Nor will God always permit his people to be trampled upon by those that should support them, but will find a time to deliver them from the shepherds their false friends, as well as from the lions their open enemies.

Secondly. How much concerned God is for the flock. He speaks as if he were the more concerned for them because he saw them thus neglected, for with him the fatherless find mercy. Precious promises are made here upon the occasion, which were to have their accomplishment in the return of the Jews out of their captivity, and their re-establishment in their own land. Let the shepherds "hear this word of the Lord," and know that they have no part or lot in the matter; but let the poor sheep hear it, and take the comfort of it. Note, Though magistrates and ministers fail in doing their part for the good of the church, yet God will not fail in doing his; he will take the flock into his own hand, rather than the church shall come short of any kindness he has designed for it. The under-shepherds may prove careless, but the chief Shepherd neither slumbers nor sleeps. They may be false, but God abides faithful.

1. God will gather his sheep together that were scattered, and bring them back to the fold that had wandered from it. I, even I, who alone can do it, will do it, and will have all the glory of it. "I will both search my sheep and seek them out," ver. 11, as a shepherd doth, ver. 12, and bring them back, as he doth the stray sheep, upon his shoulders, "from all the places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day." There are cloudy and dark days, windy and stormy ones, which scatter God's sheep, which send them hither and thither, to divers and distant places, in quest of secresy and safety. But, 1st. Wherever they are the eye of God will find them out, for his eyes run to and fro through the earth in favour of them. "I will seek out my sheep," and not one that belongs to the fold, though driven ever so far off, shall be lost. The Lord knows them that are his, he knows their work, and where they dwell, Rev. ii. 13, and where they are hidden. 2nd. When his time is come his arms will fetch them home; ver. 13, "I will bring them out from the people." God will both incline their hearts to come by his grace, and will by his providence open a door for them, and remove every difficulty that lies in the way. They shall not return one by one, clandestinely stealing away, but they shall return in a body. I will "gather them from the countries" into which they are dispersed; not only the most considerable families of them, but every particular person; ver. 16, "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away." This was done when so many thousand Jews returned triumphantly out of Babylon, under the conduct of Zerubbabel, Ezra, and others. When those that have gone astray from God into the paths of sin are brought back by repentance; when those that erred come to the acknowledgment of the truth; when God's outcasts are gathered and restored, and religious assemblies that were dispersed rally again upon the ceasing of persecution, and when the churches have rest and liberty, then this promise has a farther accomplishment.

2. God will feed his people as the sheep of his pasture, that had been famished. God will bring the returning captives safe to their own land; ver. 13, "will feed them upon the mountains of Israel," and that is a good pasture, and a fat pasture, ver. 14; there shall their feeding be, and there shall be their fold, and it is a good fold. There God will not only feed them, but "cause them to lie down," ver. 15, which notes a comfortable rest, after they had tired themselves with their wanderings, and a constant, continuing residence; they shall not be driven out again from these green pastures, as they have been, nor shall they be disturbed, but shall lie down in a sweet repose, and there shall be none to make them afraid; Ps. xxiii. 2, "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures." Compare this with the like promise, Jer. xxiii. 3, 4, when God restored them, not only to the milk and honey of their own land, to the enjoyment of the fruits of it, but to the privileges of his sanctuary on mount Zion, the chief of the mountains of Israel; when they had an altar and a temple again, and the benefit of a settled priesthood, then they were fed in a good pasture.

3. He will succour those that are hurt, will "bind up that which was broken, and strengthen that which was sick," will comfort those that mourn in Zion, and with Zion. If ministers, that should speak peace to those that are of a sorrowful spirit, neglect their duty, yet the Holy Ghost the Comforter will be faithful to his office. But, as it follows, the fat and the strong shall be destroyed. He that hath rest for disquieted saints hath terror to speak to presumptuous sinners. As "every valley shall be filled," so "every mountain and hill shall be brought low," Lu. iii. 5.

17 And as for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I judge between cattle and cattle, between the rams and the he goats.
18 Seemeth it a small thing unto you to have eaten up the good pasture,
But ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures?
And to have drunk of the deep waters,
But ye must foul the residue with your feet?
19 And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet;
And they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet.
20 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD unto them;
Behold, I, even I, will judge between the fat cattle and between the lean cattle.
21 Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder,
And pushed all the diseased with your horns,
Till ye have scattered them abroad;
22 Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey;
And I will judge between cattle and cattle.
23 And I will see up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them,
Even my servant David;
He shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd.
24 And I the LORD will be their God,
And my servant David a prince among them;
I the LORD have spoken it.
25 And I will make with them a covenant of peace,
And will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land:
And they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods.
26 And I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing;
And I will cause the shower to come down in his season;
There shall be showers of blessing.
27 And the tree of the field shall yield her fruit,
And the earth shall yield her increase,
And they shall be safe in their land, and shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have broken the bands of their yoke,
And delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them.
28 And they shall no more be a prey to the heathen,
Neither shall the beast of the land devour them;
But they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid.
29 And I will raise up for them a plant of renown,
And they shall be no more consumed with hunger in the land,
Neither bear the shame of the heathen any more.
30 Thus shall they know that I the LORD their God am with them,
And that they, even the house of Israel, are my people, Saith the Lord GOD.
31 And ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men,
And I am your God, saith the Lord GOD.

The prophet has no more to say to the shepherds, but he has now a message to deliver to the flock; God has ordered him to speak tenderly to them, and to assure them of the mercy he had in store for them. But here he is ordered to make a difference between some and others of them, to separate between the precious and the vile, and then to give them a promise of the Messiah, by whom this distinction should be effectually made, partly at his first coming, (for for judgment he came into this world, Jno. ix. 39, to fill the hungry with good things, and to send the rich empty away, Lu. i. 53,) but completely at his second coming, when he shall, as it is here said, "judge between cattle and cattle," "as a shepherd divides between the sheep and the goats, and shall set the sheep on his right hand and the goats on his left," Mat. xxv. 32, 33, which seems to have reference to this here. We have here,

First. Conviction spoken to those of the flock that were fat and strong, "the rams and the he-goats," ver. 17. Those that, though they had not power as shepherds and rulers to oppress with, yet, being rich and wealthy, made use of the opportunity which this gave them to bear hard upon their poor neighbours. Those that have much would have more; and if they set to it will have more, so many ways have they of encroaching upon their poor neighbours, and forcing from them the one ewe lamb, 2 Sam. xii. 14. Do not the rich oppress the poor merely with the help of their riches, and draw them before the judgment seats? Jas. ii. 6. Poor servants and tenants are hardly used by their rich lords and masters. The rams and the he-goats not only kept all the good pasture to themselves, eat the fat and drank the sweet, but they would not let the poor of the flock have any comfortable enjoyment of the little that was left them; they trod down the residue of the pastures, and fouled the residue of the waters, so that the flock was fain to eat that which they had trodden into the dirt, and drink that which they had muddied, ver. 18, 19. This intimates that the great men not only by extortion and oppression made and kept their neighbours poor, and scarce left them enough to subsist on, but were so vexatious to them, that what little coarse fare they had was embittered to them. And this seemed a small thing to them; they thought there was no harm in it, as if it were the privilege of their quality to be injurious to all their neighbours. Note, Many that live in pomp and at ease themselves care not what straits those about them are reduced to, so they may but have every thing to their mind. Those that are at ease, and the proud, grudge that any body should live by them with any comfort.

But this was not all; they not only robbed the poor, to make them poorer, but were troublesome to the sick and weak of the flock; ver. 21, they "thrust with side and shoulder" those that were feeble, for the weakest go to the wall, and pushed the diseased with their horns, because they knew they could be too hard for them, when they durst not meddle with their match. It has been observed concerning sheep, that, if one of the flock be sick and faint, the rest will secure it as they can, and shelter it from the scorching heat of the sun, but these, on the contrary, were most injurious to the diseased. Those that they could not serve themselves of they did what they could to rid the country of them, and so scattered them abroad, as if the poor, whom Christ saith we must always have with us, were public nuisances, not to be relieved, but sent far enough. Note, It is a barbarous thing to add affliction to the afflicted. Perhaps these rams and he-goats are designed to represent the scribes and Pharisees; for they are such troublers of the church as Christ himself must come to deliver it from, ver. 23. They devoured widows' houses, took away the key of knowledge, corrupted the pure water of Divine truths, and oppressed the consciences of men with the traditions of the elders, besides that they were continually vexatious and injurious to "the poor of the flock that waited" on the Lord, Zec. xi. 11. Note, It is no new thing for the flock of God to receive a great deal of damage and mischief from those that are themselves of the flock, and in eminent station in it, Acts xx. 30.

Secondly. Comfort spoken to those of the flock that are poor and feeble, and wait for the consolation of Israel; ver. 22, "I will save my flock," and they shall no more be spoiled as they have been by the beasts of prey, by their own shepherds, or by the rams and he-goats among themselves. Upon this occasion, as is usual in the prophets, comes in a prediction of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his kingdom, and the exceeding great and precious benefits which the church should enjoy under the protection and influence of that kingdom. Observe,
